Dear Colleen,

We are pleased to know that Mennonite Church USA has received a grant to digitize the print files of Gospel Herald and The Mennonite. As you know, Gospel Herald was a publication of the organization then known as Mennonite Publishing House, later as Mennonite Publishing Network, and now as MennoMedia.

You have our full permission to digitize all issues of Gospel Herald and make them available for free, with full-text access.

Best wishes in this important endeavor!

Warmly,

Psalm One Hundred

Make a joyful noise unto the Lord, all ye lands. Serve the Lord with gladness: come before his presence with singing. Know ye that the Lord he is God: it is he that hath made us, and not we ourselves; we are his people, and the sheep of his pasture. Enter into his gates with thanksgiving, and into his courts with praise: be thankful unto him, and bless his name. For the Lord is good; his mercy is everlasting; and his truth endureth to all generations.
What Can We Expect from the Seventies?

By William Kuhns

The seventies are anybody’s guess. Speculating on the seventies, just after the tumult of the sixties, makes any prophet have a queasy feeling. Who could have predicted the assassinations; the movement of young and blacks from hope to disillusion to cynicism and rebellion; the enormous triumph of the moon against the backdrop of the Vietnam debacle? If the seventies promise events on such a grand scale, only the most imaginative science fiction writers could give us the vaguest of hints. But assuming that trends which have appeared in recent years will continue and perhaps come to dominate the landscape of the coming era, here are some speculations:

Emergence of the New Generation

The kids who grew up in the sixties, who rallied at colleges and joined the Peace Corps and bussed to Mississippi, will be the bankers, the doctors, the teachers, and the middle management of the seventies. They won’t be running the system, but increasingly they will be filling it, and that itself will make the difference. The idealism that characterized the early and mid-sixties hasn’t all soured into rebellion. Increasingly there are lawyers more interested in challenging a city’s real-estate practices than bleeding their clients; teachers who aren’t apt to cling to the textbook; young political assistants who are learning how to budge city hall. This new breed is less patient and more committed to change than earlier generations. And if the political or legal or educational systems won’t bend for them, they will search hard for ways of slipping past them.

Polarization

The sixties made us aware how far apart from one another we really are. Urban and rural. Blacks and whites. Parents and their children. Radicals and liberals. In recent Los Angeles and Minneapolis mayoral elections the dominant vote was white backlash. Long hair has become a symbol to which people react violently—as witnessed in the movie, “Easy Rider.” Unless a powerful and highly popular leader arises—an unlikely prospect—the country’s polarization will probably continue: resulting, perhaps, not only in the counter-culture of the young, but in a continuous splintering of that counter-culture, into black nationalists, the radical young, and the anti-technological young who flee to drugs and communes. The net effect may be a broadening of cultural values or—again, witness “Easy Rider”—a rise in intolerance and bigotry.

Power and Willpower

Can we stop air pollution and the wrecking of the land? Can the poor of our society be entered successfully into the affluent American economy? The seventies will probably spell out the decisive answer, showing either that the gargantuan corporations have assumed too much power and need answer to no one, or that new, more localized forms of power are possible and workable. The question of power is a crucial one for the seventies, after a decade when university presidents, police chiefs, mayors, and the occupants of the White House have faced the recognition that their power on paper didn’t equal their power in fact. With television, the abuses of power are glaringly evident, and people feel increasingly distant from the decisions that govern the air they breathe, the food they eat, the way their sons will die. The American political system may or may not be workable in today’s technological age; more than the sixties, the seventies will tell.

Rebellion

Is long hair rebellion, or simply a hairstyle? Do people smoke marijuana because it is illegal, or because they feel it gives them peace to a war-ridden time? If the colleges were the generations’ battlefields of the sixties, the high schools may be the battlefields of the seventies. And the battles are likely to be more tactical, more successful, since the high school students have been learning from the mistakes of the college revolts.

The generation gap is becoming as American as violence and apple pie, and it is likely to find new forms, and perhaps new organization in the seventies. The young are wise to Thomas Wolfe’s dictum: You can’t go home again. And while the SDS claims that they can stretch rebellion into revolution, that is unlikely in a society as organized, affluent, and satisfied as ours. Drugs, communes, and guerrilla tactics aimed at the power structure will probably become standardized forms of rebellion in the seventies.

New Political Alliances

Sometime in the seventies Chicago, Washington, Baltimore, Cleveland, Detroit, and other major U.S. cities will witness the consequence of twenty years of suburban exodus: over fifty percent of the voters in these cities will be black. The implications may not become obvious immediately, but no doubt will, by the 1980’s, change the face—and perhaps the structure—of city governments, perhaps the very fabric of the political process itself. It won’t be the surface difference between a white mayor and a black mayor; but more likely the transformation to a new political consciousness—a profound concern, for example, for economic freedom in the ghettos. The older political parties may give way to newer organizations, from the militant Black Panthers to the reactionary groups emerging throughout the cities and suburbs of the nation.

Science and Technology

"The quiet revolution"—in chemistry, biology, medicine, virtually all the sciences—has been going on about us in the 1960’s and will, if anything, mushroom in the seventies. Many scientists feel sure that by 1980 they will have localized the virus which prompts cancer, and may begin inoculations against it. At the same time, drugs for restructuring the DNA molecules—the cell’s memory bank—may be developed, even used experimentally. Scientifically, the seventies will bring us far closer than any previous decade to the tools which may transform society into a utopia—or into Huxley’s dark nightmare.

The sixties saw the incredible growth of the computer; the seventies will be a decade of far-ranging experimentation with its uses. More than the wiretap or bug, the computer may—unless drastic steps are taken, such as a privacy amendment to the Bill of Rights—spell an end to privacy for most people in America. A person’s total history—financial, academic, social, psychological—will be at instant access, though presumably for only a limited few. Who needs Big Brother if an IBM 3800 with a warehouse of memory banks can do the trick instead?

The Group Style

The sixties saw a growing consciousness of the group: in group dynamics and group therapy of institutes like Esalen; in a change of TV and movie heroes from individuals to groups ("Mission: Impossible," "Bonanza," "Bob & Carol & Ted & Alice"); in musical rock groups; in the popularity of brainstorming and group approaches to business management. The seventies could witness a reaction against this trend, though that seems doubtful. Small groups, rarely larger than ten, will tend to become a major cultural phenomenon: in the schools, in business, in leisure, even in sex. It is not that America is relinquishing its sturdy tradition of individualism, but simply relocating it within a strong group context.

Television

Technology, in the seventies, will change television, threaten the existence of movie theaters (as it already has of the stage), and in effect broaden the options for people at home. Cable TV, perhaps pay-TV, RCA’s new device, "SelectaVision," and CBS’s Electronic Video Recorder (both of the latter TV playback systems, with tape decks) will make it possible to see first-run movies, ballets, Broadway musicals, without leaving home. The full impact of these new systems and devices will not be felt until deep into the seventies, but most likely they will shift the economic structure of television and broaden the network fare. In the seventies the networks will face what the movie studios faced in the early fifties, when television appeared. Here the impact will be greater than it was then (the studios have simply absorbed television, by producing most of its broadcasting). By 1980 television will not represent only an "information explosion," but very possibly a "cultural explosion" as well.

Leisure

Even new systems of television cannot absorb the growing leisure needs of a nation which already, on an average, works a 35-hour week. If there is any single difference between the leisure pursuits of the seventies and those of the sixties, it will be a new sophistication: a taste for experimentation, a distaste for prefab gimmicks like miniature golf, a growing popularity of speed machines—motorbikes, snowmobiles, speedboats, airplanes. The most significant area for leisure, though—already foreshadowed in film, music, and theater—will no doubt be sex, where the popular ambitions of experimentation, within marriage, outside of marriage, between married couples, may mark forever the death of puritanism in America. The pill has vanquished the major source of guilt in sex; the seventies may see the erosion of other, particularly social and religious, sources of guilt.

And the Church?

These trends amount to a most cursory glance at the seventies. Neglected are such vital areas as psychology, space, transportation, economics, and national politics—where, I feel, current trends will probably hold fast.

What, then, does all this mean for the church? And why haven’t I commented on trends within the church—unity, inner-city work, the vocation crisis, theological tumult? The answer to both questions is the same. In his Ethics, Dietrich Bonhoeffer arrived at a concept of the church in which the church is defined in the process of its concrete relationship to the world, and what is currently happening in the world. If the secular thrust of current theology has any meaning, it is here. And if the church of the seventies is going to change, work for vitalizing the people of the seventies, it is here. Whether this or that church body merges in the seventies matters far less than whether pastors and laymen come to grips with the challenges of that era: economic freedom for the poor; locating the ambition of sexual responsibility (no longer sexual morality); the dangers and possibilities of a group ethos; the meaning of rebellion: the ways of bridging the growing gaps within society.

For many commentators, the election of Richard Nixon to the White House is the forecast of an era like the fifties: quiet, undemanding, a peaceful veneer over a restless subsurface. This I doubt. We cannot return to the fifties; the illusions have been burst; the rush of events and changes is coming too fast, too violently. The sixties have taught us that responsibility of a nation changed by technology is that people be capable of changing also. In the seventies we will discover whether or not people have learned that truth.
Youth Ministry Goals (II)

Last week we presented a number of goals for youth ministry in the local congregation during the 1970’s which were developed by the Churchwide Youth Council in their Dec. 5-7, 1969, meeting.

This week we share goals relating to youth ministry at the district conference and churchwide levels.

District conferences should develop a youth ministry for the 1970’s which:
1. provides settings for leadership training of congregational youth leaders
2. continues area-wide youth rallies and retreats
3. works toward the employment of a full-time or part-time youth minister to serve the district conference
4. plans exposure activities to subcultures such as that in the inner city and provides for interracial and inter-denominational encounters
5. integrates young people into the structure and decision-making of the church.

During the 1970’s the Churchwide Youth Ministry staff and Youth Council should:
1. produce more creative Bible study materials
2. make it possible for the youth staff to be freed from excessive administrative detail to give time to conference and congregational youth ministry leaders and program
3. develop a drama library resource
4. promote experiences in Christian service such as V.S. and work camps
5. develop international and intercultural youth-adult teams and tours
6. produce a regular newsletter to conference youth ministry staff to stimulate them in their work with new ideas, resources, and training program information.

The Churchwide Council worked well together under the leadership of the Spirit to produce this set of goals. We now ask that the church at large join us with prayer and support as we seek to be disciples of Christ with young people in the coming years.

Secretary for Youth Ministry.

By Still Waters

He shall not strive, nor cry; neither shall any man hear his voice in the streets.—Mt. 12:19.

Strange, isn’t it, that we look to see Christ and His work in the great things and miss Him in the small things? We think He ought to be in the front-page news, the big noises and great events. But He is known in such simple things as the breaking of bread. We catch a glimpse of Him in the common acts of life—the cup of cool water, the loving word, and the tender touch of the hand.

We want it otherwise. We like barnstorming, big marches, and loud speeches. In our minds nothing is really accomplished until something big is said and someone big says it. We are like little newsmen searching only for the spectacular. We love crowds, contests, and controversies.

But the kingdom does not come with a great deal of notice or noise. For “he shall not strive, nor cry; neither shall any man hear his voice in the streets” (Mt. 12:19). Christ does not come shouting the other down. He does not come as one theologian taking another theologian apart. He comes in the serenity of one who seeks to save by love. He comes not in the strife of great words, wisdom, or works. He comes to the humble and honest heart who hears the still small voice and gives a ready and radiant response.

Powerful Love

By Pauline Z. Martin

I gaze upon the face of Him
Whose eyes soft music speak to me
And feel that I have lost myself
In flowing currents, heaven bound.

I fail to see life’s highest goals
Lie shattered; dreams unanswered still.
One look has captured all my soul—I only see His love for me.

Let's Affirm Our Faith

I suggest that we are at the time when we must stop analyzing and criticizing the church and start affirming our faith. For long enough the church has looked at itself, talked against itself, lambasted itself, and stressed what it cannot do and cannot believe. It is passing through what might correctly be called the age of negation. This age started with the development of long lists of "do's" and "don'ts." Then the church started to criticize this approach. And it seems the church never pulled out of this position of critic "par excellence."

Now, by all appearances, people are tired, very tired of the negative, critical approach to the church situation. Many members have left already. Others promise to quit unless the climate is changed. Many young people have believed what the church says about itself. They also have left or are nauseated. Louis Cassels sounds right when he writes what he believes is the most important reason why people are drifting away from the church: "They haven't found in the church what they hoped to find — a confident faith in God."

A confident faith can hardly be expected in the presence of a defeatist, antagonistic, and critical spirit. Never can it be found where there is continual analysis. This only produces, as someone suggested, the "paralysis of analysis." And the church has spent too much time analyzing the predicament until it becomes annoying like the old lady who is forever sharing all her ailments. Analysis has its place. But it should not be primary.

The Scripture stresses the exodus of sin more than the genesis of sin. It says more about God's forgiveness of sin than man's fall into sin.

George MacDonald says, "Analysis is well, as death is well." Dead bodies are dissected and studied. No amount of tearing apart, examining, measuring, and analyzing can give life. Wadsworth wrote, "To dissect is to kill."

Many church leaders can be held responsible for the negative attitude toward the church. During the last decade the church was scolded much more than shepherded. It was chided much more than cared for. It was moaned about much more than ministered to.

Any other body would have died years ago from such treatment. Name any other work which could have persisted with so high a percentage of its managers and members pointing out its failures while doing so little to present a positive position.

But church leaders also suffered severe handicap in the criticism. Ministers were told of their complete incompetence. They were told that their work is no longer valid, preaching belongs to the past, and their message is irrelevant for today.

Church members were told they come to church for the wrong reasons, give with the wrong motives, and represent the wrong things to the world. For fellowship the beer hall was at times recommended over the church. All these things and many more were said by members of the church with almost nothing said as to what it means to minister, and what a vital Christian life or congregation is. Today is the time to move beyond these morose descriptions of the church. We want to be told what we can believe. We want to know what the church can affirm rather than what it can no longer believe. We are tired of hearing leaders with all kinds of reservations. We are seeing that the doubters have little to offer. And the skeptics have spoken their piece without strengthening any cause. As one spiritual leader said years ago, "Any fool can knock props out from under a cripple. It takes some sincere concern and thought to put props under."

And we are all at least in some sense cripples. We need each other and the help each can give rather than being told all the time that we are cripples. This means, for one thing, that in the church's concern for the social, the inner-city, the racial problems in the world, we dare not forget that each congregation also has real burning needs to be ministered to.

Without a doubt it's time the church — that is, you and I — must declare what it believes — not in a dogmatic, domineering, and bigoted way, but in a radiant, ready, and buoyant way. Perhaps it is past due for every preacher to again write down what he believes and say it so that his people know. I've wondered after hearing sermons what the bearer believes. Perhaps the season is ripe for every Sunday school teacher to say clearly what he affirms. I've heard some teachers raise only doubts. Perhaps the moment is here for every member to write for the record what he will live and die for. Such exercise probably would bring revival. And revival involves not only confession and repentance but also the affirmation of faith. — D.

Let the year be given to God in its every moment! The year is made up of minutes; let these be watched as having been dedicated to God! It is in the sanctification of the small that hallowing of the large is secure. — G. Campbell Morgan.

God Help Us

By Glenn Musselman

Glenn Musselman

Having been in the States six months I’ve perceived that the Christian community, both our denomination and other churches as well, has been doing some deep soul-searching. Voices within society have criticized the church to the extent of calling it a complete failure. Some people say the church has served its day, but no longer has a message or a mission for today’s world.

The church is a sociological phenomenon, they say, no different from any other social group and no longer to be taken seriously. The theological undergirdings of the church are archaic, completely out of step with the latest findings in science, psychology, and sociology. Even within the Christian church, many leaders have become discouraged. They feel the church is not communicating its message, either in word or in deed.

Recently I saw three TV portrayals on the generation gap, the gulf that exists between young people and their parents. There is also a gap between the church and the world. Technology cannot close that gap. Geographical barriers no longer limit communication and interchange.

We can now see our world from 240,000 miles away. As the astronauts looked at the world from that distance, they could hardly realize that it consists of three billion people seething in revolution, violence, hatred, suffering, and want. Men blast their fellowmen in Vietnam in the name of liberty, democracy, and self-determination. Racial minorities are no longer willing to wait for a slow, gradual process to usher in their rights. The poverty-stricken demand a greater share of economic wealth. Young people are disillusioned with the older generations’ life-style and values. The hippies demonstrate for a voice in educational and political policy because they no longer want to be poured into molds already cut out for them by their elders.

In the ghetto, hopelessness is on the verge of exploding into fiery vengeance. In spite of the spiraling education and learning in the most civilized country of the world, there is erupting a wave of crime and brutal killing formerly associated with primeval jungles. Medicine and science have conquered diseases, lengthening human life to an average of 70 years, yet millions of people deliberately take drugs and destroy their health and deteriorate their minds.

Who Will Answer?

Are these scientific or spiritual problems? Is the answer to be found in a laboratory or in a fresh discovery of life’s meaning that can be encountered in Jesus Christ as revealed in the Scriptures and in His people, the church? What is the stance of the Christian church in this situation? Has the church a mission? Is this message still relevant to these chaotic times? Is there a means of transmitting this message?

There are people within the Christian church who would retreat from the scene. They feel that conditions in society are hopeless, that nothing really significant or relevant can be done to restore, to rebuild. And so the church should seek to protect itself, conserve its heritage, and prepare itself for the final consummation. This attitude is little different from that of many monks in the Middle Ages who retired to escape the world’s corruption.

I’ve discovered recently that 2,000 Amish have moved into Bolivia, next door to Brazil. Before I knew they were...
Amish, I thought, "What a wonderful opportunity to evangelize that country! A new colony of people could soon move out into that populace with the gospel of Christ." I later discovered they were going there to protect their heritage, to conserve their faith, to retire from the world rather than entering into contact with society to transmit the gospel. It hurt my heart.

Perhaps a more common position is where Christians become identified with the status quo of an unjust society. We become alienated from the world of the needy, the poor, the exploited, the minorities. Rather than identify with them as Jesus did, we become senseless to the inner cries in order to concentrate on our own economic and cultural climb in society. Consequently, the church is branded as an institution out to protect its own interests rather than being that suffering community ready to give itself for the blessing of others. God deliver us from this kind of alienation.

If we lose our sense of mission, we cease being the church. Arnold B. Coleman in his book, Agents of Reconciliation, says it very forcefully: "If the church ever loses an overpowering sense of mission to the world as its very reason for existence, then it will have lost its definitive nature as the servant of God, the body of Christ, the communion of the Holy Spirit."

The Church — Yesterday and Today

In its apostolic beginnings the church became the very revolution that upset the status quo. When Paul and Silas proclaimed the gospel in Thessalonica, they were accused by the unbelieving Jews of turning the world upside down. In a spiritual sense, that's exactly what they did. They came with a divine intervention that completely uprooted paganism by bringing God's liberating truth in Christ to the very foundations of human life.

As people committed themselves to Jesus Christ as Savior and Lord, they experienced the transforming power of the Holy Spirit in such a way that all of life was restructured and reinterpreted around the lordship of Jesus Christ. He became the meaning, the goal of human life, and His love freed men, empowering them for a new dynamic in social relationships. Christians experienced a joyous release, a real freedom to be what God had intended them to be. They were liberated from hypocrisy, from self-glorification, and from an earthly view of reality. Such a revolution was of the spirit and of the heart — nonviolent but earthshaking in its effect.

Soon after we moved to Sertaozinho, Brazil, in 1957 to found an evangelical church, the local priest by way of the radio station called us heretics and accused us of coming to disturb the tranquillity of that city. But what was the tranquillity of that city of 18,000? It was ignorance of God's Word and accommodation to sin, a spiritual stupor as to what commitment to Christ meant. The majority were satisfied with the traditional emphasis on ceremony, pomp, images, and worship through the saints.

During the next eleven years some tremendous changes took place in that city. God used our congregation in that emerging witness as people were attracted to the reality of Christ and gradually formed a congregation of 90 members. Other evangelical churches were also being founded at the same time. These evangelical Christians began pricking the consciences of the people to create a hunger for the Word of God. The transformed lives of these new converts demonstrated the power of the gospel and that Christianity can dramatically revitalize the total outlook of an individual.

When we first distributed the Gospel of John in the city, the priest ordered the people to burn it. Who would have thought that several years later this man would be urging the people to read the Bible? The Catholic laymen's organization invited me to preach in the Catholic church during such a Bible week. But all of these victories were not easy. They came in response to earnest and agonizing prayer over a period of years.

The Church's Priorities

How important it is for the church to carry out a spiritual ministry of planting new congregations of redeemed and committed people by proclaiming the gospel message! Because of the revolutionary crises in society today, many Christians think that the church should concentrate its energies in an activist social program. By matching these resources with technology, science, and other human ingenuity, they believe we can brainstorm any problem and come up with a solution. They believe the church should not focus its attention on conversion and the planting of new believer fellowships, but rather make life more livable for the suffering even though this may be limited to the here and now.

However, if the church through its community of believers fails to transmit the good news of reconciliation in Christ — His grace, His forgiveness, His offer of eternal salvation, His call to repentance and faith — then all these other efforts, while good in themselves, are but a form of humanism. Only faith in Christ gives human existence purpose and fulfillment.

During our ministry in Sertaozinho our congregation at one time had a program of food distribution to some 40 or 50 families. Looking back on that experience, I feel it was worthwhile. But if we had nothing more to show than that, I would be discouraged today.

That which is permanent and eternal is the community of God's people, the church, those who are called out of sin to a life of community in Christ. Only by a total dependence on the Holy Spirit can the church be true to her Lord in communicating Christ both in word and in action. Such confident dependence on God's Spirit will usher in a new demonstration of God's power in society and in the lives of individuals who become His agents for spiritual change. This will close the credibility gap that now exists between what the church says and what it does.

At the core of the early church's dynamic relationship with the world was its evangelizing missions. It was not involved in a struggle to protect itself from the world, nor was it totally caught up in developing its own internal life through nurture. Rather, the focus of activity in the Apostolic Church was expansion, evangelism. It had a program of advance to gain men and women to Christ. This minority movement encountered a culture that was set against it, but it set out to plant churches in any and every place men and women could be found.

There was a continuous influx of new converts into the Christian congregations that kept the life of the congregation spontaneous. Man's spiritual need became the ultimate concern. The historical acts in the life of Christ — His ministry, death, resurrection, ascension, and His promised return — were seen as intimately related to the life of every individual. God's evaluation of every human being's worth was to be understood in the cross of Christ where His suffering love was poured out for the salvation of sinful men. The church's one encompassing mission was to program that salvation to every person, and only as a person received that message in Christ by faith could that person be forgiven, purified, and transformed.

Where Do We Go from Here?

Does this original gospel of salvation have the punch to encounter modern man, just as it encountered men of that first generation? I believe it does; I've seen it work in Brazil. Every aspect of human civilization was envisioned by God the Creator and Jesus Christ as Lord. The offer of salvation is still God's supreme appeal to men and the church of Christ. It remains for us as the church to believe this and to act upon it.

The church then must reexamine its life and its methods under the scrutiny of the Spirit. There must be a renewal of covenant under Christ's lordship. The world apart from Christ is alienated from God's grace. Can the church feel for this world as God feels for it? If sociology serves to do anything for the church, it should lead the assembly of God's people to see their own spiritual failures. Evangelism in mission must take precedence over nurture and self-defense.

The church must also get out of the centuries-old division of clergy and laity, whereby congregations become pastor-centered while the great majority of lay members are inactive. For many people being a Christian does not imply a commitment to Christ in obedience. Beyond attendance at worship services once or twice a week and a financial contribution, there is little participation. No new seekers are introduced to Christ through witness and testimony, and increasingly these members become statistics on the churches' membership lists and congregational life becomes stagnant and routine.

The unbelieving world disregards most Christian congregations today. Any kind of breakthrough and response will come only as Christians are awakened to a new dynamic of obedience to Jesus Christ. This kind of discipleship will likely be stimulated by small groups of believers who meet in Koinonia cell groups to study, share, and pray. In these groups laymen are able to deepen their spiritual lives, receive power from the Holy Spirit, and learn how to share their faith with others.

The congregation in Sertaozinho was divided into prayer cell groups of five to seven individuals which met once a week in homes. In these intimate circles new believers learned to pray, to share experiences, and to become concerned for the salvation of their relatives and friends. These groups did more to revitalize the congregation than many of the more formal worship services. New seekers were attracted to the fellowship of the church. Spiritual and domestic problems were prayed over and victories were won. I look upon these groups as the real cutting edge of the church, more so than some of the evangelistic campaigns, important as these may be.

Can our congregations across North America experience this type of involvement, study, introspection, sharing, and commitment? I hope so. As James shows consistent doing as the necessary fruit of believing, we should also keep evangelism and social service interrelated. I am happy that our denomination is attempting to grasp both these dimensions. It has engaged in relief and service as acts of compassion and simultaneously held forth the spiritual torch of Christ's gospel for the formation of spiritual communities. Remember that the unbelieving world will quickly perceive something authentic about the church's word when it is backed up by sacrificial living, self-giving, and motivated by the love of Christ.

During our years of service in Brazil we've experienced both failure and victory. But even if a few failures have discouraged us, there are so many more victories that encourage us. James 5:16 — "The prayer of a righteous man has great power in its effects." In other words, prayer changes things. But I'd like to restate it for 1969 — "prayer can change the status quo." It can upset the status quo of spiritual lethargy and bring a revolution within my own heart and within our own church.

What we've experienced here at Mission '69 this week is not merely a mountaintop experience which we'll soon forget. I believe the events of these past days are going to make great transformations within our brotherhood. What we need is this union of the Holy Spirit coupled with bended knees in prayer in order for God to work marvels.
The Herald Graded

Sunday School Series—
A Unified Curriculum

By Paul M. Lederach

The founding of the church, the expansion of the church, worship in the church, and beliefs of the church—these are themes to be studied by children in the primary, junior, and intermediate departments in the 1969-70 Sunday school year using the Herald Graded Sunday School Series. Youth and adults will continue to study “The Story of God and His People”—the year of studies dealing with the story the Bible tells. This study began in July 1969 and will continue through the end of June 1970.

The Herald Graded Sunday School Series is a “unified” curriculum. That is to say, pupils in the three departments are studying the same theme, or era of Bible history, or Bible content. This is possible through annual unifying themes. During the 1969-70 Sunday school year the theme is Church. In 1970-71 the theme will be Discipleship. The theme of the Sunday school year just completed was Redemption.

The Herald Graded Series is a “unified,” not a “uniform,” curriculum. A uniform curriculum is one in which all classes study the same Bible verses on a given Sunday from smallest child through adult. In developing Mennonite curriculum this principle was rejected on the children’s level because of the impossibility of taking into account the experience, growth, and development of children in such a framework. A plan for organizing content dare not take precedence over concern for persons. Any perceptive review of the uniform outlines, which are prepared interdenominationally and which attempt to “cover the Bible” in six years, makes apparent the difficulties inherent in attempting to use these outlines with young children. The Uniform outlines do, however, provide a satisfactory base for youth and adult classes.

The Herald Graded Sunday School Series is prepared on outlines developed to help children deal with central issues in Anabaptist-Mennonite theology and Mennonite Church life. The Series is Bible based and attempts to provide children with an overview of the message of the Bible but always in the light of their growth, development, and experience. An examination of material for 1969-70 on the theme Church will illustrate the unified principle.

In the first quarter, primaries, juniors, and intermediates will be studying the expansion of the church throughout the world through the efforts of Paul. In April, May, June all will be studying worship. In July, August, September, they will be studying beliefs of the church. Through the unified approach each department will be studying at its own speed and level of difficulty.

While allowing for needed diversity, the unified plan does encourage common teacher preparation for the three departments. It also encourages family worship. The Family Worship magazine contains guides based on the Graded Series, and is designed to help at this point.

In April, May, June 1970, when all three children’s departments are studying worship, it may be helpful for the whole congregation to explore the meaning and practice of worship. Currently, there is a revival of interest in worship in the Mennonite Church. The coming of the new Mennonite Hymnal has given real impetus to this.

In Mennonite Sunday schools we teach the Bible. We also teach persons. The Herald Graded Series tries to keep both in view. This is why the curriculum for children is unified rather than uniform.

Wit and Wisdom

One very optimistic minister had the habit in his opening prayer each Sunday of thanking God for the weather. On a particularly cold, icy, windy, slushy Sunday morning, the few people who ventured out wondered how the minister could possibly refer to the weather in his morning prayer with any sense of gratitude. To their surprise, he said in the beginning of his prayer, “Dear God, we thank Thee that Thou dost send so few Sundays like today.”

A little girl was explaining to her younger brother that it was wrong to work on Sunday.

“But what about policemen?” asked the little boy. “They have to work on Sundays. Don’t they go to heaven?”

“Of course not,” replied the sister. “They’re not needed there.”

A Voice from the Crowd
By Virgil Brenneman

I had never expected to be a part of a mass peace demonstration, particularly in Washington, D.C., but I was in the Mobilization crowd on Nov. 15. I still do not know quite what to do with a certain feeling of disillusionment which I have experienced since. I stayed on after other business in Washington partly because I was interested in seeing for myself what this was all about, more because I was interested in the Mennonite students who I knew were planning to be there. There was a breakfast meeting at which over 300 were present.

My involvement was primarily "conversation and witness." All day I circulated through that vast crowd interviewing scores of persons. I also carried a sign handed me by a delegation from a Mennonite congregation in Pennsylvania. The sign read, "Peace is the will of God." Many people I met agreed.

The size of the crowd was staggering. At least four times as many people came as the planners themselves had anticipated. The 250,000 persons officially allowed for and reported is an accurate accounting of the number of marchers on Pennsylvania Avenue.

But this figure ignores the additional 750,000 to one million persons who could not be accommodated in the line of march before the march permit expired. The crowd was so large that they did not know that the march was taking place. Taking a quarter of a million persons off the edge of it made so small a dent as not to be noticed. After waiting for three hours to get into the march, most of them assumed that the authorities had stopped or canceled it.

Those who could not join the march were finally told to move down the Mall toward the rally on the Washington Monument grounds. The crowd moved in a column over a city block wide and the flow lasted for at least three hours. At the end of two and a half hours, I looked down over the Mall from the top of a hill and the entire length of one mile was still covered with people.

The first radio broadcasts we heard during the rally announced the presence of 1.2 to 1.4 million persons. But by evening the official word kept the announcement only to the number who marched down Pennsylvania Avenue. Official Washington, whose helicopters hovered over the crowd all afternoon, should have known the facts but I feel they chose to suppress them.

The goodwill, good nature, and good humor as well as sportsmanship of the crowd was catching. They chanted and sang, "Give peace a chance"; they wore buttons saying "practice nonviolence," or other buttons which identified them as "effete snobs." Contrary to the accusations by the Administration and other officials, the Mobilization marches and rally were characterized by absolute nonviolence. There was more community, goodwill, and camaraderie than at our local county fair.

One policeman who had been on the Washington police force for 27 years told me it was one of the best crowds yet. The Mobilization people had their own marshals, all unarmed, identified only by an armband, to help keep order. Many of these were volunteers who were trained only the day before. But it was very effective. The most disruptive thing I saw was an angry young man carrying a sign in support of the war. But he did not get much response from that good-natured crowd.

In spite of the peaceful and nonviolent demonstration, official Washington chose to highlight and exploit two violent, though isolated incidents involving several hundred hardcore revolutionaries. These incidents happened at another time and place than the Mobilization activities, and we did not know about them until the news media reported them to the rest of the nation. Those two events did not reflect or represent the Mobilization crowd.

Contrary to the usual reports and to what I personally expected, the nonstudent participants equaled or outnumbered the student participants. Though students were the largest single group, they were not in the majority. The age and occupation range was more like a typical spectator crowd at a basketball game in our community.

There were whole families, retired businessmen, middle-class Americans, ordinary citizens, laborers, persons from the professions and trade occupations. There were whole delegations representing teachers’ organizations, churches, veterans of foreign wars who carried banners saying, “Veterans for Peace.”

There were delegations of Vietnam veterans, others representing labor unions, and still others representing a certain town or county. There were government employees and even employees from the Pentagon! I talked to nonstudents from Texas, Wisconsin, New York, Virginia, Kentucky, and Pennsylvania. Many persons told me, “Nixon said that the silent majority to which I belong supports his Vietnam policies. I cannot stay silent and continue to look as if I am supporting the war.”

A group not well represented—at least not very visible—were the black people. I talked to several—a girl from a New Jersey high school and to several Vietnam veterans. I saw several who served as peace marshals, and two small delegations. But for the most part, it was a white gathering. I am not sure how to interpret this.

Most of the difficulties I have arisen out of what I see as a failure of fair play and honesty on the part of officials in Washington. I am disturbed at what appears to be a calculated and deliberate attempt to discount the size and scope of the Mobilization crowd and destroy its nonviolent image. I am disturbed at what appears to be the suppression of the “right of dissent” in America.

Even as I sit here writing this, a newscast reports that officials from the Administration and Justice Department acknowledge that they deliberately fabricated the charge that the plans for the Mobilization and Moratorium activities were formed in a communist meeting in Sweden last July. These officials reported that this was done in order to discourage people from participating. The Justice Department official went on to say that they were justified in doing this. I am not promoting participation in the Mobilization activities as much as I am moved to defend it because I feel strongly about defending the “right of dissent” in America.

I am also disturbed to think that the radicals can use this occasion to say “violence is the only way in which one can be heard, and the only way to bring about change.” The authorities appear to have proved this by choosing to ignore 800,000 to one and a quarter million people of goodwill who demonstrated peacefully, and instead choose to highlight two violent incidents which were not related to the Mobilization activities. We seem to forget that the militant blacks who condone violence have said that peaceful and nonviolent methods were ineffective or ignored in their effort to gain equal rights with whites. If there is acceleration of violence, will the Administration be willing to accept its share of responsibility?

I have some real doubts as to the value of a mass demonstration at this juncture in our national life except for the value it may have for those who have participated, if for no other reason than that officials have suppressed or even distorted the facts. The world or nation will never feel the impact of an honest desire for peace expressed by such a vast multitude. Americans will likely only become more polarized. There are of course a million “witnesses” returning to their communities. In our community, those who have returned have already in one week shared their experiences in churches, schools, and before civic groups.

There must be other and more effective ways to work for peace by all who are concerned about peace than through mass demonstrations. If being “silent” joins us with a majority that supports a policy of war, then we must find ways to break our silence. If we are silent and do nothing, those who participate in mass type demonstrations can be expected to use a quote borrowed from D. L. Moody: “We like our way of doing it better than your way of doing nothing.” The Christian peacemakers, those whom Jesus called blessed, must concern themselves about these issues.

Even though I have real doubts as to whether the effectiveness of the Mobilization activities warrants the efforts and costs involved, I feel quite comfortable with my own involvement. I believe the Christian witness needs to be heard in movements like these as a distinct witness from humanitarian or anti-establishment attitudes against the war. I witnessed to my faith with more persons in one day than I ever have before. It was easy to do because of our common antipathy to the war.

But what about the problem of being identified with those in the group who may have been violent revolutionaries, who carried Vietcong flags? I know that our missionaries and relief workers in Vietnam are troubled about their identification with the U.S. Military. I shared this question with a Christian I met in the crowd. She replied, “But you must not forget Jesus’ parable of the tares which the devil sowed in the field of wheat. You cannot ask to remove or suppress these without doing damage to the rest of us.”
A Message from the Consultation on Conscience and Conscription

In this first annual Peace Assembly called by the newly structured Peace Section of the Mennonite Central Committee, we have struggled together with the issues of Christian conscience and conscription. Though keenly aware of a wide divergence of experience and convictions in our group, we also sense a deep bond of Christian fellowship and love, and a common uneasiness of conscience about the militarism and conscription of our society.

Gathered as a consultative body, we unite in addressing the following concerns to the Mennonite and Brethren in Christ churches in the United States and Canada, as well as to other groups and persons.

I. We reaffirm our commitment to the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ as revealed in the Scriptures. It is our primary allegiance to Christ and His kingdom from which we develop our witness to the love of God, neighbor, and enemy throughout the world as the essence of Christian living. We affirm our Anabaptist view of the church and of Christian discipleship. This view emphasizes a continuing testimony of word and deed joined in a life style of Christian brotherhood, as a witness to the redeeming love of Christ and against all militarism and war. (See A Declaration of Christian Faith and Commitment, Winona Lake, 1950.)

II. We affirm that war is sin. It is contrary to God’s will for all men.

A. Yet militarism is rampant in our society, permeating the social and economic systems.

B. While some among us have accepted service within the armed forces, such service seems clearly unacceptable as a Christian response. We are nevertheless ready to continue ministering to such persons in their situation.

III. We affirm that conscription, as an integral part of the military system, violates the essential freedom of each person. This evil should be abolished along with the military system which it supports. When the government persists in military conscription, the church should make clear that it is not responsible for the operation and administration of the conscription system. Objecting to all war, we cannot identify with those who call for a voluntary or mercenary army as an acceptable alternative to military conscription.

IV. Conscientious objection to military service represents the clearest continuation of our tradition and the majority belief of our brotherhood today about radical discipleship to Christ in relating to war. We urge particular attention to an understanding of Christian vocation, discerned within the admonishing brotherhood, as a basis for our response to the issues of militarism and conscription.

A. As Christians we acknowledge a calling that transcends the demands of government. Out of such a sense of Christian vocation, the young people of our churches should voluntarily offer service as an expression of discipleship. When the government recognizes it, such service may be offered to meet draft requirements.

Many of us feel that church agencies should, without violating their Christian integrity, restudy their personal policies in regard to the possibility of providing more latitude in accepting for service programs those persons who do not share fully the conventional convictions on doctrinal statements and certain practices. Most would urge church agencies to aid all conscientious objectors in finding suitable channels for alternative or voluntary service.

B. Though for some, conscripted civilian service in earning positions is a proper expression of Christian vocation, for many others it has become so routine as no longer to call for a serious moral decision of discipleship and also so routine as to have largely lost its symbolic value in witnessing against war. We question such routine and easy response as an acceptable form of Christian service.

C. We recognize noncooperation with military conscription as a valid expression of nonconformity and peace-making. For many the confrontation with the moral decision has given new vitality to their commitment to radical discipleship and to their witness against war. The church should help them in making their decisions; nourish them in their faith; minister to them with literature, counsel, and encouragement; and provide financial assistance where needed in event of prosecution, imprisonment, and other costs of discipleship.

D. Others find neither prison nor alternative service

according to God's will for them. As evidence of their conscientious objection to military service they choose to migrate to a place where they can worship and serve in freedom from the system of military conscription. The Canadian and United States churches should join these persons in brotherly support and help them to determine where God calls them to establish new communities and how best to maintain their faith and witness in the new location.

E. Should the government continue to conscript, we would urge that exemption from military service be extended both to those whose conscientious objection to war is not on religious grounds and to those whose conscientious objection is only to particular wars. We extend our facilities to help such persons, who call on us, find meaningful alternative service assignments.

V. Since the burden of objection to war and militarism is the responsibility of the entire brotherhood and not only of the young who face the possibility of conscription, we appeal to every member in our congregations to join in witness against these evils and in witness to the redeeming love of Christ, through prayerful selection of occupation, the sacrificial use of money, the rejection of high standards of living made possible by a warfare economy, rejection of the modern idolatry of nationalism, participation in some form of voluntary service, and the use of appropriate means to change the systems which support the continuation of militarism and nationalism.

Christian obedience to the gospel of love and reconciliation is an obligation that never ends. We confess that we too easily neglect the application of it to militarism in our countries unless we are personally involved. Confessing our weakness and ineffectiveness and moved by the danger of our time to humanity itself, we ought to be gripped by a new sense of urgency to work for peace. We send this message in the name of the Prince of Peace and the hope to which all Christians are called.

Side by Side

By Doug Hostetter

Two children were killed by my house last night;
Two women were dressed in black.
Two rifles were found in the ditch by their side;
Two flags were found in their pack.

But the color of skin and the stain in the sand
Were the same as they lay by the street,
And the Russian-made holes looked no different to me than those made by the M-16.

One lay to the East and one to the West
In their struggle, their life, and their death,
But as the sun rose in its earliest rays
It appeared they lay side by side.

Missions Today
Is Born Again

By Jim Bishop

Most of us have had occasion to pause and reflect on persons or inanimate objects that have been an integral part of our lives. After they are taken from us, we eventually get around to contemplating what these persons or things have done to help shape our personality. As an example on a superficial level, I recall the doughnuts the snack shop served at Eastern Mennonite College. There was something special about their taste that I can’t quite place, yet they left a definite impression on me! Now that I've graduated, they are no longer available, which is perhaps a good thing.

It might be interesting to attempt to poll to determine how many persons now in church-related service, either domestic or foreign, were challenged to a certain extent to consider this type of assignment through a regular reading of Missions Today, for many years a regular feature of Gospel Herald. It might also be interesting to surmise how many regular readers have noticed that this column hasn’t appeared within these pages since Apr. 1, 1969. One might ask how many persons would welcome its return.

Missions Today grew out of a mission editorial in the church news pages of Gospel Herald written by Levi C. Hartzler, secretary for Information Services at Mennonite Board of Missions from 1953 to 1959. Hartzler, who left the Board in 1959 to enter the teaching profession, turned his pen over to J. D. Graber with the Sept. 22 issue of that year.

In October 1959 the missions editorial gave way to the "Missions Today" banner. Graber kept it waving high on a regular basis for eight years until his resignation as secretary for Overseas Missions in mid-1967. Boyd Nelson, secretary for Information Services, picked up responsibilities for the column at that point and contributed to it as time permitted. In June 1969 he began a one-year leave of absence for graduate study. For want of another columnist, Missions Today starved itself out of existence.

Now Missions Today makes its reappearance at the outset of a new year and a new decade. At a time when many individuals see themselves opening a new chapter in their lives, likewise this column will embark on a bold new venture. Each week a different Mennonite Board of Missions’ administrative secretary or field worker will be invited to contribute brief statements of personal insight and concern. Missions Today will hopefully become a "sounding board" to share what's happening — and what could be happening but isn’t — on the cutting edge of the Mennonite Church’s missions and service programs.

The Draft Lottery: An Explanation of a Stopgap Move

By Walton Hackman

On Nov. 19 the winds of draft reform began blowing. Congress passed a one sentence bill which repealed the prohibition in the 1967 Military Selective Service Act that prevented the president from establishing a random selection method for drafting young men for military service.

The action taken by Congress, to permit the development of the draft “lottery,” was in itself rather inconsequential. The establishment of a random selection method will by no means eliminate all of the inequities in the present draft system. However, to persuade Congress to pass this abbreviated bill giving the president the option of changing the selection method, the administration had to make a “deal” which would allow the Congress to hold full-scale hearings on the draft.

Although the present draft law does not expire until June 30, 1971, the Senate Armed Services Committee has already announced plans to get such hearings under way by April 1970. With all the restrictions removed, the president took immediate action to amend the Selective Service regulations in such a way as to establish the procedures for instituting a random selection system; these amendments became effective on Nov. 26, 1969.

On Monday, Dec. 1, 1969, in a way quite reminiscent of the 1940 Franklin D. Roosevelt fishbowl drawings, plastic capsules into which slips of paper had been inserted were drawn from an oversized glass beaker by members of the Selective Service Youth Advisory group. For the young men being drafted, this idea of the random selection process appears to be a new innovation; to their fathers it is simply the regression to an old way. The drawing of the dates from a glass bowl has produced the nickname of the draft “lottery.” This term is somewhat misleading since the names of registrants are not drawn from the bowl but instead it is the process by which the dates of the calendar are randomly ordered. In a similar way the random ordering of the letters of the alphabet is determined.

The random selection calendar and alphabet for 1970 will affect all young men between the ages of 19 and 26 who have not fulfilled their service obligations. Each of these men has been given a number. Those whose birthday was drawn first received the number one, or highest priority, and so on through 366. Beginning on Jan. 1, 1970, young men will be called according to the dates established by this randomly ordered calendar. It is quite likely that men whose birth dates fall on the first 120 dates of the calendar will undoubtely be drafted to fill the 1970 draft call.

During 1970 about 850,000 men will be in the draft pool. These are men who have not yet filled their military service obligation and do not have deferments or exemptions. It is anticipated that about 290,000 men will enlist during 1970 which leaves only about 560,000 to take their chances with the lottery; of these, less than half will be drafted. The Pentagon estimates that the draft call for 1970 will be about 250,000.

Since the new selection method allows a young man to know if he might possibly be drafted, it is quite likely that more persons will voluntarily enlist. This will help to reduce the youth protest against the draft which was one of the administration’s objectives in promoting this aspect of the draft reform.

1970 will be the year of transition from the induction of the oldest first to the youngest first. The presidential order states that: “The random selection method will use 366 days to represent the birthdays (month and day only) of all registrants who, prior to Jan. 1, 1970, shall have attained their 19th year of age but not their 26th.”

Every registrant in this age range will be given a priority according to the 1970 scrambled calendar. Even though a young man may presently be deferred, his priority will nonetheless be determined by the 1970 order of birth dates as established by Selective Service on Dec. 1, 1969. When a registrant's deferment lapses or expires, even though it may be several years later, the registrant will then be placed into the pool of eligible men for one year and will assume the priority number which was determined earlier.

For example, a young man who reached his birthday before Dec. 31, 1969, will be given a priority number from the 1970 random calendar. Since the registrant has a II-S deferment as a college freshman, he will not be placed in the pool of eligible men for 1970 but will be deferred until his graduation or until he drops out of college. At that point he will be placed in the "first priority selection group" for one year. In that group he will assume the priority established in 1970.

In addition to a scrambled calendar, a scrambled alphabet has also been established to determine alphabetically the random selection sequence according to the first letter of the last name of those registrants who have the same birth date. In the case of two registrants, Jones and Varner for example, both having the same birth date, according to the scrambled alphabet sequence, Jones would be called before Varner.

Each year new random calendars and alphabet sequences will be determined. However, beginning in 1971 those registrants who reach their nineteenth birth date between Jan. 1, 1970, and Dec. 31, 1970, will be placed in the "lottery". Also included in the 1971 pool of eligible registrants will be those whose deferments have lapsed or expired.

Under the new system, the order of call will not be significantly altered. Each local board in filling its quota will have as its first priority for induction, delinquent registrants (delinquent in their responsibility to the law) and also those volunteering for induction. If there are not enough men in either of these two categories to fill the quota of the local board, then registrants from the lottery (the first priority selection group) for involuntary induction will be selected.

The purpose of the new procedure for drafting men is to call the youngest first rather than the oldest first. This procedure, linked with one year of prime eligibility, is intended to "result in a predictable draft-age period for each young man." In addition, the president has asked Selective Service to make provisions so that each registrant may take an armed forces physical examination "at the earliest feasible time" in order to determine whether the registrant would physically qualify for induction. Reducing the registrant's vulnerability to the draft from seven years to one year is intended to make it possible for the registrant to plan his life.

Most would agree that limiting the registrant's vulnerability to one year provides the young man with a greater opportunity to "plan his life." Few, however, would agree that the new provisions have produced a much more equitable Selective Service System. The inequities of the deferment system continue. One individual responded to the idea of a random selection draft as being somewhat like an automated electric chair which was programmed in such a way that no one needed to pull the switch. It was this person's opinion that the "lottery" was a way of depersonalizing the selection and did not necessarily make it more equitable but only left to chance what could not be satisfactorily administered otherwise.

Many would agree that little has changed with the whole Selective Service System. This is essentially true since basically only one small facet of a very large and complex system has been altered. While the presidential amendments to the Selective Service regulation were promoted as "a major step in removing inequities in the draft," the changes really are little more than a stopgap move to quiet youth's dissent on the draft and the war.

Old Scarecrow and the Cows

By Robert Moon

Just suppose there were one hundred and fifty million cows in America. Let's suppose there is an industry doing a great business selling a certain kind of hay. This hay, called Old Scarecrow, while made entirely from locoweed, is alluringly described as a blend of old straw aged in the cornfield. As a result, cows by the millions turn from their sober diet of alfalfa and begin chewing Old Scarecrow.

Now let's suppose that this stuff makes the cows do silly things, such as running into barbed-wire fences, jumping off bridges, or running into automobiles — so much so that five hundred thousand are killed or injured every year. Suppose milk production is cut down because the users of Old Scarecrow lose fifty million "cow-days" a year.

Suppose the life expectancy of the cows who chew it regularly is reduced by an average of 12 percent. Suppose that it makes four million of the cows so sick that much of the time they are useless, and suppose that for every one that is cured, the industry makes ten more Old Scarecrow addicts. Suppose that caring for the victims of Old Scarecrow requires 80 percent of the farmer's time.

And now, just suppose that in spite of all this, the merchants of this fatal fodder are allowed to advertise the stuff in every pasture, so that on almost every fence there appear large pictures of contented "Cows of Distinction" munching away on Old Scarecrow. And suppose that the manufacturers of Old Scarecrow are making a tremendous profit out of all of this trouble and tragedy they cause the farmer.

How would you expect the farmers to take to all this? Would you expect them to take it sitting down? Or would you expect them to stand up and say to the producers of Old Scarecrow, "That ain't hay," and then put forth an effort to protect their cows by banning the advertising and promotion of Old Scarecrow from the range?

And now just suppose that you cared as much about your children and your fellowmen as you would expect the farmer to care about his cows! What do you suppose you would do about drinking?

The U.S. Supreme Court agreed to rule on the constitutionality of a 1967 law which allows individuals to halt the flow of "eroticly arousing" advertisements to their homes by simply asking the post office to stop it.

The law was passed in a response to public protests that mail-order houses were indiscriminately sending unwanted "pandering advertisements" for erotic material to householders and their children.

Under this law, the person deciding that the mail is "eroticly arousing or sexually provocative" to him, may inform the post office, who then instructs the advertiser to strike the complainant's name from the mailing list.

Failure to do this can lead to court action to enforce the order and eventual punishment for contempt of court.

Fourteen California companies, including some that specialize in mail-order sales of erotic material, attacked the law in a suit before a three-judge federal court in Los Angeles.

The companies complained that the law was vague and too broad, and that it violated a free speech right to distribute ideas through the mail. Furthermore, they said, it cost $5 to remove each name from the mailing list, and they had received thousands of names for removal after the law went into effect April 1968.

A high school student who was suspended from school briefly for talking about God during his lunch hour has been given legal assurance that he was "within his constitutional rights.

In a formal opinion to the Washington High School principal, Dr. Robert Callahan, Alameda County Counsel Richard Moore ruled that Steven Minden was not violating principles of separation of church and state when he discussed religion with classmates over lunch.

The suspension of the 18-year-old student had caused widespread controversy. Local newspapers and radio and television stations headlined the story, while various church groups and individuals rallied to his support.

The incident began when a faculty member overheard Steven "witnessing Christ" with several classmates on the school lawn. He reported the incident to the school principal.

Dr. Callahan had allegedly asked Steven, "Will you stop these discussions or do I have to suspend you?"

When Steven told the principal that he "couldn't honestly make such a promise, since God is the most important thing in his life, he was "sent home to discuss the matter with his parents." A school district spokesman emphasized that the boy was not "dismissed."

A Louisville minister and his wife were among six civilians and three soldiers jailed in connection with a Meade County probe of an anti-war coffeehouse at Muldraugh, which is frequented by Army personnel from nearby Fort Knox.

The coffeehouse has been the scene of war-protest activities since early September. Its operators claim they have been harassed by local officials whom they did not identify.

The Rev. Terrence H. Davis, pastor of Louisville's Grace-Hope Presbyterian Church; his wife, Kathleen; Spec. 1 Thomas Allen Jackson, of Ft. Knox, who lives in an apartment above the coffeehouse with his wife, and child, and Miss Susan Schermerhorn and Donald Rodes, both of Louisville, were held in lieu of $1,500 bond each.

The chairman of the Kentucky Civil Liberties Union, Mrs. Suzanne Post of Louisville, said the grand jury and Judge Board appear to represent "the willful and blatant effort by some officials to suppress and nullify the constitutional right of free expression and assembly.

"If so, it is more than simply an irresponsible act, but part of a conspiracy to deprive those with an unpopular point of view of their civil rights," she said.

The coffeehouse operators claim the establishment has been fire-bombed twice — on Oct. 9 and 31. Damage was slight both times.

A spokesman, who declined to identify himself, said authorities weren't notified of the second reported fire-bombing "Because we have no law enforcement here. They didn't do anything about the last fire."

A national commission has warned of an escalating risk of conspiratorial assassinations in America, not only for President, but for other officeholders, civil rights leaders, and political interest groups.

The panel, formally named the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence, was established by President Johnson in 1968 after the assassinations of Sen. Robert F. Kennedy and Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

In its sixth report to the White House, the commission urged that the President and candidates in a presidential campaign forgo traditional outdoor political rallies, and establish a new pattern of television campaigning.

It also recommended that the Secret Service extend its coverage to all public figures who could become targets of violence. The commission expressed concern that Negroes holding public office might increasingly become targets for assassinations by both white and black extremists.

Rex Kern, quarterback for unbeaten Ohio State and a leading candidate to win All-American and Heisman Trophy honors, extends his leadership talents beyond the football field.

Deeply religious, he is considered a "prime mover" in the current establishment of a Fellowship of Christian Athletes chapter on campus.

An interview by Paul Hornung of The Sporting News, the national sports newspaper, revealed some of the inner dimensions of Mr. Kern's personality and convictions.

To the questions, "Do you read the Bible very much?" and "Do you have a favorite passage from the Bible?" the football star replied:

"Yes, I read it every night before I go to bed and I'm also reading both translations of the Modern English Handbook now and the Bible, and then I have the Upper Room devotions in the morning.

"Well, the favorite that I have is 1 John 1:9, where the Bible says if we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and cleanse us from all unrighteousness."

Mr. Kern has never been "reticent" in talking about his religion or professing belief in Christ.

Teenagers would not start smoking — or could kick the cigarette habit more readily — if persons having authority and influence, notably teachers and physicians, set a better example.

A study discloses that teenagers are 50 percent more likely to smoke if their parents and teachers smoke — but it also revealed they are 100 percent more likely to take up the habit if their peer group — friends, young relatives — smoke.

Strangely enough, according to a survey of American youth sponsored by the American Cancer Society, whether his parents smoke or not is not a determining factor in a young person's decision to smoke.

Rapport with his parents is a much more important influence in a teenager's decision on smoking. "A teenager is less apt to smoke if he has good rapport with his parents and they smoke than if his parents don't smoke but he has had rapport with them," the report noted.
A Nutrition Conference Turns Into a Hunger Conference

By Delton Franz

It was planned as a nutrition conference but ended up as a hunger conference.

The three-day White House Conference on Food, Nutrition, and Health, convened at Washington's swank Park-Sheraton Hotel, was attended by 3,000 invited delegates. At least twice that many had demanded the right to attend. The invitations to nutritionists, academics, health technicians, and food industry executives who were invited left out the poor—Blacks, Indians, Mexican-Americans—who are most affected by hunger.

Senate investigations and the hearings on hunger conducted by Senator McGovern had clearly documented the extensive degree of hunger and malnutrition in the U.S. Growing public and congressional sentiment called for eliminating this unnecessary scourge in the midst of plenty.

The administration had to come up with a convincing presidential message on "Hunger in America." The White House Conference conceived last May was not intended, however, to focus on the sensitive issues of poverty-caused hunger so much as the more refined subject of nutrition. But the minorities and the poor would not be put off.

Three hundred poor people were finally invited, shortly before the conference began. Poverty organizations had challenged the administration’s ignoring representation from the hungry in a conference related to hunger. Conference delegates representing the hungry of Appalachia, blacks of Mississippi, and the Navaho Indians of Arizona challenged much more during the course of the conference itself. The $18 per day meal tickets provided delegates at the plush hotel conference setting were an embarrassment to the several hundred poor, whose families and friends back home had no more than $18 per meal. The tickets were returned by many who preferred to eat a can of pork and beans in the hotel lobby.

Their presence, moreover, was decisive in moving the affluent delegates to virtually unanimous support of a strong five-point recommendation dealing more with the gut issues of real hunger than with the refinements of national nutritional standards.

The conference’s five-point priority recommendation, submitted to President Nixon, calls for:

1. Declaration of hunger as a national emergency, to be immediately responded to this winter with a crash program of food assistance. The president was urged to use the Disaster Relief Act to implement this request.

2. Eventual establishment of a $5,500 annual income guarantee for families of four. The figure was based on the calculations by the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the cost of providing the basic necessities for a family of four.

3. Substantial enlargement of existing federal food programs, with free food stamps for those with incomes of less than $100 a month for a family of four. No family should have to pay more than 20 percent of its income for food.

4. Free school lunches and breakfasts to all preschool, elementary, and secondary school children.

5. The transfer of food program administration from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, and local administration of programs by the poor.

What has been the president's response? It now appears that the administration will go slow on most of the requests made by the White House Conference. The president will release a full report, as his response to the conference, by Christmas. Whether the administration will make serious effort to implement stronger food programs for the poor will depend largely on the extent of the push from the public. Mr. Nixon has promised to expand the current food-stamp program to cover 307 counties that do not have them, though he does not possess authority to accomplish this by executive order. The president also ordered the fastest possible implementation of an increase in food-stamp levels from $65 to $106 a month for a family of four.

The president's previously proposed Family Assistance Plan, which would place a minimum income floor of $1,600 for every family of four, should also be recognized as an indication of his interest in eliminating poverty. While this amount is far from the $5,500 recommended by the White House Conference, it does at least come as the first major presidential proposal dealing with welfare reform.

What should be the response of the religious community to this national shame and moral wrong—hunger in the midst of a land overflowing with milk and honey?

As an unofficial delegate, sitting in with the Religious Action Task Force, the writer took special note of the principal recommendation to the churches:

"The chief task of the religious communities is to call upon our constituencies to exert their influence on shifting this nation’s priorities toward the elimination of poverty-caused hunger. The influence of the religious communities can be brought to bear on the legislative process in the reform and expansion of present programs."

A noteworthy example is the excellent Food Stamp Bill passed by the Senate (S. 2547). A similar bill is needed in the House Agriculture Committee. Seven out of the ten congressmen representing the most populous "Mennonite districts" voted against an increased food-stamp program for the hungry last year while supporting increased funding of the war in Vietnam.

Is part of our Christian response to hunger to communicate to congressmen the moral responsibility of our society to assure every child an adequate diet? Are we accountable for the stewardship practiced by our government in the use of our tax money?

Meanwhile the effects of decades of inferior education, economic exploitation, and lack of employment opportunities continue to leave ten million citizens in perpetual poverty. One mother told the Citizen's Committee on Hunger:

"There was no food in the house and I didn’t want them to go to school hungry and then come home hungry too. I felt that if I kept them home with me, at least when they cried and asked for a piece of bread I would be with them and could put my arms around them."

Innovations on Disc 19

During the month of January a new disc of minute radio messages will be sent from Mennonite Broadcasts, Inc., to stations across the country. This disc, No. 19 in the Family Service Spot series, will continue to concentrate on family relationships. The specific issue this time will be sex and the trouble it can make between husband and wife. The idea behind these minute messages is that too few people ever hear a direct and honest discussion of this subject and that it might help to build stronger family relationships if they did hear. Also, new with Disc 19 are several technical changes such as a smaller size; the inclusion of 30-second spots instead of only 60; and a newly designed, attractive and informative package. These changes are intended to make the disc more attractive to station personnel.

Latin American Youth Visit North America

Toting guitars, violin, accordion, and Spanish-English dictionary, five Latin-American youth are expected to have arrived in Chicago on Dec. 30 for a six-week tour of Mennonite churches, communities, and schools in North America.

The team, comprising three fellows and two girls representing Mennonites in Argentina, Uruguay, and Brazil, spent four days in orientation and program preparation with Cecil and Margaret Ashley in Sao Paulo State, Brazil. The Ashleys originally proposed the idea of an exchange in 1967 and the idea grew to encompass a team from South as well as North America.

The North American team will visit South America in June and July 1970.

The exchange, jointly sponsored by the Department of Youth Ministry, Scottsdale, Pa., and the Voluntary Service office of Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart, Ind., is intended as a church to church encounter both as a fraternal contact and as providing a new understanding of youth involvement in the total life of the church: involved as "missioners" and as supporters of mission.

The itinerary for the team lists visits to churches and communities in Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, Washington, Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Missouri, Iowa, Ontario, and Puerto Rico. The major cost of the exchange will be borne by the Mennonite Youth Convention to be held at Lake Junaluska, N.C., in August 1970. Church and youth meets with the team as well as the team members' own congregations will contribute toward the exchange cost which is expected to be $1,000 per team member.

Kenneth Seitz, Jr., of the VS office is coordinator for the team's visit in North America.

Requests Outstrip Supply

The new 1970 calendars produced by Mennonite Broadcasts have been so eagerly taken advantage of by pastors that a reprint of an additional 5,000 copies was necessary. Orders from 179 pastors have called for over 19,000 calendars. An additional 8,000 calendars will be sent to persons replying to the offer of a free calendar on The Mennonite Hour. Pastors are giving calendars to community people they would not otherwise meet. Others are distributing them to their church members encouraging them to give calendars as gifts. Many report that each December people are eager to receive their new calendars and do appreciate the Christian message that comes with each one.

Mass Communications Annual Meet

The annual meeting of the Mennonite Council on Mass Communications is scheduled for Washington, D.C., on Jan. 26. The most significant of the planned sessions will be a 1:00 p.m. workshop on creative radio broadcasting. This session will be of special interest to pastors and other individuals involved in local radio programs. Rev. Clement Lee, Media Relations Director for the American Bible Society, will direct this session with an emphasis on making the best use of radio time for contemporary communication of the gospel. There will be discussion on various practical alternatives to the traditional religious format.

Also featured on the program will be the 1969 S. F. Coffman Lecture at 10:45 a.m. presented by LeRoy Kennel, associate professor of communication at Bethany Theological Seminary (Church of the Brethren), Oak Brook, Ill. The lecture is an evaluation of mass media, and particularly television. At 7:00 p.m., a conjoint session is planned with the Adult Council and Reference Committee. Discussions will center on the influence and relationship between mass media and Christian education.

This MCMC meeting was scheduled with the idea of allowing Mennonite representa-

Laurelville Mennonite Church Center offers a unique weekend, Feb. 6-8, with Paul G. Landis, denominational leader and area bishop in Lancaster Mennonite Conference, and Chester L. Wenger, of the department of home missions in Lancaster Mennonite Conference.

The focus will be on questions such as: What will be the church's best response to the changing needs in today's world? What should be the shape of the congregation's program, mission, and message? What is God's word and God's way for today?

Latin American Evangelization Congress

Nine hundred delegates from more than twenty countries in Latin America and the U.S., gathered in Bogota, capital city of Colombia, Nov. 21-29, 1969, at the invitation and courtesy of sponsoring organizations, particularly the Billy Graham Association. The very fact that a gathering of this type could meet in this beautiful city of two million is noteworthy, for twenty years ago it would have been impossible. Colombia was the South American country most closed to the gospel, with open persecution in the form of church burning and martyrdom during the forties, when more than 100 pastors and believers were murdered by religious fanatics.

This has changed, and in this city visited earlier this year by the pope the evangelicals with the congress delegates paraded through the main streets and filled the large Plaza Bolivar for a worship service.

Eighteen of us came from Honduras, representing nine different groups. Sixteen Mennonites were present from the Dominican Republic, Puerto Rico, Honduras, Colombia, Costa Rica, Paraguay, Uruguay, and Argentina. Every part of the religious spectrum of evangelical Protestantism was present from fervent Pentecostals to liturgical Episcopalians. Some beards and "long hairs" were there, too, with Bibles under their arms.

In making possible this gathering the sponsors did not seek to impose any imported type of atmosphere on the meetings, but rather let the Spirit guide. There were fiery Pentecostal sermons (with one instance of tongues' manifestation) and solid exegetical studies by Plymouth Brethren and others. Latin America has many dynamic evangelical leaders, and the most gifted of them were present. Following the messages we divided into workshops to discuss the message and its implications on our work.

So much was given us that it will take time for it all to be absorbed. But there are many things that should be told, and we want to give a resume of the congress.

Evangelization. This, of course, was the theme and purpose of the congress. It was emphasized that old forms are not necessarily pertinent today, and we must be fit to the leading of the Spirit who may guide in new ways. In the messages we were told the theology, philosophy, and strategy of evangelism. Yet it is the Pentecostals, who perhaps don't know much about any of these points, who are reaching the masses. Christ sent the church into the world, while too often the church waits in vain for the world to come to it.

Charisma. The charismatic movement in Latin America is more than a mere curiosity. Although the Pentecostal groups predominate, the gifts of the Spirit, especially speaking in tongues, has crossed all denominational lines. I was especially interested in the testimony of a Mennonite pastor from Argentina who speaks of the gift within himself and also in many members of the congregation. Most of the speaking is done within the person, as a silent prayer would be — a new thought to me.

Fellowship. In the many different expressions of faith represented, all sought unity in love. The Latin is much more expressive in this love than a mere formal handshake. Often there were embraces, tears, cheek patting, and a raising of hands in praise to God as brethren met and rejoiced in Christian love. The Christian salvation was here expressed as coming from a genuine love of the Lord and of the brethren.

Future. The resolution adopted by the congress proposes another Latin American Congress in 1976. In the meantime the six regions into which the Latin work has been divided (U.S., Mexico and Central America, Caribbean, etc.), will plan for their respective regional congresses — a different one in each region each year.

The statement also noted the necessity of dialogue with Catholics, on a personal level. It was noted that a change of posture and new forms do not necessarily indicate a change of doctrine. Evangelicals in Latin America, therefore, are still suspicious of official Catholicism, although love and interest in the individual has always existed, for of such the church has been built.

The Mennonite group met together a number of times for fellowship and exchange. It was decided to suggest that the next Latin American Mennonite Congress meet in 1972 instead of 1971, in Monte-video just prior to World Congress which will meet in nearby Brazil. I am sure I express the nearly unanimous opinion of the delegating in saying that our vision has been enlarged, our responsibility increased, and our appreciation enlarged for those who made this congress possible.

—James R. Hess.

Additional VS Personnel Needed

Voluntary Service, unlike other mission and service programs operated by Mennonite Board of Missions, is uniquely dependent on a continuous flow of incoming personnel. Reduce this flow to a trickle, and many VS units begin to dry up.

"Securing an adequate number of married couples continues to be our most pressing problem," John Lehman of the personnel department said. "Most of our units cannot operate efficiently without couples to assume the leadership positions as program director and hostess."

Clare Schumun, placement counselor for VS, indicated a desperate need for couples at Mantua, Maumee, and Cleaveland in Ohio; Englewood, Chicago; and Kansas City, Mo. Carlsbad, N.M., was opened in November.

"We can also offer immediate openings for single girls and fellows," Schumun said. "Portland, Ore., provides an opportunity to work with pre-delinquent youth in a club and recreation program. A kindergarten assignment in Surprise, Ariz., will soon be available, and, of course, nurse aides, LPN's, and RN's are always in demand at various locations."

Single fellows might consider the following positions: a relief houseparent assignment with various small groups of slow-learning students at Adriel School, West Liberty, Ohio; directing inner-city programs with the Detroit, Mich., unit; or sponsoring club and recreation programs.
London at Fifty

The Leathermans are not really going to retire. They'll be moving to Cheam Surrey 12 miles south of London to, as Quintus stated, "live out the shadow of the Centre." Quintus and his wife Miriam went to England in 1952 under sponsorship of Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart, to develop a centre for Mennonites living in London — a centre which was also to provide for some type of Christian witness.

The vision of the possibilities for a centre increased as the Leathermans spent 18 months searching for a suitable house to establish a permanent witness. On the streets they encountered many overseas students who similarly could not find suitable accommodation.

The November issue of The Christian Herald carried my article on the future of the church in Vietnam. The exact title and the pictures were selected by the editor. An AP (Associated Press) summary release on the article appeared in various parts of the country. In a number of places local newspapers carried only parts of the release and used headlines which distorted or reversed the main points of the article.

The article reviewed the history of the church in Vietnam. Most of the Protestant missionaries from the major mission group working in Vietnam have identified closely with U.S. military and political goals. They have utilized military assistance to a very considerable extent. Some relief personnel also have followed a similar pattern.

In contrast, there are relief and mission personnel who are concerned about the needs of all the Vietnamese and are witnessing to the spiritual kingdom which transcends national and political boundaries.

The article presents this growing concern among many Christians about the image of the church which is being portrayed in Vietnam by some Western Christian workers and periodic visitors who give their blessing to the war.

In view of the questions which have been raised I felt some clarification would be helpful. It is gratifying to note that in some cases where distorted releases appeared fellow Mennonites recognized the error and attempted to correct the interpretation. — Atlee Beechy

MCC TAP to Enter Jamaica in August

Mennonite Central Committee is planning to enter the island of Jamaica, on invitation from its Ministry of Education, with a Teachers Abroad Program in August. Approval for this action was given by the executive committee at its December meeting after hearing a report and recommendations from Arthur Driedger, MCC director for Latin America.

A Caribbean island, Jamaica is about a hundred miles long and fifty miles wide, and lies ninety minutes from the tip of Florida. In 1962 it gained its independence from Britain. Black, brown, and white folks work and worship together, but blacks predominate by a large majority.

Driedger made a November visit to Kingston, the capital, which followed up earlier meetings Atlee Beechy and Robert Kreider made with the Ministry of Education to lay plans for the TAP program.

In an interview with the Minister of Education, Driedger learned that Jamaican school enrollment tripled in the past seven years, and many national teachers are leaving the country for better-paying jobs. In addition to a 3.5 percent annual population increase, another reason for the need of teachers is the recent enforcement of the compulsory school attendance law.

Presently the greatest need for teachers is in the Junior Secondary level—grades 7 to 9—in the subjects of mathematics, sciences, physical education, music, and industrial arts. Almost all the schools are church-operated, receiving financial support from the government. A few of the newer schools are under the direct administration of the Ministry of Education.

Driedger recommended an initial contingent of six to ten TAP teachers to be placed with the Ministry of Education for assignment. It is hoped to recruit a professor in research to be assigned to the Mico College Research Council as professor in educational research. The principal of Mico College sees such a person as one who with knowledge of curriculum materials could be able to identify needs in the Jamaican educational system. He would also serve as director or coordinator of the TAP Jamaica program.

Jamaica’s proximity to the U.S. and use of the English language in its schools make it likely for the TAP program there to get off the ground quickly.

Adirondack Camp Opens in New York

Three years ago the Mennonite people of New York state were interested in providing a church camp for the Mennonite children where they could attempt to broaden their Christian views and strengthen their Christian life. They formed a committee to examine this possibility.

Property on Beaver Lake, called Beaver Camp for Boys, located eighteen miles east of Lowville in the Number Four area, owned and operated by Mr. James Shapland, became available. The property was purchased in April 1969. The Mennonite churches were then canvassed for members interested in the project. To date there are seventy-eight members in the association. This camp is not financed by the church but rather by interested members.

In May 1969 the camp was officially opened by the directors who consisted of Homer Meyers, pres.; Nevin Lehman, vice-pres.; Joseph Widrick, treas.; Mrs. Esther Gingerich, sec.; Norman Zehr, Benjamin Yousey, Grant Guengerich, Bruce Klingelsmith, and Llewellyn Zehr. These families stayed at the camp for the weekend cleaning, repairing, and making plans for the summer. On June 27 Nevin Lehman and family of Beaver Falls, N.Y., moved to the camp for the summer as volunteer caretakers.

Every weekend the camp was occupied by Mennonite youth groups with planned programs. The first week 125 people were fed in the large mess hall. This included campers, counselors, cooks, and camp pastor. The second week one hundred people were accommodated.

Besides the main lodge on the property are Hemlock and Beechwood cottages which were equipped for housekeeping purposes and rented out to families through the summer. Other cabins used for the children were Red Pine, White Pine, the Shelter, Juniper, Cedar, and the boathouse.

Interested persons also cleared an area for trailers to be spotted for rental.

Construction Approved on Ranchi Bookstore

“Good Books Bookstore” in Ranchi, Bihar, India, will receive a total of $55,000 in financial assistance for construction of a new facility as a result of actions taken by the Executive and Overseas Committees meeting in Elkhart, Ind., Sept. 23.

A grant of $24,000 from the Christian Literature Fund had earlier been received which together with the appropriation of $28,300 from Mennonite Board of Missions will enable the project to get started.

The Ranchi Christian bookstore, founded in 1968 by missionaries Paul and Esther Kniss, serves a large Christian community in this industrial city of more than 100,000. Wilbert Shenk, secretary for Overseas Missions, notes that during a recent India-wide survey of all Christian bookstores and publishing interests, “Good Books” was cited as “one of the finest book retailing enterprises in India.”

Construction on the new bookstore will begin as soon as a lease can be signed, Shenk says. The present rented site has allowed no room for expansion, while the new facility will provide space for growth in sales and provide additional services to the Ranchi community and Christian churches throughout South Bihar.

Kniss, who first went to Bihar in 1950 with his wife Esther, divides his time managing the bookstore and assisting several growing congregations.

New Play to Be Published

Christmas Is Waiting, a short one-act play, by I. Merle Good, was produced by New York City-wide MYF, Dec. 13, 14. The premier production was directed by Good and given in the Willis Ave. Methodist Church, Bronx, N.Y.

Appearing in the cast were Al Kruse as Butch, Jesus Cruz as Frank, Gloria Constantin as Martha, and Maria Lugo as Nancy. As a sequel to the play, the audiences participated by reacting and interacting with the cast in discussion periods.

The project was a new one for City-wide MYF. They plan to do more work in the area of drama. One of the unique aspects of the experience was inviting the adults of the congregations to participate, and many did.

Christmas Is Waiting will likely be published in the spring of 1970, and then made available to church youth groups and other nonprofit organizations for production.
Book Fair Includes Mennonite Titles

Herald Press, Scottdale, Pa., was represented with three titles at the World Affairs Book Fair in New York City last month.

Coincidentally, all three books were written with the encouragement of the Mennonite Central Committee, as they touch on that agency’s ministries. The Herald Press books included: A House in Hue by Omar Eby, the Overseas Service Manual by Marian K. Preheim, and Soldiers of Compassion by Urie Bender. Bender’s book tells the story of Pax, men and service, around the world. Because of a mistaken classification the book was exhibited under “Military Affairs” which must have taken some viewers by surprise.

The World Affairs Book Fair, now in its 16th year, is visited by members of New York’s international community of ambassadorial, consular, and trade representatives, and United Nations personnel. During the time of the Fair at least two dozen national and international meetings and conferences included a seminar at the Fair in conjunction with their meeting. A growing number of persons, many from the UN, devote considerable time specifically to work with the books, for nowhere else can such a collection of titles be studied in one place.

Donald King, chaplain of Lebanon Community Hospital, Lebanon, Ore., in his monthly report stated: “Recently, one patient said he was greatly helped by the doctor to make a decision of Christian commitment when the doctor said, ‘I’ll be praying for you.’ We have many fine nurses who are doing excellent work with quality and care and a word of testimony of personal faith and interest in the patient’s spiritual needs.”

Robert Witmer, Paris, France, writes that the earlier diagnosis of plasmocytome has been ruled out by doctors as his ailment. “We are again carrying on a quite normal load of responsibilities. I often lag just a little longer in the morning and rest a bit at noon but I have no difficulty going beyond a 48-hour week.”

Roy Kreider, Ramat Hasharon, Israel, writes: “This year the Protestant community choir will be accompanied by 25 members of the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra, and the soloists are guests of the Israel Opera. We increasingly feel that this choir enables a unique telling of the Christmas and Easter message to the larger audience of Israelis than is afforded by any other method.”

Readers Say

Submissions to Readers Say column should comment on printed articles.

Thanks to you and Evelyn Mumaw for “Faith for Today” (Nov. 25 issue). . . . for the much needed ¢ of a fallacy in our thinking: “I believe in God because He is good to me—by my standards.”

What more selfish, human, or limited understanding of God can we have? Probably most of us are (or have been) guilty. Thanks again for serving us through the printed page. May God bless you with wisdom—and forgiveness.

Mrs. Dorese S. Miller, Greenwood, Del.

I, a youth who appreciates reading your weekly publication, am very happy to see more articles concerning the VS program appearing in one of the most prominent of our own church papers, the Gospel Herald. Lately, I tremendously appreciated two such articles. The first, in the Nov. 11 issue, by Esther Steckle, an ex-VS'er, I wholeheartedly sympathized and identified with her as she expressed some of her opinions, her own experiences, joys, and frustrations from her VS involvement. I think the VS program is excellent—but we must keep it excellent. Perhaps, as she suggested, this will involve a more careful screening of applicants before they are accepted into such an easy alternative topic of government-required military service. Perhaps then there would be fewer persons taking advantage of this alternative, and more persons who participate in the program, wholeheartedly supporting it and its objectives.

Another VS article which I really enjoyed, and which appeared only one week later (it was almost unbelievable!), was Roy Yoder’s article, VS Sticks with It. This account from an administrator’s point of view, and on a more optimistic note, challenged me to “stick with it” at home too (which is often less glamorous than if one is doing it on a service assignment). Equally satisfying interpersonal relationships can be achieved at home if we believe it and are dedicated enough to exert ourselves a bit. I think we as Mennonite young people must be tremendously grateful for such an organization where

The Chaco's Continuing Challenge

By Michael Mast

The shell of an ostrich egg capped a rugged post near our campfire. It caught my eye as the symbol of a way of life still quite strange to me after two years in the Argentine Chaco. The shell had one end broken out so that it served well as a drinking cup, but the edge remained jagged, lacking the beauty that a clever hand might have given it.

The house nearby was made of sticks and rough boards planted in the ground. The roof was constructed of grass and split palm tree trunks. There was no evident plan for beauty in the house's construction, nor did it even appear designed to withstand rainstorms or cold winter winds. The house stood alone in a small clearing. Spreading thornbushes threatened to destroy any hope of reviving the cultivation which had obviously been abandoned for several years.

Dedicated Leadership

The house and the small number of possessions scattered carelessly about us belonged to Guillermo Flores, a church leader among the relatively new Indian churches of the Formosa province in Northern Argentina. Guillermo was talking to Orlando Sanchez, an Indian evangelist who was accompanying me on this trip.

Orlando, from the Chaco province, was new to the area and Guillermo was giving him a bit of the history of the growth of the Indian church in the Chaco's northern neighbor. He told how for seven years he had dedicated himself to establishing churches among his fellow Indians. (There are now 17 affiliated churches in the Formosa province among the Toba and Pilaga Indians.) Many times he had traveled long distances, even hundreds of miles on foot. He often returned home to find a sad wife and hungry children.

My mind struggled to reconcile this picture of dedication with the other picture of lack of ambition exemplified in the physical surroundings. Orlando, like many other Indian leaders, had a similar history. He gave up trying to make a living for his family to dedicate himself to strengthening the churches. His work thus far has been very significant. He admits that his wife must look out for herself and her three children while he is gone.

These examples of dedication are not even expected of missionaries. Missionaries, with nicely furnished houses and steady support for their families, can get almost anywhere without unreasonable difficulty in a four-wheel-drive jeep. My wife, Mattie Marie, and our two-year-old son usually accompany me on trips, and when they stay home I know they are not in want. Orlando has only one or two years of schooling and seems quite content to identify with his people. Having studied the Bible from cover to cover makes him a successful evangelist at 28, but he can hardly expect wealth from that. Closer contacts with Orlando convince me that his faith is real.

Orlando baffled me earlier that day when we stopped at a police check. On entering the province of Formosa we were asked for our documents. Without hesitating he handed the police a document given by the church which states that he has been commissioned as an evangelist. It has no legal value, but he chose to show that rather than the military registration which he also carried.

Trials and Triumphs

My trip with Orlando was to last nine days. Our first day

Michael Mast has been a missionary to the Argentine Chaco since 1966 with Mennonite Board of Missions. Originally from Fleetwood, Pa., he is a 1965 graduate of Eastern Mennonite Seminary.

There are miles to go before reaching that church deep in the forest. The author's wife, Mattie Marie, prepares the "picnic" dinner.
involved the long trip from our home in the Chaco — more than 200 miles of mostly dirt road. We were really tired after participating in the Saturday evening service. Sunday was a tiring day, too, with three long services. It was midnight when we finally unfolded our army cots and crawled under the mosquito netting for a sound sleep.

Monday we traveled another hundred miles to Campo del Cielo. One front tire was losing air as we pulled up to the pastor's patio. The thornbushes in Formosa have hard spikes up to eight inches long that can play havoc on tires. We patched a third tire before the trip was over.

The church building in Campo del Cielo is well built of mud and sticks and a neatly thatched roof. I always stop to admire its beauty and its history. About eight years ago the congregation was formed there with Julio Suarez as pastor. To get the church going, he donated his recently built house to serve as a place of worship. He proceeded to build another house for himself which turned out to be quite a bit less elegant.

We enjoyed our visit with the delightful people in Campo del Cielo. We examined the bow and arrow they use for fishing and licked our chops over the wild honey served us. After a service on Monday night we held two services the next day. Orlando and I noted the relative accuracy with which they sang their hymns. We discovered they had learned these hymns while harvesting in a neighboring province. This evidence of perseverance was gratifying. We knew that church life often suffers when the harvest season calls many Indians away from their homes.

Wednesday we had a frightening trip on a trail made almost impassable because of rain. We broke a spring in a big sink hole that was full of water. Fortunately we could limp onward to complete our trip. Denis Zarate came to meet us with his horses. We had to travel about two miles on horseback because of high water. Nerves were soon calmed as we found ourselves welcomed by excited Indians in El Descanso.

It was our first visit to this group but one we thoroughly enjoyed, not only because of the fresh fish or the young goat they killed for us, but also because of the evidence of spiritual life we found. No missionary had visited there for many years. A new church building was in the making, and the energetic young pastor urged his people to listen to the words of the visitors and learn more about living responsibly.

Thursday we went on horseback for about eight miles to visit an almost abandoned village — a disheartening contrast to the village in Descanso. We were spirited, however, by the group of 14 children who accompanied us on foot to join in the singing. My companion played the guitar and taught new choruses to his young admirers.

On Friday we visited the group in Rineon Bomba where the original pastor had abandoned the work. He was replaced by an energetic young man named Justo Alegria who is totally blind, but determined to see the work continue among the small group there.

Saturday evening in Pozo del Tigre was possibly most encouraging of all. No church has been established there yet, but to our amazement, a small crowd of 20 persons came for an open-air meeting. Some were carrying Bibles and others dished out their meal-money to buy a Bible, a Testament, or a Bible study booklet.

The leader of the group, Joaquin Ruiz, told me he once had a good job and had saved hundreds of dollars' worth of pesos. One night at the bar he handed a huge sum of money to the bartender for safekeeping and then got dead drunk. When he awoke the new saddle was stolen from his horse and he lay naked, robbed of his new set of clothing. The bartender returned his money but Joaquin said to himself, "I've been a fool."

Then Joaquin reacted in a way that may seem strange. He gave up his good job and took off on a tour of Indian churches he was acquainted with to learn as much about the gospel as he could. He never has learned to read, but the little group he had gathered there that night was proof enough to me that he — like Guillermo, Orlando, Julio, Denis, and blind Alegria — knows better than I do the meaning of Mt. 6:33: "But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness."

God does not comfort us that we may be comfortable, but that we may be comforters.— Nowell.
Leadership Needed

Recently a certain congregation* received a bequest of $50,000. As the church council was considering the use of this legacy, one man suggested that the congregation "tithe" its legacy with special gifts to the denomination and community projects. This action was recommended to the congregation and readily accepted and acted upon. Soon grants were divided among denominational projects and some community programs. Thanks to the leadership of one man with vision.

What might happen if just one man in each congregation would accept responsibility to speak and give leadership to the stewardship ministry of the church? In how many congregations might there be increased fruitfulness, spiritual growth, increased congregational response, and ventures into new areas of life and service?

How many good and worthwhile projects or actions may have fallen by the wayside or down the cracks simply because you or I as one person failed to give support or encouragement to a matter under consideration? Many people are simply waiting to have one more voice, one more word of encouragement to help make the right choice and decision.

One young man* considering a vocation had counsel and encouragement toward several possibilities until a neighbor laid his hand on his shoulder one Sunday morning and said, "I believe you would make a good minister." That did it. "If he thinks so, I'll do it." He went off to college and seminary and today is serving as a pastor.

When General Conference at Turner, Ore., considered the budget at $270,000 for the next two years, Howard J. Zehr as executive secretary encouraged the delegates to increase this by $10,000 to make possible the many projects that needed to be done. The delegates responded enthusiastically and adopted the larger amount of $280,000. It took the leadership of only one person to induce the response of your representatives and delegates.

Perhaps we now need one more bit of leadership. Each delegate should now speak to his respective congregation about doing their part toward making this budget possible. It calls for only $1.75 per member per year. This could be provided in each congregation within a few weeks. Since some members come from small congregations in depressed or poverty areas, the larger congregations and those with more affluence will want to share by giving more. Will you be the leadership needed in your congregation?

By Still Waters

As thy days, so shall thy strength be. Deut. 33:25.
Some carry three loads of trouble at one time: all they have today, all they had yesterday and all they expect tomorrow. Such are surely headed for trouble. The load of today is enough. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof" says Jesus in Matt. 6:34. It is harmful and of no help to worry about yesterday's or tomorrow's troubles.

We can become so trouble minded that we forget to turn to God for strength. God promises strength for today. If we trust Him for this we shall be ready for tomorrow when it comes.

J. E. Saxby wrote years ago:
Oh, ask not thou, How shall I bear
The burden of to-morrow?
Sufficient for today, its care,
Its evil and its sorrow;
God imparteth by the way
Strength sufficient for the day.

Therefore we must learn to enjoy the blessings of today. Yesterday is gone. Tomorrow is not yet born. Today only is ours. And it is only as we make good use of today that our tomorrows will be blessed. If we try to bear the burden of yesterday, tomorrow and today, our load will be intolerable. But if we live for God today there is no tomorrow which we will be unprepared for.

On Becoming Worldly

"Religion as an ongoing force," says Professor Hertzberg, "cannot be saved by making it 'relevant.' People come to religion because they are possessed of an ultimate metaphysical hunger, and when this hunger is not satisfied, religion declines. Christians who are trying to revitalize religion by making it socially relevant should note the experience of Jews who started it a century ago. It doesn't work. The very moment clerics become more worldly the world goes to hell all the faster.

"The role of religion," the professor continues, "is not to gain acceptability in the secular world, but to expound the existence of God and man's obedience to a transcendent God." — Rabbi Arthur Hertzberg, professor at Columbia University.
Atrocities on Trial

In light of the fact that war itself is just one big atrocity it seems strange to try soldiers for commanding or committing atrocities. Is it not the avowed purpose of the army to teach men to kill? Doesn't the military demand absolute obedience at all times even at the suspension of personal conscience? Since when has warfare become selective in whom it kills? What is the difference between what happened at Hiroshima and My Lai except in the size of the operation? Whether one gets Nurnberg trial or a congressional medal of honor depends on which side one is on.

Lord Fisher, First Lord of the British Admiralty in World War I, put it bluntly: "The essence of war is violence. You hit first, you hit hard, and keep on hitting. You have to be ruthless, relentless, and remorseless. It's perfect rot to talk about civilized warfare. You might as well talk about a Heavenly Hell. Perhaps I went a little too far when I said I would boil the prisoners in oil and murder innocents in cold blood . . . but it's quite silly not to make war damnable to the whole mass of the enemy's population."

Captain P. Mumford said it correctly, "You can't limit or humanize modern warfare. What is the difference between throwing five hundred babies into a fire and throwing fire from airplanes on five hundred babies? There is none. Yet people who abhor the idea of doing the former, approve of doing the latter."

One cannot bless war without surrendering one's claims as a Christian. War is contrary to everything we call Christian. William C. Allen described this discrepancy clearly when he wrote: "When I heard of the sergeant who called out to the lads fresh at bayonet practice, whilst instructing them how to stab and cut at the vitals of an enemy: 'Now, boys, you must forget all that you have learned in Sunday school,' I realized that the Sunday school teaches one thing and the army another." Major General John F. O'Ryan said, "War is the denial of Christianity and all the most sacred things of life." Charles Clayton Morrison wrote that "Nothing more antithetical to Christianity can be imagined than war. It is the denial in the boldest possible form of the very life principle of the religion of Jesus. It is anti-Christian in the rawest, nakedest form."

When will we admit that war and morality cannot go together? Long ago such as Brig. General F. B. Grosier stated, "You cannot have war and morality at the same time." Sounds strange then to have a part of the military machine, which goes all out in teaching men to kill, try one or more of its products for killing.

William A. Smith, writing following World War I in War and the Churches, said, "I have heard Christian women say that every German baby ought to be killed. This is the state of mind forced upon the church by governments when they declare war. Is it or is it not a sin? How long will the descendants of the apostles permit politicians and diplomats to tell them when and how they should abrogate the gospel, teach a new commandment of hate, and bless rape and murder? Isn't it about time we used the intelligence God gave us to discern what war is?"

James Russell Lowell minced no words. He went to the core in his poem which reads:

Ez fer war, I call it murder,
There you hev it plain an' flat;
I don't want to go no furder
Than my Testymen fer that;
God hez sed so plump an' fairly,
It's ez long ez it is broad,
An' you've gut to git up airly
Ef you want to take in God.

Undertakers and Gravediggers

"Undertakers" for the church and "gravediggers" for God have always been around. In time they die but the church and God go on. Then a new generation of "undertakers" and "gravediggers" arises, doesn't even bother to search out new evidence, and says the same old thing all over again. "The church is done for," "God is dead." "The church is irrelevant." "God is uninterested." "The church is archaic." "God is a myth." Yet the church continues and multitudes testify to the reality of God.

"Let the dead bury their dead" and let us preach the gospel of the kingdom. The fact is that I get less and less excited about what the "undertakers" and "gravediggers" are saying or doing. I don't even have time to evaluate their work. I'm more and more excited about what the gospel can do, what the church is doing, and what God is doing. Let those who wish to take care of what's dead, do so. I'm interested in what is living and in what gives life.

Those who are proclaiming the death of God and the church just aren't aware of what's really going on. They probably haven't seen a life radically changed of late. Perhaps it's been a long, long time since they've talked to one who really knows God personally. Don't blame them. That's our fault. — D.
A Few Words from the Establishment

Dear Doug:

Since I'm a member of the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Conference, and so are you, I guess we have a right to counsel one with another, perhaps clear the air a bit. And even more important than being members of the same church conference, Doug, we are both Christians. And Christians ought to talk one with another. But there's still another reason why the doors of communication ought to stay open. You know what that is: I'm your father; you're my son.

Since you went to Turner, Ore., this past summer; since you, Jon Lind, and others presented your plea to General Conference to recognize the position of the draft resister; since you had your picture in the Gospel Herald (I never made it!), a number of people in this conference, and around in Mennonite circles beyond Indiana and Michigan, have asked me about your position. And for some of them, the eyebrows have gone up pretty high as they made the inquiry. Your mother and I are not classified as being very far left of center. In fact, we think we are out in right field. Anyway, this draft resistance bit bothers some people and they ask me about it. So now the roles are switched. People used to ask you about your dad and his writing; now they ask me about my son and his thinking.

And when they ask me, what do I tell them? What should I tell them, Doug? You never gave me my speaking role in response to such questions. But, of course, you didn't think it necessary. I'm a big boy, and so are you. We have a right to think for ourselves.

Doug, you know, we've never seen eye-to-eye on this matter. Remember the night you were ready to back the VW out of the garage for one of your midnight meetings at Goshen with your Young Turk cohorts and I came out to say a few fatherly words to you? I came over to the car and said (a little sadly, I guess), "Doug, I wish I could agree with you fully on all this business, but I can't see it exactly like you do." And I really meant it. Fathers would like to agree with sons. We talked for a bit, then you bugged out in the bug, not mad, but understanding I believe of how hard it is for a man of nearly fifty to change his mind. The Establishment really gets established.

Basically, as I understand your position, you believe that cooperation with the Selective Service System is wrong. You feel that such cooperation sanctions its actions, activities that are designed to produce killers. And killing for you is wrong. There's one place we are in full agreement, that last statement. You feel that your first loyalty is to God. Of course, there you sound a lot like the early Christian church, sort of like a couple of fellows called Peter and John. Perhaps you feel that you are somewhat like the prophets of old, voices crying in the wilderness. You feel that you must cry out against the military-industrial complex of this day. You feel you must speak up because we, the "old ones," are a mite too mired down in our materialistic-financial ruts to see over the edge of our neat little Mennonite canyons that we have established by spinning our spiritual wheels in one spot. And so you, the youth of the church, not yet burdened with the investments in homes, cars, farms, and mutual funds, you, the unburdened, would strike a blow for peace. And you have worked at it hard.

You've pointed out how some of our Mennonite ancestors spelled out their noncooperation by actually fleeing their European homes, migrating to America. They were willing to give up their precious material things, their very homeland, to obtain a more precious spiritual freedom. In the Civil War, Mennonites could buy their way out of military service for $500 and a 2 percent tax on their property. You would not buy your way out. You pick no easy way. You feel that your brand of Christianity would call you to confront conscription as an evil. And you think the Mennonite Church has too neat, too tight a connection with the General Hersheys of the past, present, and future.

Doug, have I plumbed you right? Do you feel disappointed with us, we of forty, of fifty, or in my case, seventy, of us the power structure in this conference? You haven't written us off completely yet, but, since we are so slow to act, so reluctant to rock the boat, then you Linds, Millers, Lues, Bakers of the day must plow virgin ground, carry the torch, walk alone. That’s the prophetic witness of which you speak. Right?

Doug, I look at you as a fellow Mennonite, fellow Christian, and, of course, my son. You were the firstborn, my “Isaac.” And I planned things a bit different for you. You were born with more gray matter than I. I was no Merit finalist. I guess you picked up a few special intelligence genes from your mother. I feel that your emphasis should be on your schooling at present. Maybe I’m nearsighted.

We’ve hashed this over at 801 Harding Road, you, your mother, myself, and your more mature siblings. Perhaps your mother and I understand you a little better than the run-of-the-mill conference member. After all, we’ve lived with you for twenty-one years. And as I said, we can’t buy everything you are selling. I suppose my own experience at getting released from the United States Naval Reserve affects my feeling. I went through channels; I won my release. Perhaps you would call it “cooperation.” I was willing to work with the military up to a certain point. They respected my position. Was that evil? You see, Romans 13 seems to be saying for us to go through channels and so I try to be obedient to the government as long as it does not conflict with my conscience. As I understand you, my son, you feel that God is calling you to a higher response, a bolder one, one that is more rugged, but for you is clearer, sharper, necessary. So be it. At twenty-one, you’re a man. But you’re still my son.

Doug, I have no reason to question your sincerity. When people ask me about you, I always throw in this plug for you, “Doug is sincere — for him it’s no grandstand play; it’s for him a thing of necessity.” Again, Selah.

Perhaps, perhaps we older people dream too much of the past. Perhaps the dreamers that Joel speaks of, the young men with dreams and visions, they are the ones who look ahead. I say, “Perhaps.”

I’ve quoted to you before the words that now come swinging back to me:

To thine own self be true,
And it must follow,
as the night the day,
Thou canst not then be false to any man.

God has given you a conscience. Your parents, the church should have helped to shape that conscience. I know your own studies, your own thinking have sharpened it also. And I would certainly believe that the Holy Spirit works with you too. The Establishment does not have an exclusive franchise on the Holy Spirit.

I have personally appreciated the fact that you didn’t pull out of the church with your views, no matter how radical. We’ve had our quota of “pullerouters” in the past. You came to General Conference seeking the church’s understanding and care. The church is a fellowship of believers. We should help one another. I do not hear you condemning in any way the I-W, the VS, the Pax stance. You recognize that for most they will continue to be perfectly legitimate options. You do not negate their work in the past because of the insincerity of some who participated. I do not sense at all that you feel these valued positions should be abandoned. You would simply ask for our understanding of yet another view. That’s still tough, what you are asking of us. We’ve spent a long time getting where we are. I hope I’ve interpreted you right. It’s how I’ve seen you, a spectator’s view, ringside seat.

Another thought comes to me, a personal one. In 1942 I joined the Hospital Corps of the United States Navy, seeking a noncombatant role. I did not find it. I have a little difficulty in offering too much criticism to one who draws a harder line concerning participation in war than what I drew. People like me who lived in glass houses should not condemn those who seek to be honest and transparent in the brotherhood. But I’m probably prejudiced. I’m pretty close to the problem.

I often pray for you, Doug. Your mother does too. And you pray for us. Pray for the church. You young people may not turn us on by all your actions, but you do cause us to examine ourselves. We are not always happy with what we see, either in you, or in us. A little second mile going wouldn’t hurt you, nor us. And remember please, we too, we the Establishment, seek to become the kind of people that God wants us to become. That’s another tough job, but I believe we will make it, you, your parents, your church. Perhaps all of us can be more open to what He would say to us. Youth is not all bad, not by any means. And neither is the Establishment wrong simply because it is the Establishment. Let’s keep writing, keep talking, keep trying to understand one another. For years God has been doing that very thing for each of us. Surely we should be willing to do the same thing with each other. You are a part of the Great Commission which I have accepted from Mt. 28:19. And I am a part of that same “all nations” that Christ sends you to also. Let’s stay a part of one another’s world. Take care.

Member of the Establishment.
The Happening at Eastern Mennonite College

By Paul Erb

"I just can't believe it happened," said Grant M. Stoltzfus, associate professor of church history on EMC's Opinion Board, the morning after. Grant isn't usually so blind to evidence that is as plain as Massanutten Peak on the eastern skyline.

But this was hard to believe. A library had seemed so difficult and unattainable only four days before. The deadline had been set by terms of a $388,500 government grant for the new building at Eastern Mennonite College. This grant would be lost if the College did not match this amount and award a building contract by Dec. 11. The Board of Trustees, dealing realistically with a college debt that dare not be allowed to get much larger, had decreed that $400,000 in cash be in hand by Dec. 9. Then the Board would meet to accept the lowest bid and sign the contract — or to say no and postpone indefinitely the erection of a sorely needed library.

On Dec. 4 only $289,000 of the required $400,000 was in the new library fund, $111,000 short of the goal. President Myron S. Augsburger and the development staff had been doing their best, and all the potential givers, seemingly, had been seen. Everybody hoped that at the last moment some few big givers would come through to rescue the project. But nobody knew that they would.

And now, on Dec. 9, over $400,000 was in the bank! The Board, unanimously and happily, voted to proceed with building. Before the entire school Chairman Dewitt Heatwole signed the building contract. On Dec. 17 eight students broke the ground in unison, and the new library is on the way. By the terms of the contract it should be ready for use by the spring of 1971.

The story of how the impossible happened has already been told through the church publications and across the country via the mass news media. It was the kind of story that broadcasters and editors readily accepted. EMC's public relations staff did a good job of making the information widely available, and for several days millions were hearing and reading of the little Mennonite college in Virginia whose students took constructive action to raise $112,000 in three days.

This happening has particular importance for the Mennonite Church, from east to west and north to south. It is a demonstration of what God can do through His people when they let Him work through them. For this was more than an example of campus hysteria. It was born in prayer and fasting and daring faith commitment. Who can doubt that it was God who was speaking to those leaders of the Student Government Association who on Thursday evening faced the real possibility that the new library might not be built? They challenged each other to believe that over the weekend God would help the students to raise $20,000, in the hope that this effort by students would inspire older donors to come through with the rest of the money.

But they did more than pray. By Friday morning chapel they had a plan ready which would give every person in the college community something to do. Here was faith at work: trips back home, phone calls to parents and pastors, washing and waxing cars, chopping wood, cleaning houses and chicken houses, baking and making candy, singing on the courthouse square, making posters and greeting cards, gathering and arranging the thousands of articles to be sold in the auction, and doing hundreds of other things that fit into the pattern of the happening.

But in all this there was a deep religious motivation. God was at work, and He was working through His people — students and faculty, young and old, in Rockingham County and in the communities back home. The big money-meter on the wall went up and up, past $20,000 and $50,000 and $100,000 to the final $112,000. There were awed expressions of thanksgiving to God. In chapel on Tuesday all sang from the heart, "To God Be the Glory."

The happening was a triumph of unity. There is a great variety of personalities in the thousand persons who make up this college community and quite a spectrum of opinion on many questions. But here was a common cause in which all could participate. It did not start that way. Students who went home for the Thanksgiving weekend were asked to solicit money then. Something over 100 of them did, and they brought in $23,000. The majority either were unsuccessful, or they thought the library somehow would be built without their helping. But in the Big Weekend the participation was one hundred percent or better. It was this working together that brought the great accomplishment. Many must have learned here that you don't have to agree with a person in everything in order to work with him in what you both do believe in.

The happening was and will continue to be a powerful testimony to the world. Letters (some with money) and telephone calls have been pouring in. People in distant states are deeply impressed and encouraged. Mentioned more often than anything else is the contrast between what happened here and what is happening on some campuses where students are rioting and destroying. There, the observers say, students are taking over buildings and vandalizing them; here the students are putting up a building.

A Richmond editorial said this library "will stand as a memorial to the 950 young men and women who showed that student power, when properly channeled, can indeed perform miracles." Professional and business leaders have sent gifts of up to $1,000 to back up that kind of responsible student action. A Charlottesville editor sees this kind of youth spirit as being of a piece with other things he has heard about Mennonites:

"It will be recalled that last summer after flood and landslides had ravished so much of nearby Nelson County, Mennonites from many parts of Virginia and from as far away as Canada moved into the stricken county and labored long and hard without pay to help the people of Nelson emerge from their ordeal. Right now, we begin to understand why."

People like that produce, and come from, people like that!

This elderly observer was deeply impressed at the EMC demonstration of the quality of our young people. Eyes of many of us became misted as we realized what we were seeing. Not everything we see in our young people is reassuring, and some people become very negative and pessimistic in trying to visualize the kind of church we will be when our young people take over.

I was impressed by two things especially. One was the spirit of these young people who come from our homes. They are unselfish and ready to sacrifice. These leaders who have been giving days and nights to this project are probably taking some college courses. I heard that one of them is afraid he will flunk. Many students fasted so that the College could put the money saved into the library fund.

One girl asked her grandmother to give for the library the $500 she had promised her granddaughter as a graduation present. They bid liberally at the sale — often, it was evident, not for something they needed, but as a donation to the cause. They spent next term's tuition money, and even borrowed against future earning power. And they did this, one felt, not as a lark, or because everyone else was doing it, but because they had their priorities stacked that way.

The other thing that impressed me was the ability of these young people. Once they had decided what they wanted to do, they knew how to go about it. It was all very sudden, like an emergency suddenly thrown upon them. But within hours they had a plan — many plans — and an organization set up. Hundreds of people soon knew what they were to do, and they did it without getting in each other's way.

Oh, they had good faculty cooperation, but it was clear that the young people were in charge. Their skill in administering the rapid and unexpected development of their project was a joy to see. Even in the auctioneering the palaver of the students was practically as good as that of the professionals. Don't worry about what will happen when the reins are put into the hands of these young people.

I was impressed too with the good relations these young people have with their homes and churches. Of course, for most of the cash which was raised they went to Pop and Mom and Uncle Henry and Aunt Mattie and Pastor John. And they were listened to. It is clear that these folks haven't been written off.

And neither has the College and the cause of church-controlled higher education. On the Sunday of the Big Weekend many churches took special offerings, and $300 came from here, $1,000 from there, and $3,000 from elsewhere.

Lastly, this happening at EMC was a demonstration that we can do anything that we believe needs doing. Important as a library for EMC is, there are certainly some more important things which we as a church should do. We can't say that the above-budget giving to the Compassion Fund for our sharing in ghetto and migrant needs is impossible. We can't say that our mission boards must stop pushing the budgets and the per-member askings higher and higher. We can't say that it's just too much to expect us to continue to pour out for the refugees in Vietnam and Jordan and Biafra, and the other trouble spots that keep breaking out in our troubled world. If we want to feed and clothe and teach and heal and evangelize, we can.

I hope that a part of the training experience in the EMC happening is the learning of what it means to go outside oneself to meet a need. That would be a worthy by-product.

Consultation on Conscience and Conscription

A Personal Impression

The Chicago Peace Assembly was a wistful landmark. A landmark because it was the first annual assembly called by the newly structured Peace Section of the MCC. And wistful because speakers and conferees repeatedly harked back to earlier peace meetings which in later years proved to be landmarks. The older participants and the young historians recalled a 1935 landmark conference of the "historic peace churches" at Newton, Kan. And throughout the 1940's there were occasional meetings to discuss the church's position with regard to the draft.

But not in 19 years had the Mennonites and Brethren in Christ met to review such matters. Thus, a "Consultation on Conscience and Conscription." Hopefully, some bright vision would be caught at this assembly which might thrust the church around another notable corner in its peace position. Wistfully, historians in a future decade will look upon the consultation kindly, acclaiming it a landmark.

To Resist or Not to Resist

The questions were conscription and militarism. To some folk these were two questions: the military and the draft. But the consensus of the meeting might be better reflected in the statement that there was only one question: the military — and conscription is an integral part of the military. The Selective Service System is a tentacle of the military monstrosity against which the peace churches first brush. Though only a tentacle it is no less a part of the body. And in that first brush with the military on the matter of conscription is the point at which the widest differences of opinions among the conferees were expressed.

To resist or not to resist was the question: whether to cooperate with the Selective Service System which allows for alternate kinds of service in lieu of the military — or to refuse to cooperate as conscientious objectors even in compulsory civilian work, because to do so is to help perpetuate an evil system which violates individual freedom.

"Noncooperation with Selective Service has our Mennonite people scared white," one gentleman confided during a dinner conversation.

While the rank and file Mennonite might indeed be uneasy or even frightened by the declarations and actions of the noncooperator, few of the church leaders at this consulation showed any whiteness about the mouth or other signs of panic.

The advocates of noncooperation are mostly youthful. But there were a few similar spokesmen among the oldsters, theological butterflies who flutter about any new bud, and not infrequently crush out the youthful spontaneity in their sudden rush to be self-appointed prophets for the young. Were I one of these bright young men with new convictions I'd tell the old butterflies to go back to their cocoons; we can speak for ourselves, I'd say.

The more youthful proponents of noncooperation attacked what they felt to be a truce between the peace churches and the Selective Service System. They see that truce as a comfortable compromise for both parties. The church elders and cooperator see the tenuousness of that truce, and re-member the confrontations with the government during World War I and early World War II days to arrive at the understanding. But the noncooperator longs for a head-on encounter with the draft designers and bureaucrats, and brightly acclaims their stance as "prophetic."

The consensus of the meeting on noncooperation, as portrayed in a message to the church, is generous. "We recognize noncooperation with military conscription as a valid expression of nonconformity and peacemaking..." the message reads in part, after stating that "the young people of our churches should voluntarily offer service as an expression of discipleship."

While one has the greatest of sympathies for the position of the young noncooperator, one is, on the other hand, disappointed with a tyrannical disposition some of them reveal. Too many of the young are frighteningly like their elders: too ready with easy answers to all the questions of the draft issues, and even the most complex issues of noncooperation lying beyond conscription and taxation.

One is troubled to find among socio-political liberals today a growing intolerance for people and views other than their own. The true liberal is a man of magnanimity and tolerance. The new tyranny of the liberal reflects some of the theological and ideological ruthlessness of the older church fathers — and I do not mean the Anabaptists either.

The noncombatant and I-W positions came in for some brief but vigorous debate. While one disagreed thoroughly with the noncombatant views expressed at the consultation, one admired the chief advocate of them for accepting the invitation to attend a peace consultation. He was like a lion thrown to a den of Daniels, or a more apt figure might be, a timid hawk loosed in a cage of righteous doves. But there was little time to discuss the noncombatant position. It was generally dismissed by many as theologically naive, or outside the Anabaptist-Mennonite tradition.

As for the I-W position, the proposed message to the churches still admits the right for conscientious objectors to accept such a position, but states that “it has become so routine as no longer to call for a serious moral decision . . . and to have largely lost its symbolic value in witnessing against war.”

Church agencies themselves might show the way and boldly affirm that any young fellow seeking to work at their headquarters in lieu of the Pentagon headquarters must do so on a voluntary service basis, instead of in earning positions as I-W’s.

Plain and Peaceful

This fine honing of all the edges of the peace position, this constant turning over to examine all its supposed theological convolutions, this endless pursuit into minuitia for the “full implications and ramifications of our positions” leave me uneasy. It recalls my earlier years in another Mennonite church which had worked out along with its nonresistance a comprehensive theology of nonconformity. We were a plain and peaceful people, whose church elders had refined the nonconformity position until they developed a theology of color, a theology of design, and a theology of fabric.

Having to work out my salvation from that snare, I find in me a resistance to this escalation of any other one aspect of our faith in much the same way. I keep hoping the church isn’t simply making more and more statements and resolutions on its latest, more fashionable, preoccupation.

While on the one hand I resist the codifying of faith, on the other hand I welcome it. I welcome positional statements for those times when one’s Jewish roommates at graduate school ask endlessly, “And what is the Mennonite position on . . . ?” whether it is militarism, Zionism, or birth control.

But how will the message of this consultation on conscription and conscience filter down to the congregation, the most important aspect of church life?

I find that many of my Mennonite brethren at the congregational level know less about their own church’s position on matters than they do the disposition of general Protestantism. And in some areas, this is surely one of the curses of religious radio stations and newspapers, which are primarily militaristic and nationalistic. Too often some of my brethren believe that anyone who has this theology correct, surely must have his socio-political matters correct. If a man believes in the virgin birth, then we tend to trust him when he calls for us to endorse a Vietnam war, and all things American.

Against such an array of voices, one wants even more consultations and more resolutions, and hopes that the message of this consultation on conscription and conscience finds broad use and acceptance within the congregation.

You Should Know

By Ivan Kauffmann

A Mission Board is not a secret society. It bears a message that is to be openly proclaimed. It serves in the task which the church assigns to it. As a member of the church you should know what is happening. But to many church members the work of the Mission Board is a secret. Unknown to many are the numberless efforts, spiritual victories, stories of new converts, etc., that occur within Mission Board program. We want you to know about these. You can find out in the following ways:

1. Through reading the mission news in your church papers.

   — Gospel Herald has a section in which there are Mission Board articles and news notes each week.

   — The Mission Board sends regular news releases to the Mennonite Weekly Review and the Canadian Mennonite.

   — Your district conference paper also prints news and articles which are provided by the Mission Board.

2. Through your pastor and Mission Board member.

   Each month they receive a special mailing from the Mission Board. Included in this mailing is a missions information bulletin called Inside Line, a number of suggested church bulletin announcements, a letter giving some direction for dispensing mission information, and other materials for congregational use. It is hoped that these materials will aid your pastor and mission board member in being channels through which mission information can get to you.

3. Through personal contact with mission board-related persons:

   — By correspondence with overseas missionaries (their addresses are printed twice per year in Gospel Herald);

   — By conversation with missions personnel — with overseas missionaries on furlough, with home missions workers, with VS-ers and ex-VS-ers, and with Elkhart staff persons (these are sent on deputation services as requested by congregations);

   — By letters of inquiry — if you don’t know, write a letter — we’ll answer as soon as possible and to the best of our ability.

God is at work through the Mission Board program. You should know about it.
Takio Tanase: Japanese Ambassador

By John Bender

From Kushiro (population 200,000) in the prefecture of Hokkaido, Japan, to Goshen, Ind., came Takio Tanase and his family in August 1969. Tanase san, now enrolled as an English major at Goshen College, also takes courses in history, political science, and Protestant Christianity. In September 1970 he plans to enter Associated Mennonite Biblical Seminary in Elkhart to complete his studies for the Master of Religious Education degree.

From his experience as director and main teacher at Eastern Hokkaido Bible School, a leadership training facility begun in Kushiro in 1965, Tanase san felt he should become better equipped to carry out his responsibilities.

Church leaders, including missionaries, had felt a need for a Bible teaching facility in Hokkaido for many years. Partially this need became more urgent as a result of Howard Charles’ Bible teaching ministry in Japan from July 1960 to January 1962. Lay people became involved in serious Bible study which fomented more direct involvement in the work of the church. Prayer cell groups also emerged.

Students attending EHBs either took the full 13-hour-a-week schedule or audited individual courses. Men and women of all ages attended classes held at night to allow students to work or study elsewhere during the day. Since the inception of the Bible School, extension classes have also been held at Obihiro, and for one year in Shibecha. Charles Shenk is present administrator and teacher at the school. The Hokkaido Mennonite constituency includes thirteen congregations with 282 members.

Not only has Tanase san come to North America for academic and biblical training — this he could have received at one of the Japanese universities or theological schools — but he wants to get acquainted with the way schools are administered here. He wants to visit as many North American churches as possible during his two-and-one-half-year stay, and he is interested in pursuing a deeper study of Anabaptism, especially with emphasis on peace and nonresistance. These are major issues facing the church in Japan. Tanase san talked briefly about some of the political developments in Japan that pose questions for the church.

The United States government is pressing Japan for rearmament. This move would entail changing the constitution, drawn up during the post World War II American occupation, which prohibits Japan from having an army. The self-defense force, however, actually is a type of civilian army. Directly tied in with the U.S. desire to have Japan rearm is this matter of the "Mutual Security Pact," the Japanese-United States treaty which expires in 1970. Political parties, including the Socialists and the Soka-Gakkai (a militant anti-Christian movement), are opposed to a renewal of the pact. Increasingly, opposition to the renewal is coming from the average citizen, characterized by Tanase san as a peace-loving people concerned for love and justice. Many Japanese Christians favor neutrality too. What should a Christian do?

Tanase san explained that a strange paradox exists in the rhetoric of workers and students and past election results. The conservative Liberal Democrats have been defeated only once by the Socialists. A significant source of Liberal Democrat support is based on the material security enjoyed through maintaining good relations with the United States.

The Tanase children, Eliya in fourth grade and Marie in third, are enjoying their studies here. They like their teachers, and their classmates are very friendly. Both children enjoy arithmetic since this subject does not require much language work. The children had a head start on English, though. They were tutored by missionary teachers Ron and Ruth Guengerich for four months.

Fifteen years ago Tanase san completed three years of study in the U.S., spent variously at Hesston and Goshen colleges. When asked what changes he has noted in the Mennonite Church since his first visit here, he paused, then said, "The church building is becoming beautiful. I feel more at home in a more simple setting." He expressed appreciation for the deeper sharing possible in small numbers of people meeting in Sunday school. Sunday school in Japan is primarily set up for children.

The last question: “Why are you a pastor?”

“I am a pastor because I want to spend my time—I should say my life—in spreading the gospel to others, because I know the gospel has the answer,” he replied. “If a Christian has experienced the power of the gospel, he has to witness. A pastor’s work is not to do it by himself but to prepare Christian members of the church to do the work of witness. . . . It is good to spend energy to beautify buildings, to have better chairs to sit on, to have better music compared to bad music, but perhaps in Goshen there are people who do not know Christ yet.”

Heifers on a College Farm

By Mrs. Betty Reiter

For more than 60 years, Prentiss Normal and Industrial Institute, Prentiss, Miss., has striven to educate Negro youth of Jefferson Davis County and surrounding areas. Established in 1907, by Professor and Mrs. J. E. Johnson, the Institute has grown from an elementary and high school to a junior college with a staff of 40 and a student body of 400.

Since 1955, Heifer Project, Inc., in cooperation with the Institute, has sponsored an effective self-help program in southeastern Mississippi through the distribution of dairy and beef cattle to needy families. The college farm has been used as a collection point for livestock and an effort has been made to use the farm as a demonstration center for improved farming practices.

Heifer Project, Inc., is a nonprofit organization, supported by over 20 different church denominations. They supply various kinds of livestock to poor people throughout the world. The first female offspring is returned to Heifer Project and given to another family. In this way a “living chain” is established.

In the last 15 years, Heifer Project has given over 400 dairy cows to Negro and white families in Mississippi, over 60 beef cattle as 4-H and FFA projects, and thousands of baby chicks to the poor of southeastern Mississippi.

In 1966 MCC sent the first white couple to help HPI at Prentiss Institute. They stayed one year and then in 1968 MCC loaned us to Heifer Project for two years of voluntary service.

When we arrived in April 1968, we weren’t sure what to expect. We knew that PI had a 600-acre farm, and that HPI had the responsibility of operating the farm. Pete, my husband, was supposed to be the herdsman for the college dairy herd and work under Mr. Willis McAlpin, a retired Iowa dairy farmer who is the Mississippi Heifer Project representative. Mr. McAlpin and we arrived at the same time. The men found the farm almost unbelievable; it lacked management, proper farm implements, and good livestock. Since the livestock and its products are of major importance in supplying food for the college, the men knew their work was cut out for them. Immediately they bought a plow, planter, cultivator, and a two-section harrow to plant that year’s crops.

Other improvements accomplished that year were bulldozing and clearing 12 to 15 acres of land, planting 60 acres of permanent pasture, and improving the Angus beef cattle herd by better breeding and heavy culling of undesirable animals. A work crew composed of 10 members of the Indiana Church of the Brethren spent three days at the college and helped construct a new hay barn, machinery shed, and chicken house. Also that year the hogs were moved from a mudhole which they called home to a new location with tight hog wire fences, a cement feeding floor with concrete troughs, and automatic waterers. The chickens also were poorly managed and were moved to a new chicken house with new equipment. The old building hadn’t been cleaned for 11 years!

Pete also had his problems with the dairy herd. When he arrived, 17 cows were producing one can of milk a day with sporadic milkings. With careful culling and proper management the herd is now producing at a respectable average, and the students are now consuming between 35 and 40 gallons of milk a day. The majority of the students now drink milk, and can have all they want.

Since we have an apartment in a girls’ dormitory, my main job was being housemother for the girls during our first year. This school year all the girls are living in a new dormitory that was constructed this past summer. Last year we had 34 young ladies, which made our building very lively and noisy. I enjoyed being with the girls. Talking and helping some with sewing projects helped pass the time. For many girls I was their first white friend. One girl even said she thought she never would talk to a white person, but like me, who had hardly ever spoken with Negroes, she soon began to look beyond one’s color.

Clothing is something the folks here are always glad to receive, and need. Different church groups from the North send used clothing to be distributed. Another job of mine is to sort these things and distribute them among the students and families of this community. Many families have 10 or 11 children, and without receiving these things many children would not be able to attend school.

A challenge? Yes, but not without much frustration, and the feeling that things aren’t changing fast enough. Then we remember that it took two centuries of degradation and exploitation to produce these conditions; so we must exhibit Christian love, patience, and understanding to solve these problems.
Reversing the Order

By Lee J. Miller

There were vivid exposures of inner hostilities, guilt complexes, anxieties, obsessions, and compulsions which were disgorged like morsels of putrid and undigested food. The occasion was the routine of a very intense sensitivity training that had been structured into a social psychology course at a state college. No one in the class was immune to the deep probing in that person-to-person encounter. Disguises were vulnerable and useless. They were as obsolete as a walled city.

One could have wished that this kind of transparency and honesty could always exist in what is understood to be its natural habitat, the body of Christian believers. Is this technique a child of modern psychology? Did not the disciples use it in the upper room in preparation for the coming of the Holy Spirit? Did not Christ exemplify true transparency and declare that His burden was light? Did not James point out that double-mindedness and ambivalence are sources of many ills?

The final class period for the term was an eight-hour session off the campus at a summer retreat high in the mountains. It was intended to be a form of group psychotherapy session. It turned out to be a near orgy that bordered on free love. This was declared to be a passionate experience of reconciliation and mutual acceptance for which no claim was made for permanent or lasting value. The love and personal acceptance that a lone abstainer had expressed for each one in the group was then suspect as being more pretended than real. Why did something that seemed to come so close to a Christian ideal fall so far short of that ideal? Why do such vaunted intellectual trajectories appear to fall short of their mark? With what adaptation may we use proved techniques, or any knowledge that may be gained, so that it may afford us abiding spiritual values?

G. Campbell Morgan pointed out that the primal fall of man resulted from a defamation of God's character in the mind of man. Man's emotion and will had succumbed to Satan's device in rapid succession. Our restoration to God has happened in the reverse order. Our encounter with the authoritative and preached Word produced repentance; the will submitted to God first. That made the development of love to God possible. This kindled emotion then penetrated the bastion that was closed to a personal knowledge of God, that is, the mind.

Blaise Pascal (1623-62) stated it succinctly when he said, "God has so willed that divine truths should not enter the heart through the understanding, but that they should enter the understanding through the heart. For while one must know human things to love them, one must love divine things to know them." Our Lord set forth this order as the criterion for spiritual understanding and enlightenment. "He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me: and he that loveth me shall be loved of my Father, and I will love him, and will manifest myself to him." This order of learning encounters some contradiction with the usual order of learning and it seems to account for some of the reason why mankind's moral development has not kept pace with its technical and intellectual development.

Kindness is one thing you can't give away— it always comes back.

"Church: What's Good About It?"

By Richard Bartholomew

Recently I was involved in a group that was discussing the inaccuracy of the news given by the various media. It was suggested that quite often the news does not give us a true picture of existing conditions. Erroneous reporting, and careless selection of news to be printed were among reasons suggested for our blurred understanding of world events.

During the course of this brief discussion it suddenly came to me that the Christian can be just as guilty if he distorts the "news" of the kingdom of God. The image of the church has sometimes been distorted due to erroneous reporting and/or the improper selection of news to be released by her members.

Now I am not suggesting that corporately we ignore our sins, deaden our guilt, and surrender to the mediocre backslapping status quo. Never! We as Christians are changed persons in the process of change, and a very real part of that growth is admission of and confession of sin. The world thus sees the mercy and the grace of God active in our experience.

However, I am concerned with the church member who can see practically nothing right about the church. This type of character can be found murmuring and complaining about anything imaginable within the church. Somehow he equates the ability to criticize and maim with being holy and operates with the basic assumption that "good" Christians are quite naturally called to be "sanctified nit pickers." (By the way, "nit pickers" can be either conservative or liberal.) I believe it is high time that the people of God started talking more of the goodness of the church. We have criticized ourselves so fully that it is small wonder that some have turned away from church while others in our communities have rejected the church as insincere and impotent. Our witness must be positive. Unredeemed persons have problems enough without some misguided Christian burdening them with the sins of the church. "Church: What's Good About It?" That's a question I want my congregation to give some serious thought and answers to.

If you are going to use personal illustrations in your talks, please give testimonies, not of how you achieved, or got the last word or outwitted someone in a theological discussion while you were traveling on the train or airplane. Now, if you want to testify that you were in conversation with an unsaved person, he desperately needed the Lord, and you desperately needed the Lord’s help in presenting Christ, and you felt the mighty inner strengthening of the Holy Spirit in your witness experience, that would be different. It would be different also if your stories would tell how God met some other dire need in your life when you were experiencing fears, bitterness, or discouragement. You see, it helps us so much to hear how God meets a need rather than to hear how gifted or successful you are as a person.

Please do not use a church worship service to give your ego a boost. A better place would be at home asking your wife if she still loves you or throwing a ball far into space for your hero-worshiping son.

You don’t really want to inspire your audience with your own adequacy. They will be helped only to the extent that you convince them of the adequacy of Christ for their dilemma, and the best thing you could possibly do would be to testify how He helped you in yours.

Honestly, some members in your audience wonder if God is going to do anything about your present dilemma—speaking too much about yourself. We’d rather hear you speak about Christ and how He meets real human problems. He’s the Man we need most.

Relevance or Reverence

If the Vietnam War were over today, the race problem settled tonight; if every man lived in a mansion and had a PhD—there would still be a lost world to save and a great gospel to proclaim.

Talk about relevance! No one is more relevant than Christ, for He is the same “yesterday, and to day, and for ever.” Men write books and title them Beyond Barth, or Beyond Freud, or Beyond Bonhoeffer. But no one has ever written a book and titled it Beyond Jesus, for Jesus Christ is always up-to-date. In every age, He is the Eternal Contemporary.

Yes, by all means, let’s be relevant. But may God forgive us if, in the name of relevance, we lose our reverence for everything we say we believe and stand for.—William C. Fisher.

Shadow over the World

I hold my small son’s trusting hand,
I meet his clear-eyed gaze.
With mother-hearts in every land,
My own heart prays:

“God grant the bright day yet may come,
To make the whole world glad —
When war no more will claim our sons . . .”

(Oh, my little lad!)

Ministers discouraged with their preaching should not turn away from it and confine themselves to counseling individuals, but should "preach louder," according to the noted psychiatrist Karl Menninger.

Comparing preaching to preventive medicine, he said it was not enough to heal those who are sick, but people must also be told to stop destroying themselves.

"It is time for clergymen to speak out," he asserted. "You should not be in the silent majority but the evocative minority. People are moved by what you say."

Dr. Menninger was a featured speaker at a three-day conference of ministers, psychiatrists, and others in the counseling field. Sponsored by the American Foundation of Religion and Psychiatry, the interdisciplinary convocation was on the theme, "The Revolution in Values."

Dr. Menninger urged the ministers to preach particularly about water and air pollution and other practices damaging to the physical environment. "If I were a clergymen, I don't think I could preach about anything else than 'when are you going to stop destroying this beautiful planet?'"

"The magazines have taken up this issue, and I wish the clergymen would," he said. "It is a matter of the soul, a matter of our survival."

Throughout the misty night they trudged silently from a place of the dead, Arlington National Cemetery, to carry the name of a dead American serviceman, to the Capitol Building.

Between 45,000 and 46,000 mostly college-age marchers began their 40-hour, four-mile "March Against Death" about 6:00 p.m. on Nov. 13, the first day of the three-day anti-war protest in Washington, D.C. There were some older people.

They came from many parts of the country, but most of them from east of the Mississippi River, fellows with long hair and beards or moustaches and clean-shaven fellows with short hair, and girls mostly in slacks or jeans, each carrying a lighted white candle shielded by a paper cup.

They marched across a bridge spanning the Potomac River, around the Lincoln Memorial, past the Washington Monument, in front of the White House (where each shouted the name of the dead GI whose name appeared on the placard hung around his neck), down Pennsylvania Avenue to the steps at the west front of the Capitol.

The walk took about 2 1/2 hours.

At the Capitol, they crossed in front of the facade and then proceeded to Union Square, the little plot with statuary in the middle of the traffic circle at the foot of Capitol Hill.

There the marchers placed their placards in 12 unpainted plywood coffins set up on crepe-covered tables at the base of the statue of Ulysses S. Grant, Civil War hero and postwar president.

There was an almost religious mood to the whole affair, starting with the official start of the march, led off by a 23-year-old war widow, Mrs. Judith Droz of Columbia, Mo., whose husband, Donald, a Navy lieutenant, was killed in Vietnam last spring.

Appearing at a press conference earlier in the day, Mrs. Droz declared with intense emotion that her husband, just before his death, had written her that "we should not get out of Vietnam tomorrow — we should get out of Vietnam today."

The relatively young Church of the Nazarene scored impressive gains during the decade of 1959-69, reports from denominational offices in Kansas City, Mo., showed this week.

During the 10-year period, Nazarene church membership and Sunday school enrollment increased 30 percent while giving for all purposes nearly doubled. Per capita giving was up 57 percent. Highlights:

- World membership reached 471,846 persons — an increase of 110,202, or 30 percent ahead of the 361,644 total in 1959.
- Sunday school enrollment climbed 228,601, or 29 percent, to a total of 1,013,724.
- Per capita giving hit a record $213.26 in 1969 — or $77.75, 57 percent more than the $135.51 figure in 1959.

Cigarettes caused more deaths than war, violence, and riots during the past year, according to Dr. Ashbel C. Williams, former president of the American Cancer Society.

"Evidence gathered in the last 15 years proves beyond doubt that the people who make and sell cigarettes are now, through no fault of their own, in the tragic position of being merchants of death," he said.

According to a recent Gallup Poll survey, 40 percent of the nation's adults favor legislation to legalize abortion during the first three months of pregnancy.

A national sample of 1,511 persons over 21 were asked, "Would you favor or oppose a law which would permit a woman to go to a doctor to end pregnancy at any time during the first three months?"

The responses based on religious affiliations showed 80 percent of Jews, 40 percent of Protestants, and 31 percent of Catholics were in favor of such a law.

A breakdown of age classifications showed that 46 percent of respondents in their twenties, 39 percent of those between 30 and 49, and 38 percent of the over-50 group would favor such legislation.

The world's Christian population will be 31.2 percent of the total in the year 2000 as compared with 30.7 percent in 1965, according to estimates reported at a meeting of the National Council of Churches' General Board.

Focus of the Christian world will have shifted from the Western and Northern white races to the nonwhite regions of the Southern Hemisphere, the projections also indicated.

A survey of ministers in 20 Protestant denominations reveals that their incomes are far below the averages of most other professionals and many craftsmen and laborers and that most clergymen feel they are underpaid.

Nevertheless, only one in 20 is thinking of leaving the ministry to secure more income.

The median income for full-time American ministers in 1968 was $8,037, including salary, housing value, utilities allowance, and fees.

Of the denominations studied, the current survey found that Unitarian Universalist ministers had the highest median income ($10,412), and ministers of the Church of God had the lowest ($6,639).

Median income in the other denominations follows: United Presbyterian, $9,301; Reformed Church in America, $9,136; Episcopal, $9,104; Presbyterian, U.S., $8,682; United Church of Christ, $8,591; American Lutheran, $8,443; Lutheran Church in America, $8,425; Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), $8,382; Evangelical Covenant Church, $8,062; Lutheran Church in Missouri Synod, $8,051; United Methodist Church, $7,946; American Baptist Convention, $7,490; Church of the Brethren, $7,295; Cumberland Presbyterian Church, $7,253; Open Bible Standard, $7,214; Southern Baptist Convention, $6,874; Friends United Meeting, $6,838; and Evangelical Free Church, $6,676.

Of the $8,037 median income, 76.4 percent was in cash salary, 17 percent in housing, 4.9 percent in utilities, and 1.7 percent in fees. One in six clergymen received less than $6,000 in 1968, and one in six more than $10,000.
These Letters Are More Than Words

Kids fighting, baby crying, dishes to wash, shirts to iron—a dead end street for many American wives, and no one cares. No one gives her encouragement or even wants to listen to her; not even her husband whom she may suspect of having an affair with another woman.

This kind of story could be told of thousands of people in the United States with slight variations of age, sex, and situation of the individual. Problems continue to build up with no release until, in many cases, there is divorce, a mental breakdown, suicide, or some other tragic result.

One of the most desperate needs of people is some means of expressing themselves and knowing they are understood. Not just talking to a wall or a fence post, but to another person who can understand because he or she also has the same needs and feelings. In fact, every human being needs such an outlet to maintain a healthy state of mind.

But millions of people have no such outlet; and mechanization, automation, and other characteristics of modern society are accentuating the problem. People are becoming isolated and feel depersonalized and worthless.

Of course there are psychiatrists, pastors, social workers, trained counselors, etc., to listen to people with problems. But there are far too many people with deep needs. What about the countless numbers of individuals who, for various reasons, never seek a qualified counselor? Who is going to be willing to help them even if it means only listening?

There are many factors which prevent people from seeking professional help. The high cost is probably the most obvious obstacle. However, a more important factor which discourages individuals from expressing their problems is fear. The public image of pastors and other trained persons is not always one to inspire confidence in the minds of distraught people. These people fear being pushed into a situation which seems more uncomfortable than just covering up a problem. They fear exposure to friends and community if they seek help nearby.

A pastor is thought of, by many people, as a disapprover and not a sympathizer. The church often seems to be a demanding and coercive force, and someone with a problem may fear anything connected with it.

People do not like to admit that they are in trouble and need professional help because a popular, if mistaken, view is that psychiatrists are for people who are really "messes up"; and sadly enough, people with such severe problems are looked upon as oddities.

So it seems only logical that there be some provision for people who need to talk it out but will only do it if they can retain a sense of privacy and can control the exposure of themselves. And this is precisely what the staff at Mennonite Broadcasts in Harrisonburg, Va., tries to do.

Because radio does not push its way into the lives of people, an offer of help in this way is more acceptable to many individuals. When corresponding with someone several hundred or several thousand miles away the fear of exposure to one's immediate community is not a problem. And it allows the person to prove the confidence of his counselor before committing himself too deeply.

At Mennonite Broadcasts, radio speakers David Augsburger and Ella May Miller, and counselors Paul Roth and Eva Stauffer are involved in correspondence with approximately 150 persons per month. Through counseling by letter individuals in trouble may gradually be persuaded to seek face-to-face help, whereas an abrupt approach might have sent them away permanently. For example, there are persons who have been or are contemplating suicide; and only the gentle, obvious concern of an understanding letter prevents them from destroying themselves. The constant reminder that someone is concerned, but is not trapping them may be the only way to bring them back toward self-acceptance.

There are many examples proving that this method is effective in reassuring people with problems. One lady wrote to Eva Stauffer, "How I do thank God to be able to write to you . . . . It has helped me so much to get advice and counsel. . . . Sometimes I get so despondent and wish I could pour out my bitterness and fear to someone." Another lady wrote, "Again, I can't praise the Lord enough for all He has done and is doing through the prayers and programs. My whole life has been revolutionized."

Radio reaches these lonely, depressed, or desperate persons . . . a letter opens a tentative, cautious friendship . . . correspondence provides opportunity for expressing feelings and venting fears. And counsel by mail can lead to contact in person with counselors who lift a bit of the burden and make life bearable once more.

The counseling staff at Mennonite Broadcasts believes that to speak of the love of Christ is not enough. It must be demonstrated in genuine Christian concern and involvement in the needs of our brother.

Plans for Mission '70

Mission '70, the 64th annual meeting of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, is scheduled to be held July 1 to 7, 1970. The meetings will be held at the Christopher Dock Mennonite School near Lansdale, Pa. The Franconia conference district located in Eastern Pennsylvania will host this year's meeting. The theme is "The Spirit of the Lord upon Me" a phrase taken from Luke 4:18, 19.

The public sessions of the Board will be held July 2-4. The business sessions for Board members will be held both preceding and following the public sessions. You are urged to mark these dates in your calendar for this coming summer and then to watch the Gospel Herald every two weeks for further announcements.

Ministers' Course Is Outlined

"Exalting Christ in Our Time" is theme for the annual Ministers' Week program at Eastern Mennonite College Jan. 26-30. This will follow a special two-week Ministers' Course Jan. 12-23, according to George R. Brunk, dean of Eastern Mennonite Seminary.

"The two-week Ministers' Course is designed for pastors and church workers who desire an immersion in topical studies, pastoral procedures, and worship resources," said Brunk. "The Ministers' Week which follows deals more with current issues facing the pastor."

Discussion leaders for the Ministers' Course will be C. J. Ramer of Duchess, Alta., moderator of the Alberta-Saskatchewan Conference, and John R. Mumaw, professor of Christian education at EMC and former moderator of Mennonite General Conference.

The Ministers' Course will focus on book studies of Leviticus, Hebrews, and Acts. These will be supplemented by daily lectures entitled "The Minister's Library," and "Renewal in the Pulpit." The book studies will be led by Ramer, the latter by Mumaw.

Exploring the theme "Exalting Christ in Our Time" will be Norman Derstine, director of church relations at EMC; Paul Erb, visiting professor of biblical literature at EMC and former editor of the Gospel Herald; Lois G. Clemens, editor of the WMSA Voice; Tom Skinner, black evangelist; Frank Peters, president of Lutheran University and moderator of the Mennonite Brethren Conference; and Myron S. Augsburger.
Ministers may register for these courses. A nominal fee will be assessed for room and board.

Church Music Is Theme for Spring Events

A three-week seminar in church music and a three-day churchwide music conference will be held at Goshen College in the spring of 1970. Both will use the new Mennonite Hymnal and the Walcker pipe organ, the latter a gift of Mrs. Fannie Rupp Severn.

The seminar, April 27 to May 19, will be taught by Mary K. Oyer, professor of music and will be one of the courses offered during the first 3 1/2-week term of the spring trimester. By special plans already completed, persons with little or no college are welcome to full-time study as those with previous study.

Seminar highlights will be study of various liturgies, including Lutheran, Anglican-Episcopal, and Roman Catholic, and a recital by a well-known organist. The J. D. Hartzler hymnal collection will be used extensively. John Ruth, an authority on American hymnody, will be one of the guest lecturers.

The conference, May 1-3, also under Prof. Oyer, will introduce the new hymnal and organ preludes for its hymns. Myron Casner, long-time church organist, will perform preludes to hymns for which preludes exist. Organ works for other tunes in the hymnal have been commissioned and will be performed for the first time during the conference, which will be their world premiere.

Among those playing the new works will be Mrs. Lowell Byler, of Hesston College, and Philip K. Clemens, of Eastern Mennonite College, both GC graduates.

The conference, recitals, guest lecturers, and commissions are being made possible through the kindness of friends of the college.

More information on the seminar and conference is available from Prof. Oyer, Goshen College.

Headquarters Returns to Santa Cruz

The MCC-Bolivia headquarters moved from Cochabamba to Santa Cruz the first of January 1970 because of plans to expand the program in that area.

The call to commit itself to long-range programs in Bolivia, cooperating with missions and national churches, is reflected in the plans for MCC to construct a more permanent headquarters. Also, it was impossible to rent adequate facilities in Santa Cruz because of the city's rapid development.

Two years ago the headquarters was moved from Santa Cruz, the site MCC occupied since 1963, to Cochabamba, nearly 200 miles away. When the lease of the property expired at Santa Cruz, Cochabamba was chosen then as the location where the total program of MCC-Bolivia could best be handled.

At that time there was considerable reluctance to leave Santa Cruz because of its proximity to the majority of MCC volunteers at work with Bolivian nationals and with Indian resettlement schemes. Santa Cruz is a more convenient base from which to more effectively administer these programs.

Presently more than 40 MCC personnel are at work in Bolivia, predominantly in agriculture and community development, education and medicine.

What Is Happening at Bethel?

On Nov. 6, 1969, the Bethel Day Care Center, administered by the Bethel Community Church at 1434 South Laffin on the near west side of Chicago, was closed after a stalemate in negotiations and subsequent threats of physical take-over by a group calling itself Midwest Day Care Center, Inc. The action of the church council was taken as a safety precaution for nursery children and personnel.

Representatives from Mennonite Board of Missions and the Illinois conference district had met in consultation with the church council and with the Midwest group, but one of the major difficulties, still not fully resolved, was ascertaining who the group really was, where they came from, and what they wanted to do. Simon Gingerich, Assistant Secretary for Home Missions and Evangelism, states that the Midwest group probably had some of the same problems "having to deal with the nursery staff, team ministry, Mission Boards and black congregation. We were all wearing dark glasses—at least the effect was the same."

John Powell, secretary of the Urban Racial Council at Mennonite Board of Missions, and Simon Gingerich have been working together in consultation with the Bethel Church.

What are the prospects for reopening the nursery?

John: The prospects are questionable if the church acts unilaterally. West Side Organization (backing Midwest) has a way of putting the squeeze on an organization which does not cooperate. The church must be in communication with Midwest and let them know what they are doing and how they plan to do it.

Must the staff be black?

John: I would prefer not an all-black staff, neither an all-white staff, but an interracial staff that is "Black-minded."

What has happened at Bethel since the nursery was closed?

Simon: Regular Sunday services have been conducted without interruption in the building which served both as the nursery and the worship center. The nursery is one of the church's most important community service projects. The members of the congregation are anxious to reopen. The crucial need at Bethel is for a full-time black pastor to coordinate and relate to the whole work.

What is being done in anticipation of reopening the nursery?

Simon: Ruth Kehr, director of the nursery, has been contacting leaders in various community agencies on the near west side in order to ascertain their understanding of the situation and to solicit counsel. She has also tried to find out how much support the Bethel Church has from the community for the program. A petition was circulated and there appears to be overwhelming support in the community for the Bethel nursery program.

What about financial support?

Simon: The nursery had been operating on a minimal budget provided by fees for the 40 children and by subsidy from the congregation. The subsidy was mainly in the use of the facilities on a rent-free basis. Operation on the minimal budget was made possible partly by VS personnel who were responsible for overall maintenance and for 3 persons on the teaching staff. To re-establish the program, the nursery will need an additional $800 a month in order to hire...
Services Unaffected by Colony Sale

Tres Palmas Mennonite Colony, northeast of Santa Cruz, Bolivia, sold its land to the Orillas Cotton Company, a national Bolivian enterprise. The sale of 1,000 acres included the 12 acres on which the Mennonite Central Committee housed its clinic facilities and agricultural extension services.

Begun in the early 1950's, the Tres Palmas Colony was the first such to be established in Bolivia by Mennonite colonists arriving from Paraguay. The colony of less than 15 families never experienced solidarity, and in the past years was beginning to disintegrate.

The large Bolivian corporation organized for modern production of cotton had purchased large tracts of land surrounding Tres Palmas, and finally in last October reached an agreement with the colony in securing its land.

The MCC unit of two nurses and an agriculturist couple serve both the colonists and the national Bolivians, with 80 percent of their efforts centering on the nationals. During the past year the nurses expanded their public health work to villages and the wife of the agriculturist started sewing classes; the agriculturist, in addition to continuing the programs with poultry and Heifer Project dairy animals, surveyed five villages in the surrounding area to determine needs for new projects.

MCC is to vacate its facilities within two years. During this time, the agriculture and medical program will carry on much as it has.

Eight TAP teachers arrived in December in the Santa Cruz area to begin a new venture for TAP into Latin America. While the TAP-ers are placed in national schools, their presence will help round out the total MCC ministry in that area, with education joining agricultural and medical services.

Youth Director Named Draft Aide

Donald B. Kraybill, Salunga, Pa., was recently appointed to a nine-member Youth Advisory Committee to Pennsylvania's Director of Selective Service.

Kraybill is employed at the Lancaster Conference Salunga (Pa.) headquarters as Youth Director, and as associate director of the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions voluntary service program.

The advisory committee to Brig. Gen. Henry M. Gross, the state's Selective Service director, is an official group organized by President Nixon to provide youth a voice in the draft system. The idea originated with Gen. Lewis B. Hershey, national draft director, and was augmented by President Nixon, who authorized committees in the 50 states plus U.S. territories.

The purpose of the committee is "to give a definite voice to young people on the operation and regulations of the Selective Service System," said Gen. Gross, when the newly organized group met recently for the first time in Harrisburg, Pa.

Kraybill, who believes the current lottery draft system is inequitable, said: "My job will be to represent the feelings, opinions, and views of other conscientious objectors across the state."

An ordained minister of the Lancaster Conference Mennonite Church, Kraybill is one of the pastors at the Willow Street Mennonite Church, south of Lancaster. He is a graduate of Eastern Mennonite College.

Kraybill finds such a youth advisory committee to be little more than a public relations move on the part of the Nixon administration "to make youth think they have a voice in the policy-making decisions of Selective Service."

"But I think it can do some good," he added. "The state draft officials will at least be coming in contact with the opinions of youth. They'll get a better understanding of how young people feel about the draft."

Rock Transfers to Saigon

Martin Rock, administrative assistant for Peace Section at the Mennonite Central Committee, Akron, Pa., has transferred to Vietnam Christian Service for a three-year term of service. He will serve as administrative assistant to Robert Miller in the Saigon office.

Rock served at MCC from August 1966 to December 1969 with the Peace Section. He was involved with selective service and I-W matters. Before coming to MCC, he served two and one-half years in voluntary service with the Church of the Brethren at Elgin, Ill., as Volunteer Administrative Assistant.

Rheinheimer Reports

Rollin Rheinheimer, director of marketing for Menno Travel Service, Ephrata, Pa., has returned to his office following an extensive familiarization tour to Germany.

Rheinheimer was a member of a group composed of travel agents, tour organizers, and travel writers. The tour was arranged to cover a number of major German cities and was hosted by the German National Tourist office, German Federal Railroads, and Lufthansa German Airlines.

He reported West Germans as affluent, the culture lively, and prosperity as a mark on the national scene wherever he visited.

Rheinheimer traveled also to East Berlin. Of this experience he said, "Here I received a completely different impression. People seem less happy and the streets much less crowded than in West Berlin. Crossing to East Berlin was simple and easy although the inspection by immigration and border officials was very thorough."

Part of his time in Germany was spent making final arrangements for the large number of 1970 Encounter Tours which Menno Travel Service is planning for this year — especially those featuring the Oberammergau Passion Play in Germany.
Classroom Is a Miniature United Nations

Gradually my friends are learning that I am no longer in Gaberones, but am now in Gabore. However, it is not really the place that has changed, but rather, the spelling and the pronunciation. Our city was one of a large number of towns that underwent this change in the process of Africanization.

Thornhill School, where I teach, is in some ways typical and in other ways atypical of Botswana. We have been reminded by our headmistress that Thornhill's purpose is to provide education for the children of expatriates employed in Botswana by the government. A high standard of teaching is desired so that these children can successfully make the transfer to a school in their home country.

Because of this, it is hoped that enough qualified teachers are available—a situation which is seldom the case for a Botswana primary school. Our headmistress is delighted with our three-year TAP contracts, as we are the first promise of continuity of staff. Formerly, nearly all teachers have been wives of men employed here, so the duration of their stay was determined not by the school term, but by the period of their husbands' contracts. One pupil has had seven teachers in two years. I am the third teacher my class has had this year.

One of the real challenges for the Christian teacher here is that we have in our student body the children of top-ranking government officials. It would seem that these children are most likely to be involved in future leadership positions. Thus, proper education is a necessity.

Bertha Tiessen, another TAP-er, has the honor of teaching the president's twin sons, and I have a daughter of the minister of state. The vice-president's children, as well as those of several cabinet ministers, also attend. I am sure we TAP-ers will never again have such distinguished pupils as we will have these next three years.

The school also has the appearance of a miniature United Nations, as it includes students from Sweden, Holland, Portugal, China, Zambia, South Africa, the United States and many from the United Kingdom.

President Khama's desire is that Botswana can be an example to the world of how several races can live together peacefully. He has great hopes for the future of his country, and Thornhill students are almost certain to have important roles in the country's developments.—Joan Berge, TAP.

These Are Our Friends

Deep in the hills of Eastern Kentucky flows a small stream of water known as Tubia Branch. Near the mouth of the hollow, in a small, white frame house, live Hubert and Susan Whitaker and their 23-year-old daughter, Norma. Tubia Branch has always been home to the Whitakers. Following their marriage, the Whitakers purchased a piece of wooded area. Hub and Susan grubbed the land and built their own log house. When Hub joined the army, Susan stayed home. These were hard years for her, feeding and clothing the children, working a garden and caring for the livestock. After Hub's release from the army, his working years were spent in logging and at a sawmill. In addition to this, she has always raised several acres of corn and a large garden. The corn is planted by hand in late spring, hoed, or worked with their mule, and left to grow until foddering time. Now, besides working on his small mountain farm, Hub seeks light work locally.

For the past several years Susan has been supplementing their small monthly veteran's check by making rag dolls. Her Hillbilly Dolls have found their way into Gift Shops throughout the United States. Each finished doll reflects the pride, character, and dedication of a mountain craftsman. The doll money has brought a renewed sense of dignity to the Whitaker home, after many years of work and struggle against a hard mountain life. With pride, Susan shows her first electric stove, her red-and-white checked linoleum covering their three-room house, the freshly painted walls and the new curtains. Susan is quick to point out that these things have come because of her doll-making.

Susan has been helpful in the craft development program in Letcher County. In 1968 she was the only doll-maker, one year later there were six busy ladies making dolls, all who were taught by Susan.

It has been a year and a half since we first stepped up on the Whitaker porch. Often we come away from a beautiful mountain family feeling that we have gained more than we have given, and happy to know that they are our friends.—Glenn and Kathryn Yost, MCC VS Appalachia.

Accepts Assignment in Congo

Joyce Bratton, administrative assistant for overseas services at Mennonite Central Committee, Akron, Pa., has accepted a six-to nine-month assignment in the Congo. This is a special assignment to help bridge to a new administrative team required by the growth of the Congo program to some 60 people. Miss Bratton will return to the Akron staff at the end of this period.

Miss Bratton will serve as administrative assistant to Ray Brubaker, newly appointed MCC Congo director, at the MCC headquarters in Kinshasa. She will aid Brubaker in the programming and administration of personnel and finances.

She has served with MCC for 12 years. For the past eight years she has been involved in the work of Africa and the Middle East in the overseas department.

She is the daughter of Mrs. Alice Bratton, McVeytown, Pa., and a member of the Akron Mennonite Church, Akron, Pa.

cer, Sao Paulo, Brazil, teacher; Hector Boya-jian, Cordoba, Argentina, physical therapist and final year student at Brethren Bible College, Cordoba; Adriana Matteucci, Buenos Aires, Argentina, second year medical student.

The Congregation in the 70's

Congregations in the 70's will have an increasing need for resources in determining their purposes in relation to local mission opportunities. They will need to take more responsibility in decision-making. They must learn to take the gifts of people seriously in shaping their programs and activities. There will be new dimensions in worship, lay involvement, the use of media, and in person-to-person and corporate witness.

It will be exciting for congregations of the Mennonite Church to step into the 70's. Laurelville Mennonite Center, Mt. Pleasant, Pa. invites congregations to send persons to participate on Feb. 6-8 in a special retreat focusing on the issues which God is calling us all to face. Paul G. Landis and Chester L. Wenger are the resource leaders.
Philip Miller was ordained to the office of bishop, Dec. 21, at the Mt. Pleasant Church, Chesapeake, Va. He will serve the congregations of the Norfolk District of Virginia Conference. The service was in charge of J. Ward Shank and Linden M. Wenger. Truman H. Brunk preached the sermon.

Martin Weber, chaplain at the Attmore prison farm in Alabama, has been asked to serve also as chaplain at the new maximum security prison in Attmore. The first group of prisoners recently arrived in the unit. Weber, an Eastern Mission Board appointee, is eager to establish a good library for these men. Sunday schools and individual persons are invited to contribute books. Such books may be forwarded to Weber at Star Route A, Attmore, Ala. 36502, or to Salunga headquarters, 17538.

Telling children Bible stories for the first time and teaching adults what the Bible is about is part of Mr. and Mrs. Floyd Siebers’ work in Choele-Choe!, Argentina. “Do pray for the Spirit’s guidance for each step so that His perfect will be done to the salvation of souls for His great kingdom.”

The first comprehensive public health program associated with Dhamtari Christian Hospital has been set up by Kay Yutz in Dhamtari, India. Health services include a dental clinic, a school health program, observation at a small rural hospital and the Leprosy Hospital at Shantipur. A leprosy survey, education and treatment (SET) service is also conducted in remote villages. Santoshini Masih, a 1969 Post-Graduate School graduate, is to assume responsibility for the program. She will appreciate your prayers.

The Mennonite Church in Tottori, Kusih, Japan, was formed on Nov. 26, 1969, with the baptism of three individuals and the transfer of seven other persons, including the Charles Shenks, from the Tsurugadai congregation. The charter group read a commitment they had written which included a pledge to mutual consultation in major decisions such as employment and marriage.

Lester Hershey, Director and Speaker of Luz y Verdad in Aibonito, Puerto Rico, recently spent 21 days in Mexico on radio business and served as evangelist for the three Mennonite congregations at Mexico City and Puebla. As the financial deficit of the radio work climbs Hershey is optimistic: “We are sure there are many ready to share this financial load if they knew of the specific needs. We will be most happy to send you such a list if you are interested in helping.”

In the pages of this well-outlined, profusely documented volume, the reader feels he is thinking with a writer who tries to be fair, neither wholly justifying nor completely condemning the church. The reader is led to appreciate and to learn from the sociologist as he examines the sociological as well as the spiritual forces at work in the church. The author says in the last chapter: “I do not know what the future of the church as it is presently constituted might be” p. 186. He feels its goal cannot be better stated than in the words of H. Richard Niebuhr, “The goal of the church [is] the increase among men of the love of God and neighbor.” It will help us in our Mennonite brotherhood to realize that there are powerful sociological forces of status, economics, prestige, professional position, etc., that tend to be much more determinative in our congregations than the teaching of the Scriptures as far as our patterns of life are concerned. We need a book like this to help us see ourselves, and to understand the humanness of the church.

Some books are made attractive by their titles. This is one that commends itself by its contents. The author has succeeded in writing a book without the use of technological terms, although he is an accomplished archaeologist. He is concerned with more than the facts he has learned from his “digging’s”; he has turned to the Gospels with devotional insights and interprets the meaning of facts he has discovered. After reading this book one lays it down with a feeling of assurance that he has met the “historical” Christ. It gives one an acquaintance with settings in which Jesus lived, taught, and worked. Don’t let the title scare you away from this book. It holds for you both devotional stimulus and spiritual insights along with the interesting observations about the life and times of Jesus. Good for the church library.

How in the World? is intended to examine the possibilities of greater involvement by Christians in the dissemination of the gospel through literature and electronic media. It is estimated that in the next five years three hundred and fifty million persons between the ages of fifteen and fifty will learn to read. The challenge is, what will be available for them to read and what will they choose? What an opportunity this presents to the American Christian who is living in the midst of abundance.

This book is important for all those in-

- Almost everyone concerned will have the benefit of the gospel and county is in one way or another through the church and its role in society. The theologian defines and explains the church, its mission and essence. The sociologist does some empirical studies and defines the church from that point of view. The author of this book, a sociologist as well as a minister, discusses the competency of both the theologian and the sociologist to analyze and evaluate the church. The theologian defines the church as described in the Scripture and the sociologist observes and reports that the church is a group of people influenced more by the society in which it functions than by the God it worships. He contends that the church functions to confirm and justify the society in its life, and rarely if ever corrects or judges it.

volved in printing, teaching, or who are in radio and TV programming. It will be of great assistance in creating germ ideas, methods, and action.—C. J. Ramer

These messages were first given as lectures at the university where the author teaches. While coming from a university setting, they are not so "intellectual" that they are beyond the average reader.

He develops the theme in a twofold way. First, showing the historical development that reveals Christ's greatness and tracing this through the biblical narrative. Then second, showing that the appreciation of that greatness is the key to Christian progress. This second part is very practical and useful.—Norman Derstine.

With more than usual readability and common sense How to Stay Married brings a realistic approach to marriage. The authors give advice from their long experience in the Family Service Association of America. The contents deal with the challenges and rewards of modern marriage, learning to live with a spouse, ways of expressing emotion, the roles one plays in marriage, and meeting emotional needs.

The authors say that the book is about the perils, pressures, and the pleasures of being human and living in families. They present them well.

The book could be read by those contemplating marriage as well as the married. Fine for church libraries.—Helen Alderfer.

Whatever comes from the pen of this author is worth reading and buying. Like his other works, this message on the primacy of evangelism is well organized and based on sound scholarship.

He analyses the four basic causes of "our guilty silence." He says, "Either we have no compelling incentive even to try to speak, or we do not know what to say, or we are not convinced that it is our job, or we do not believe we shall do any good, because we have forgotten the source of power. These four uncertainties and their remedies form the substance of this book. First we shall consider the greatest evangelistic incentive, which is concern for the 'glory of God.' Next, we shall seek to summarize the evangelistic message or the 'gospel of God.' Thirdly, we shall examine the evangelistic agency, which is the 'church of God'; and finally we shall remind ourselves of the only true evangelistic dynamic, namely, the 'Spirit of God.'"

The small paperback deals with a big subject, "The Church, the Gospel, and the World," and it is packed full of real content. Every Christian who is seriously concerned about the church and his own ministry should read this book.—Norman Derstine.

In 1963, an updated Confession of Faith was adopted by Mennonite General Conference. Each of the 20 articles in abbreviated form is here interpreted "for the younger generation." The material of this booklet first appeared as a series of articles in the Youth's Christian Companion in 1967.

The purpose of the booklet as stated by the author is to help young people to believe more intelligently and to be able to answer questions concerning their faith. By making the meaning of the 20 articles understandable to youth, Paul Erb has produced a booklet which many older readers will appreciate too. In orthodox, yet in very readable style, the tenets of Mennonite faith are explained.

Designed for study and discussion purposes each chapter has appropriate questions. An attractive and meaningful feature is the artistic symbol introducing each chapter. Excellent for Mennonite Church libraries, but each home should have a copy as well.—Harold D. Lehman.

This is a book all of us should have read before the 1969 Mission Board meeting when we used the Book of James and the theme "Believing and Doing." This author makes the Book of James come alive; with humorous illustrations she causes the readers to want to read on. She discusses the kind of person this younger brother of Jesus must have been. She says his letter to those scattered sons of Abraham "was to buck them up, bawl them out, remind them of their privileges and responsibilities, and in general, jolt them out of their doldrums and into reality." "It's a great roaring letter by a great roaring man. If you want to get a good look at the phonies around you, you will enjoy reading it—with great roaring relish."

This is a very refreshing book, which will fascinate the young or older reader. Could well be used in small group Bible study. I highly recommend it.—Nelson E. Kaufman.

CHRIST AND THE POWERS

by Dr. H. Berkhof

The powers are the undergirding of creation, according to the author, and become evil in their influence only as they seek dominion for themselves. Here are some serious challenges to empire builders, organization men, denominationalism, and those who are tempted to depend upon past experience and tradition.

Here is an exciting book. It reveals the good that young men can achieve through the giving of themselves and their talent. It portrays in a new way the fact that real growth, mentally and spiritually, comes from putting both to work. The author has interviewed not only the men who have served in Pax but also the people of the communities in which they served. Interviews from more than a score of countries include refugees, doctors, government officials, farmers, teachers, community leaders, matrons, file clerks, villagers, administrators, nurses, children, and secretaries. Included in the book are 24 pages of photos.

This is one of the best books on the market to inspire young men to give their talents to God and mankind.

Montevideo Seminary Graduates Nine

Seminario Evangelico Menonita de Teologia, Montevideo, Uruguay, graduated nine students on Nov. 15, 1969, conferring two Bachelor of Theology degrees, one Licentiate in Theology and six Bible Study diplomas. The baccalaureate and graduation address was given by John Koppenhaver in Emmanuel Methodist Church. His message was entitled "Prophets of God or Slaves of the Ruling Structure?"

Founded in 1956 under the direction of Nelson Litwiller, the seminary continues to serve as the major Mennonite training center in South America for all Mennonite groups. The seminary provides three- to six-year programs in its various disciplines. In addition to theology it has strong music (with a touring chorus) and Christian education departments. Faculty and staff include Latins, Germans, and North Americans. The General Conference Commission on Overseas Missions, Newton, Kan., and Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart, together provide approximately one half of the faculty.

President Ernst Harder congratulates Gerd Dueck, Fernheim, Paraguay, after granting him the Bachelor of Theology degree. Dean John Driver presented the graduates for the granting of degrees.

Newly completed five-unit student family housing provides two bedrooms, bath, kitchen, and living room in each unit. Each is equipped with refrigerator, stove, water heater, space heater, and furniture. Doors between the units facilitate using the various rooms in different combinations. The Commission on Overseas Missions, Newton and the Elkhart Board each contributed $22,000 toward the total cost of $48,000.

Christian Education Is Risky

What’s happened to our boy? We tried to provide him with a good home, proper Christian teaching, and a college education, and now he turns out to be a draft resister.

I don’t understand our boy either. We, too, tried to rear him in a Christian church and now he wears long hair and blue jeans. Why can’t he dress like others?

Our daughter came home from school with a problem. Us! She said we should reconsider our middle-class affluence in terms of serving Christ and ministering to the needy of the world.

These are only a few of the risks we encounter through Christian education. Teaching changes lives. Our youth are taking seriously our teachings on honesty, simplicity, nonresistance, peacemaking, and nonconformity. What did we expect? Did we not mean what we taught?

Perhaps we have taught the principles of the Christian faith to our children in our homes, Sunday schools, church services, and special occasions, but we have practiced selective obedience. That is, we obeyed only the teachings of God and the Bible wherein it suited us.

We were honest with our fellow business associates; we wouldn’t cheat anyone knowingly, but how honest were we with God in giving our tithes and offerings? The Prophet Malachi talks about dishonesty with God.

Perhaps we taught the principles of simplicity, nonconformity in dress and habit, and now when our youth take us seriously, we reject them for the practice of our teaching. Oh! We didn’t mean it that way! Well, so we want to practice only selective obedience.

Yes, we taught the principles of nonresistance and living at peace with our fellowmen, and that we should be peace-makers, but why should our youth reject the orderly arrangement for making soldiers known as the “Selective Service System”? I guess we only want to select our obedience to Christ in terms of suitable accommodations. If it means to violate the governmental arrangement we will adhere to that rather than to the serious teachings of Christ.

Yes, Christian education is risky. Our children and youth take these teachings seriously. Lives are changed and responses to the world likewise. Our growing children and youth seek to be authentic and honest with all the teaching we give them.

By Still Waters

Have fervent charity among yourselves. 1 Peter 4:8.

Without a doubt the most difficult place to be Christian is among ourselves. Here is where the gospel is blamed very often. The world sees the lack of charity among those who claim to be Christ’s followers and cast the gospel aside as impossible.

This verse speaks much more than merely being nice and kind when everything and everyone is being nice. It is at points of pressure and difficulty that the Christian life is seen as unique. The world always produces illustrations of generosity, kindness, devotion, and even sacrifice. By many such acts the world admires and admits the regard and esteem such traits hold forth.

But there is something more distinctive here. It calls not for a charity when all goes well but a love which is loving even to the unlovable. In situations where persons stimulate rancor and rage, hate and animosity, that Christian love is to burn brightly.

This love Christ calls us to is more than gritting our teeth or grinning and bearing it. It is a love, instilled by the Holy Spirit which blesses when cursed, prays for when persecuted and seeks to help even when hurt.

As one person wrote, “This is the love that won an empire for Christ. The absence of this fervent love among us will lose the world to Antichrist.”

Listening Post or Leaning Post?

I have known Holly and her sister Nan for many years. But when I need the advice of a friend, I always turn to Holly. A new acquaintance asked me why.

“Watching you three together, I thought Nan seemed most —”

Nan is arrogant as well as possessive. If I happen to mention a problem, she tries to solve it then and there. She offers advice and insists that I follow it to the letter; if I don’t, she is offended. Furthermore, she makes demands upon my time that I am reluctant to meet. Nan is too much of a tyrant to be a true friend.

I think of Holly with delight and gratitude because she accepts me as I am, does not try to reform me, and makes no demands. She offers advice only when asked, and never arrogantly.

A true friend is a listening post, like Holly, not the leaning post Nan tries to be. — Nina Walter.
Tongues—Sign of the Spirit?

As one who is much interested in the charismatic movement of today I am saddened when unscriptural statements are made which build a basis of reproach for a movement which has much to offer the church.

If there is one thing clearly obvious, it is that the Christian church needs an outpouring of the Holy Spirit. The dynamic which only the Holy Spirit can give is desperately needed. The gifts of the Spirit are needed by the church. We have seen enough of the frenzied, foolish striving in the strength of the flesh. The frozen wastelands of formalism can be thawed only by the melting work of the Holy Spirit. Ritualistic religion will not do for those who seek a personal God who lives today. And, thank God, there are many signs that God’s Spirit is being poured out in these last days.

However, an idea which persists by word and inference many times is that the gift of tongues is a requirement, a test or mark of the Holy Spirit. This turns some off immediately because a remark or inference that speaking in tongues is the necessary evidence of the filling of the Holy Spirit is in direct opposition to Scripture.

While it is God’s will that all be filled with the Spirit, the Scripture clearly states that not all are given the gift of tongues. 1 Cor. 12:11, 30. Tongues is no more a test of the Spirit than teaching or preaching. Paul says we are not to deny this gift or magnify it above others. In fact, he says, “I would rather speak five words with my mind, in order to instruct others, than ten thousand words in a tongue.” This he says, not to disparage the gift of tongues but to point out its comparative significance in the body. It might be significant that through the centuries of the Christian faith the great spiritual giants do not testify to the possession of the gift of tongues.

Genuine religion has always been harassed by imitators. So we need the attitude of candor and caution in order to be receptive to all God’s blessings and to avoid false doctrine. Perhaps no other gift of the Spirit can so easily be imitated as tongues. On the other hand some have found not only a fresh but entirely new spiritual meaning and warmth in the exercise of this gift.

Scripture points out certain spiritual restrictions in regard to tongues. First only three people are permitted to speak in tongues. 1 Cor. 14:27. God does not desire confusion and disorder. Second, no more than one should speak at one time. 1 Cor. 14:27. A multiple display of tongues in public is contrary to Scripture. Third, where there is any public speaking in tongues there is to be an interpretation. 1 Cor. 14:28. And fourth, it appears women are excluded from speaking in tongues in a public service. 1 Cor. 14:34. Note that Paul’s statement “Let your women keep silence in the churches” is in the context of tongues. It is not in contradiction to woman’s vocal participation in the church in 1 Corinthians 11.

A careful study of 1 Corinthians, and the Book of Acts, gives no support to the idea that speaking in an unknown tongue is either the evidence of the baptism of the Holy Spirit or is a gift of the Holy Spirit to be coveted or sought above any other.

What is the test of the possession of the Holy Spirit? The sign of the Spirit is not one or two spectacular gifts but the exercise of the fruit of the Spirit: love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, and self-control. The gift of tongues is confined to approximately three chapters of the New Testament. The tongues of Pentecost is different from the ecstatic utterance in 1 Corinthians. It is mentioned in 1 Corinthians because of the misunderstanding of the gift, while the fruit of the Spirit is stressed throughout the Scripture.

So the power or baptism of the Holy Spirit is not attested primarily or necessarily by spectacular gifts but by the portrayal of inviolate character. Is one Christlike?

According to the Scripture the primary work of the Holy Spirit is to magnify Christ and make us Christlike. When we seek anything but Christ Himself we become confused by side issues and will finally fall. A big part of the trouble with the Corinthian church was that they had turned their eyes from Jesus Christ. So Paul came determined to know nothing except Jesus Christ and Him crucified. He tells them Christ, not tongues, must be the center of their striving and affection.

Thus, we do not forbid to speak in tongues. Wherever God’s Spirit is at work there this gift will likely be given to some persons just as the other gifts will be given to other persons. We do say, however, that when speaking in tongues becomes a test of the baptism of the Spirit there is false doctrine expressed.

Therefore it is good to remember that the test of the Holy Spirit’s control and baptism is not so much in the gifts of the Spirit but in the fruit of the Spirit. We are inclined to laud the former because they are spectacular. We need to long for the latter because they are spiritual. — D.
How Meaningful Is Baptism?

By Richard L. Bowman

Have we lost part of the significance of baptism by entombing it in the ritual of the church building? Or have we forgotten the true meaning of Christian baptism by combining it with the act of obtaining Mennonite Church membership?

It is time that together laymen and ordained leaders constructively examine our present practice of baptism, and then suggest changes to restore the maximum significance to this important ordinance.

Many hundreds of years have passed since Christ commissioned His disciples to baptize new believers. But in any reevaluation of the practice, the biblical purpose of baptism must be kept foremost in our discussion. Looking into the record of the early church in Acts, one finds that Peter on the day of Pentecost prescribed baptism to symbolize the remission of sins. Philip, when dealing with the Ethiopian, used it as a symbol of belief in Jesus as the Messiah, the Son of God. Throughout the remaining narrative of Acts the Christians administered water baptism upon repentance of sin and belief in Jesus as the Messiah, the Son of God.

Baptism is more clearly defined in Paul’s epistles. It is described in Galatians 3:26, 27 as an illustration of our union with Christ and in 1 Corinthians as a symbol that all Christians are members of one body, the body of Christ. Romans 6 goes into some depth explaining baptism as a symbol for the radical change in the Christian from an old life of sin to a new life yielded alive to God and His service.

Even though baptism has been shown only to be a symbol, the New Testament describes it as a very significant symbol. God, through the New Testament writers, never says that water baptism is needed for salvation. And yet in the New Testament the act of baptism is coupled with one’s renouncing sin and turning to Christ. As a church today, we have too often spoken of it only as a symbol and have neglected its important connection with conversion.

What about the where and how of baptism in the early church? For mass baptisms the people often went to a river such as in the case of John’s baptizing. When smaller groups were involved we know the baptizing was often done in homes as the time when Paul baptized the Philippian jailor and his family at night. In any case, the new believers received baptism almost immediately after conversion and where it was most convenient.

As to how it was performed, we find little that would set a precedent. The Mennonite Church practices the pouring of water on the head which is a legitimate practice according to the biblical record. But we might profit from some flexibility as to where the ordinance is performed. In some of our rural congregations, a stream-side setting might provide more significance to the believers receiving baptism than the inside of the church building. Baptism in the inner-city church could take place in the home of the believer such as in the Philippian jailor’s situation.

There is one more serious question that should be asked. Is there anything in the New Testament that would indicate the baptism and acceptance into a particular denomination must be given in the same action? Since there were no denominations in the early church, the problem is not explicitly spoken to in the Bible. But is it fair, we might ask, in the case of younger children to make them choose their denomination when they do not understand any of the alternatives? A later decision to become part of the Mennonite Church might lead to more alive dedicated members, since the choice was made when the person could more maturely understand the meaning in this step of commitment.

Thank God that we are reaching out to new points especially through an increase in VS and CPS personnel due to the present draft situation. But we must scrutinize our baptismal practices in adapting to this call outward. A revised procedure might begin with these four points:

After a person decides to follow Christ, he should be given a brief instruction in the basics of the Christian life. Basics here refer to belief in God as a personal Being who is active in the world today, belief that Jesus is the Son of God, understanding the Holy Spirit’s role in the believer’s life and a deeper understanding of what salvation means. Along with these, such essentials as a personal devotional life, the meaning and use of prayer and a simple understanding of the church should be encouraged. If desired, additional basic Mennonite doctrines might be briefly explained.

Upon repentance of sin and confession of Jesus as the Son of God and as Lord, the believer should be baptized into the church of Christ. This must be a time of deep personal involvement as the believer receives the symbol of renouncing his old way of life and yielding his total being to God and His will. It is in this yielding that man finds his true self and meaning in life.

If the believer is young, the first stage might be prolonged somewhat until he has a sure understanding of what it means to be Christian. For a more mature person or one from Christian background, baptism may follow almost immediately after conversion. It is a good sign that as a church we are becoming more flexible as to the length of the time of instruction. Yet we connect together the symbol of baptism and the act of becoming a church member. This introduces the last two points.

After baptism there should be continued instruction in the Christian life and if desired in Mennonite doctrine. The apostles never left the newly born Christian without supplying further instruction after baptism. During Paul's missionary journeys, he remained in one region long enough to designate and train indigenous leaders for the new church. Letters still later followed up his visits. Peter stayed with Cornelius and his Gentile friends a few days after their baptism to instruct them further. Acts 10:48. Christ spent three years training His disciples.

Therefore, are three months to a year long enough to establish a foundation for the new believer today? Would there not be a stronger church today including new believers if our "brotherly concern" extended past their first six months in the business?

This extended period of dialogue-teaching could readily be used as a preparation for final membership in the Mennonite fellowship. Perhaps after baptism, if the new Christian wishes, he could be accepted as a junior member in the church. Again any program should be plastic enough to accommodate the person from previous Christian background and the believer without prior evangelical instruction.

Then after proper instruction, the believer should be accepted into full fellowship with the Mennonite Church if he desires. In this ceremony separate from baptism, the believer has finally chosen his particular church affiliation. He had not been forced to make this decision while he was yet very much a beginner in the Christian life and not aware of the doctrines of the church in general and the Mennonite Church in particular.

It might be profitable in the case of younger persons to wait a couple years to take this step. Would it not be more meaningful for a person of eight or ten to wait maybe four or even five years for full membership? The period of waiting should be used to teach the believer and not only as a quiet putting-off period. This ceremony would be a vivid reminder that the believer has chosen Christ as Lord of his life. The climax of four successive steps has now been reached. However, for the believer it should be only the beginning of the living romance of a victorious Christian life.

It is apparent that the time has approached for the church to reexamine its policy of directly coupling baptism with acceptance into the Mennonite fellowship. Separation of the two could lend added meaning for the believer to both ceremonies and hopefully remind the brotherhood more clearly of its responsibility in guiding new believers.

But there would still remain questions that need to be asked of any revisions. Is the believer's free will still upheld? Or is his choice just being determined in a new way? Does the change leave room for differences in maturity and understanding among the believers? Would the revision deny anyone the rights God has given every believer regardless of age or maturity?

Dare to Reconcile

By Roy Kreider

Underneath all the controversies and violence in the Middle East there is a deep desire for peace. On both sides there is evidence of a new consciousness of the unshakable ties to this land. The El Aksa Mosque fire made clear to Israel the deep and sacred Muslim attachments to Jerusalem.

There is justification for the concerns and claims of both sides. The tragedy is a lack of communication, isolation, and deliberate insulation. Israel solved the problem of the Jew at the expense of the Arab. Now they can not talk together for redress of the wrongs. Initiative belongs to the victor, but thus far Arabs refuse to concede Israel's right to exist. If Israel were to take a practical step evidencing their sincerity, what would be the reciprocating Arab step?

The church's task in reconciliation summons us, for communication must first begin among brethren, after which others can be drawn in. On this level communication has begun. But the resultant pockets of reconciling activity are thus far operating oblivious to one another. There are very significant beginnings to be observed — some initiated by churchmen, others by Israeli Jews on a variety of constructive levels. A catalyst is needed, one who could integrate these various workers for peace.

Nowhere in the world do we have as urgent a need as here in the Middle East. Nowhere in the world do we have as open a door, as opportune an hour. We must move beyond the discussion stage to that of cooperative constructive action. Only by an agonizing and dangerous involvement can we hope to move beyond this impasse.

Men of peace are men of the frontier, but in the Middle East they are not in positions of power. There is no assurance that the full-time peacemaker will not experience failure. But we cannot allow the ideal to be the enemy of the possible. It is apparent that we shall be judged in the future on the basis of what we do or fail to do in this present Middle East stalemate, what we say or fail to say, and whether we have genuinely done our utmost in this primary mission as church — reconciliation.

Comparing Curriculum

By Paul M. Lederach

In some Mennonite congregations the question has come up, "Should we continue to use Herald Press curriculum materials?" This is a good question, and should be explored by congregations from time to time.

Sometimes this question comes up because a member attended a workshop or received a colorful circular in the mail that described the values of an independent religious publisher's product. Sometimes persons have attended meetings or have listened to individuals with "huge" catalogs of negative evaluations of Mennonite Publishing House materials. Sometimes teachers have had difficulty using Herald Press materials. Sometimes the editors and writers of Herald Press materials have erred in selecting content. Sometimes congregations have given careful study to their message and mission and wondered what curriculum to use in the light of their situation. Whatever the cause, the question arises.

The staff at Mennonite Publishing House is glad when this question is raised. It is better to use materials out of conviction than out of "habit." We are concerned, however, about the way in which congregations go about answering the question. The most common, but least fruitful, approach is to compare curriculum materials. So Herald Press materials are placed beside the products of other denominations, of independent religious publishers, and of other publishers within the Mennonite Church.

This exercise is about as helpful as comparing apples and pears and bananas. The point is not — How do the curriculums compare? The point is, What are the basic objectives, assumptions, and theological commitments which undergird each curriculum, and how faithful is the curriculum to these commitments? Given the theological orientation of each curriculum one could safely say that each one is as good an expression of that commitment as can be found.

The fact of the matter is that what a Mennonite congregation selects to use as its curriculum, may say more about the congregation than about the curriculum. Thus a congregation electing to use a product from an independent, religious publisher is in effect saying, "We are more at home in a nondenominational tradition than in the Mennonite-Anabaptist tradition." Or by electing another curriculum it may be saying, "Our congregation is more comfortable with the pleadings of special interest groups within the church than with the more generally accepted views of discipleship and witness found in the church."

When at the task of "comparing curriculum," it is important to realize that the teaching ministry of the Mennonite congregation should reflect the theology and commitments of the Mennonite Church. The old idea of "Sunday school and church," as though somehow the Sunday school were something separate and distinct from the congregation, must be discarded. One can hardly imagine a congregation in which the minister proclaims from the pulpit a message reflecting the simple, nonresistant faith while the Sunday school teaches from materials confusing nation and church, and glorifying militarism. Yet such congregations exist, and few seem to sense the fatal discrepancy.

Many things are done to assure congregations that Mennonite Publishing House materials both undergird the life and work of the church and teach Mennonite theology.

1. The Publishing House is under the control of a churchwide Publication Board. This Board meets annually, and has an executive committee that meets frequently in between. This Board has representatives from every conference district. These representatives review the work of the House, authorize new projects, appoint or review the appointment of House staff, share with staff reaction from the church, and set policy. The Publishing House is not under the auspices of any one conference district nor do its products cater to the views of any self-appointed, special interest group.

2. The Mennonite Commission for Christian Education of Mennonite General Conference serves as a Counsel and Reference group for the Curriculum Development Department of the Mennonite Publishing House. The Commission is constantly involved in discerning what the teaching ministry in the congregation should be like. It is close to revisions of curriculum — it reviewed and approved the plan for revising the graded series. It approves plans for new curriculum materials. Each major curriculum project has a counsel and Reference Committee that establishes philosophy and policy and guides in outlining materials. If a publication is joint — that is if the Mennonite Church and the General Conference Mennonite Church cooperate, the Counsel and Reference Committee has representatives from both groups. In any case, Counsel and Reference Committee members are appointed in the light of their commitment to Christ and the church, their experience in the area of the curriculum, and their professional competence. When a curriculum is outlined, many resource persons are also involved from congregations, from churchwide boards and agencies, and from related theological or academic disciplines. This wide counsel assures the development of curriculum in the best interests of the church.

3. The Mennonite Publishing House attempts to maintain a professional staff known in the church for its commitment to Christ and to the church, for its balanced perspective, and for its professional competence.

The staff at the Mennonite Publishing House has done its best to provide biblically sound, evangelical, and educationally adequate materials. Our products are always on trial, and this is the way it should be. But it must also be observed that a congregation’s acceptance or rejection of Herald Press material reveals a great deal about the congregation and its commitments. The Mennonite Publishing House appreciates the loyalty of those congregations that have used its materials through the years. It welcomes all suggestions for improving its products, and it invites all Mennonite congregations that have been led to use curriculum from other sources to enjoy again the many benefits that accrue from using Herald Press materials.

Each man has his own religion. There may be five hundred people in a congregation—all supposedly of the same faith—but everyone’s interpretation is different, and everyone thinks the others are in error. Much of this is born of the individual’s interpretation of what is right and wrong, purposeful or unimportant. The differing views can be both amazing and amusing.

For example, one man of my recent acquaintance (though he doesn’t recognize me for what I am, of course) feels that as long as he gives generously to the church, his heavenly status in the hereafter is assured, regardless of the questionable manner in which he makes his money. Another feels that if he abstains from wine, women, and worldly pleasures, his future is secure—though he seldom drops more than a quarter in the collection. Still another seeks his eternal bliss by handing out tracts and inviting people to church, while at home he is a tyrant and behind the wheel he is a terror.

Women have their own ways of paving the path to paradise. A portly matron has been “laying up treasures” for years now by sponsoring projects to raise money for overseas missions. This usually takes the form of a bake sale, from which she derives not only funds but a great amount of gastronomic pleasure (I haven’t decided which is the real motivation for the sales). At the opposite end of the religious register is a thin, plain sister who denies herself all delicacies and feminine delights so that she can give more to save the savages. Her self-righteousness shines like a neon sign. And then there are the Dorcas-doers—ever ready to help out when there is sickness or death or other disaster in a family, and also ever ready to dispense information about that family to anyone who cares to listen.

Whichever sex, there is usually a vice to counterbalance every virtue. The greatest asset, as I mentioned at the beginning of this report, is that the virtue tends to become the essence of the individual’s religion, and he can get so carried away with it that nothing else really seems important. This is exactly as I would have it. Such diversified devotion should go far in weakening the Establishment.

Conditions for Success

By Christian Charles

Success always rests on a foundation of usefulness. It is the accomplishment of some definite objective in life, by which we benefit the world, community, church, family, etc., and hold the true affections of our family and friends and command the respect of all. By doing God’s will, and obeying His Word, true success is living a useful life.

He who would feast on success must first learn how to swallow disappointment. When fate hands you a lemon, squeeze it and start a lemonade stand. Meet success like a gentleman, and failure like a man. You may fall into misfortune, but you have to climb to success. No life worthwhile can be lived without conflict. Success consists in getting up once oftener than you fall down.

The most successful man is the one who holds on to the old just as long as it is good. He grabs the new just as soon as it is better. All progress means change, but all change is not progress. Success in life largely depends on your ability to recognize a good plan, and your ambition to adopt it. Work is the practical side of ambition. The secret of successful doing is revealed in system; of doing the thing immediately, while interest is aflame.

The current price of success is hard work and overtime. Success is not made by lying awake at night, but by keeping awake in the daytime. Success is a ladder which cannot be climbed with your hands in your pockets. The best fruit is still at the top of the tree. He who sits beneath and spreads his canvas will catch only windfalls. The dictionary is the only place where you can find success without much effort. The successful person is the one who did the things you intended to do. It is the hope of getting what you haven’t received that gives zest to life. No one ever picked success from trees, except fruit growers; and they had first to plant trees. The hen is the only one that can lay around and make money. All those who pass through the door of success find it labeled “Push.” There is nothing mysterious about the ability to succeed. It is merely a matter of common sense and common honesty.

There are many other important factors that are keys to success, such as getting along well with others; reading the best literature; having a goal and purpose; extending your horizons; character—natural talent; aptitude; good training; proper resources; thrift; tact; and self-control.
What Are Old People Like?

By Moses Slabaugh

Old is such a harsh term. Perhaps it is harsh because so many things are junked when old. While culture is constantly changing models and inventing new gadgets people are getting old, and with our material junk we are inclined to include these people. But the analogy of people and junk breaks down. People can improve with age while the world of gadgets does not. When will man learn the meaning and value of persons and emphasize purpose and being?

Older people are just the same as other people, except they have been around a little longer and have run up some mileage. They eat, sleep, work, compete, and dream of what is around the corner just as the average person does. Mileage is no disgrace, it’s an honor. Look where they have been, and the scenery they have enjoyed, not to mention the experiences they have had and the seed they have planted along the way.

A child once asked the question, “Why does God allow people to die? Couldn’t He just keep the nice old people He has instead of always having to make new ones?” Good question, and the answer is that God does keep people. He is not through with them when they die. People are so wonderful God wants more. There is more to life than getting old and the silent six feet. Then too, God wouldn’t be God if He didn’t have a few mysteries.

To know what old people are like you find out when you live with a group of them for a week. Older people have been getting together in retreats of late, just as the young set has been doing. They have had senior retreats at most of the church camps and seniors have demonstrated they are very much alive and on the go.

About seventy seniors got together at Laurelville, Pennsylvania, the first week of September. They came from Canada, Ohio, Delaware, Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania and there was plenty of activity. These seniors followed the camp’s regular schedule. No late breakfasts. Nevin Bender led the group each morning in Bible study on the theme of the Christian Hope. Now there is a dynamic our world needs. If we could just get a note of optimism into people’s minds today. The seniors’ stay on earth is tapering off and it is only natural to anticipate the final event. If only our college campuses could latch on to this element of hope and purpose there would be less boredom, suicide, and revolt. Man has a destiny and a purpose for being and life is best lived as sort of a cavalry brigade moving on toward a goal.

Another speaker (the new term is resource person) was Fred Brenneman, a retired psychiatrist. (A friend of mine pronounces it psychi-a-trick.) Now a psychiatrist should give a slant on life that is real. A man who has had the problems of mankind in his lap has something to say about the meaning of persons and interpersonal relationship. He led the group through some deep and intriguing thinking about life and being a person and relating to people. The seniors had some hard and gritty questions for Brenneman too.

Most seniors are calm about their future and the end of the race. John Rudy from the Mennonite Foundation discussed wills. People have the idea that only a lawyer can draw up a will. True, we need an attorney to put our will into legal terms, but he only writes our will. A will is just about the most important document a person can sign. Why should a man work a lifetime and leave no will or a poor will? A will is a privilege and a responsibility. It is one of those one-time events, just like a first parachute jump, you don’t practice for it. You do it right the first time.

A will is a sobering document. Perhaps this is why we don’t talk more freely about wills. It becomes a traumatic experience for seniors to dispose of all they have worked for so hard and so long. Many cannot bear the thought that someone may squander and waste that for which they labored so hard. Of course, there is the other side. One rich uncle had a very short will. It said, “I being of sound mind have spent it all on myself.” Well, John Rudy led the group in a very meaningful and enlightening discussion on the Christian will.

In all, it was an exciting and eventful week. They had quilting, ceramics, woodworking, and fancy cooking going. A few played golf in the afternoon and of course shuffleboard and miniature golf was popular. Even a romance got started. Some people die for lack of enthusiasm, but the coroner will never put that on the death certificate of those seniors who were at the retreat. They laughed, visited, joked, and told believable and unbelievable yarns. A rough addition of the total age of those present came to about 8000 years. That is a lot of experience to bring together.

Older people are very much like normal people, alive, growing, believing, anticipating, and on their way. While the world about us is expressing itself in explosive terms, such as population explosion, and knowledge explosion, older people are more in a holding position. They have had their turn at explosives and are now watching the team in the field, but they are like other people and their hearts are in the game of life.

A quick study of most Mennonite communities would reveal a deep and natural tendency of noninvolvement in the fabric of the surrounding society. The usual approach to “home missions,” for example, is often a quick Sunday morning dash to the city and a “return for lunch” departure. Few indeed were those whose commitment was strong enough that they would “risk” raising their families “in” the city. But even those who drove in are to be honored because they at least were willing to do something that most of their fellow Mennonites were perhaps not ready to do. I suppose that I should also add that this problem is not entirely in the past.

A new facet to our old noninvolvement is now presenting itself in the present peace movement; we are confused as to how much we should identify ourselves with the popular “Peace Now” chant or even to raise our own voices in a call for Nonresistance (biblical pacifism).

Historically, at times when the United States was involved in a war, our position on peace was so unpopular that we were content with whatever concessions the government would grant us, to allow us the freedom of conscience we needed. At various times we accepted jail, substitutes, Civilian Public Service, and currently Civilian Peace Service.

Today there appears to be some confusion, on our part, as to how to relate to the popular peace movement, when to some degree they “have stolen our thunder.” Shall we now change our practice, of payment of taxes and registering for the draft and applying for I-O classification, a position which previously had us branded as “radicals” and now is only “moderate”? The true “radical” position now involves nonpayment of “war” taxes, nonregistration, migration, and other developing resistance.

The traditional Mennonite solution, which included payment of taxes and registration, made us quite unpopular in “normal” war years. Vietnam, however, is not a “normal” war and the likely occurrence of other similar wars is always present. We cannot afford to close our eyes and hope the problem will go away. We need to carefully think through the present dilemma, and in the light of God’s Word, guided by the ever-present Holy Spirit, find the way through our problems. We are all aware that no solution for a problem is ever a permanent one. Change is always present. Each generation must do as we are doing, search the Scriptures, seek and accept the leading of God’s Spirit, search our own hearts and minds for the way to construct a useful life, which brings glory to His name, life to His church, and light to the world.

Peace–The Vine

Fallacies Which Trap Us

To cope with this problem we need to look at some of the facts of which the problem is made. I personally feel that one of the fallacies that trap us is the acceptance of too many nice-sounding generalities. I.e., “This immoral and illegal war”—the fact remains that no war is moral and that all wars accept as legal things that normally are illegal. Am I to assume that we would support and take part in a war which was moral and legal, and if so, by whose standards? “The atrocious and dehumanized treatment of civilians”—has always been a characteristic of war. Read the history of what we did to the American Indian. Have we forgotten the names and events of Dresden, Hiroshima, Sherman’s “March to the Sea” etc.?

Just allow yourself to remember the treatment of slaves in this country, a condition and circumstance that does not even have the “justification” (?) of the pressure, danger, and hysteria of wartime to cloud good judgment. I am not trying to defend the involvement of the United States in Vietnam. I am trying to remind each one that all war is terrible, and as technology advances (?) wars will continue to get worse. Our testimony must continue to be against all war, past wars, present wars, and all future wars.

To listen to some orators anyone would decide that the war is our number 1 international and domestic problem, and I agree that we need a total revamping of our national priorities. But on the loss of American lives alone we need to face a few hard facts. There are about 160 murders in the United States each week. Why are these deaths necessary? We also kill over 1000 persons a week in automobile accidents. Alcohol is a contributing factor in a huge percentage of these deaths, yet who is leading any protest in their behalf? Is death kinder in the blinding, screaming crash of an automobile, or at the point of a murderer’s knife or gun, than it is on the battlefield? Or why is it that only a few hardy souls protest this killing and thousands will march and read the names of soldiers who died, some at least, for a cause that they believed in? Is it better to die a totally useless and unnecessary death on the highway? We are sobered by a Vietnam death total of over 40,000 but hardly an eyebrow is raised by the 53,000 deaths on our highways last year alone. Perhaps we also need to rethink our priorities!

Internal Problems

It is comparatively easy for people of a “Historic Peace Church” to get carried along by a “Peace Now” chant, and forget that Christ said that there will be wars, and that He warns us about those that cry, “Peace, peace.” We also forget that the attitudes that the Sermon on the Mount calls for are possible in the hearts and lives of men, only as He becomes King in that life. The founding fathers of our church were quite clear that it is only the presence of Christ as Savior that can change men's lives and take them to glory.

It may be that someone reading this will conclude that I do not believe in nonresistance, or even in peace. Far from it! I am deeply convinced that when a man becomes a born-again disciple of Jesus Christ, he immediately becomes a recruit in Christ's strategy of winning disciples, ready to bear injustice and suffering with meekness, and able to do so in the power of the Holy Spirit. His function is not to dispense justice in a society of evildoers, but to be a Christlike witness to the Savior, to His salvation, and to His way of life (love and holiness).

The big problem facing our church, however, is not these external factors in which we do get caught up, but the very important internal decisions, such as, What advice are we giving our own young people who are on the front lines, on such matters as the draft and resulting years' service? A careful look at the "program" of the church in "Voluntary Service" produces a sense of satisfaction on the part of most observers. By and large this program has produced a real testimony of the love of Christ and has been a fitting protest to the violence of war. Some failures and less than ideal contributions do not overbalance the far greater positive aspect of this program.

Most of our young men are not in VS, nor is the VS program set up in such a way as to meet the needs of all our young people. For example, not all married couples are leadership material. The fact remains that the largest group of religious objectors are in the structureless I-W or Civilian Peace Service program. An evaluation of this program is a little more complex.

The problems with the I-W program are not all our doing. They begin with the fact that to some degree the government and more specifically the draft boards are not concerned or really responsible for the service that the men give after they do their job of classification and assignment. The draft board is not responsible for the conduct of the soldier or the conscientious objector — their job is simply to turn the one over to the Army and see that the other gets a job at an approved location. The Army then controls the soldier and the conscientious objector is on his own, with very little if any guidelines or structure to which he must relate.

If there is a Mennonite church near his place of assignment a conscientious objector can relate to it, if he wishes, but he can also ignore it if he desires. The Army controls the life of the soldier; they tell him when he can go home, when he must get up, what his appearance shall be, etc. The conscientious objector is again on his own, he goes home when he pleases, he spends his spare time as he pleases, he leaves a testimony for Christ or creates an impression of the Mennonites in that community which can negate any mission work that the church may try to do.

Hospital authorities are generally well pleased with the work produced by the I-W fellows "on the job," but are not as enthusiastic if questioned about the basic matter of "service in the name of Christ." All of us have heard enough "tales" of misconduct on the part of conscientious objectors at various locations, that I need not relate any more to establish my point. I also doubt if it is necessary to remind my readers that these failures do not reflect on the draft program, or on the government nearly as much as they reflect, in a negative way, on our church and our homes. The problems in the I-W program are not a valid basis on which to build an objection to the draft system. The failure of a I-W assignee is a failure of his own spiritual life, not of the system which gave him the opportunity to avoid military service by claiming a loyalty to the teachings of Christ, which in some cases does not appear to be the truth.

Some Guides

I would like to propose to my brotherhood a few suggestions that may help us decide what policy we should adopt or encourage our young men to follow. First, we need to recognize that even a "worldly" peace is better national policy than war. We can and should encourage and support national leaders to pursue this goal; letters of encouragement and counsel are not to be discouraged.

Our responsibility of prayer for our national and world leaders is far greater than our right to engage in public criticism. The almost violent personal attacks on some of our leaders creates an atmosphere which almost makes prayers for those leaders absurd. How can the same fountain pour forth both bitter and sweet?

Second, from a theological standpoint we need to recognize that the popular "Peace Now" chant comes from a basis which is far different from the love your enemies, and do good to those that persecute you background of the way of love. The call of Christ is first of all a call to come to Him, as Lord and Savior. The way of peace He then grants us as a fruit of the Spirit. The reverse order is not possible. That is, we cannot achieve peace and present our peaceable nature as grounds for justification. If this were possible then Christ's death on the cross was unnecessary! The peace of the New Testament is a fruit, and not the vine itself.

Third, I have a growing conviction that the growing unrest in this nation, especially as it relates to war and human suf-
No Vision—Perish!

By Earl B. Eberly

I picked up a stranded 300-pound motorist at 12:30 a.m. on Interstate 70 fifty miles east of Kansas City, Mo., standing in a drenching rain beside his VW with a five-gallon gas can and an umbrella. He was traveling to his home in Kansas City and had sought in vain for a filling station that was open. I took him fifteen miles to a station, back again, and saw him off.

While we were traveling these 30 miles in this cloudburst, I inquired into his spiritual life. Because his father was a Catholic, his mother a Lutheran, he attended one church for a while and then the other. He also attended a local evangelical Sunday school, estimating that he attended here about half time. He related to me how he was searching for a meaning to life, how he had a craving inside to possess what was being discussed in Sunday school.

He entered college after high school. After obtaining a number of college catalogs and studying their purpose and aim, he selected a certain college affiliated with an evangelical denomination. The aim of this college was “to acquaint the student with the person of the Lord Jesus while he prepares himself for the vocation of his choosing.” The college handbook mentioned that personal interviews and counselings were mediums through which they seek to accomplish their goal. Then he paused and said slowly and nearly in a whisper, “Their purpose and aim is on paper only. I attended there four years and left with the same feelings of uncertainty and confusion.” Today he has his master’s degree as a librarian and is employed by the state as head librarian at ——— University.

Here was an evangelical church searching for lost men and women in their community, but right inside in their own pews was a youth diligently searching for an answer to his problems and cravings — but no help was given.

Here was an evangelical college which spent hundreds of thousands of dollars to prepare youth to serve this needy world in the name of Christ, but right in their classrooms sat a young man who went there for the sole purpose of getting help. After four years of classroom instruction, he left as an honor graduate student, but without Christ and disappointed.

Jesus one day gave the parable of the lost coin. A diligent search was made for this treasure and it was found right where it was lost — inside her own house.

Can it be that while the church is diligently searching for lost men in its community, it is blinded to the needs of those inside its walls? Can it be that the Word which can change the lives and destiny of men is just handled mechanically by some Sunday school teachers and pastors? Can it be that the Sunday school teachers and pastors are blind to the needs of persons in their classes while uttering some great truths which aren’t relevant to the needs of the hour? Can it be that some who teach others don’t know themselves what it means to have the longings of their soul met in the Lord Jesus Christ?

Can it be that while the church pours hundreds of thousands of dollars in educating the youth in a Christian atmosphere to serve the world in the name of Christ — that there are those who sit in the classroom and yet aren’t confronted with Christ? Can it be that students who choose a Christian college over a state school for the sole purpose of receiving spiritual help leave as graduates who are uncertain, confused, disappointed, and without Christ?

Can it be that the local congregation and its affiliated schools are so wrapped up in the glamour of the future that they don’t see the present? Can it be that we see all types of opportunities and potential — but they all lie in the distant future?

Jesus said, “Lift up your eyes, and look on the fields; for they are white already to harvest.” The time of doing effective work isn’t when the evangelist arrives, or the Life Team, nor is it when that new dorm or library is completed. Jesus said there is work that needs to be done now and there are persons ready to be harvested. If that grain is left unharvested and to fall to the ground itself, it will die and bring forth fruit. But volunteer grain is of very little value. The grain which has value is that which is harvested when it is ripe.
and then replanted so that it can grow properly.

As I talked to this stranded motorist, I became aware that he was telling me how he felt at one time, but that the present was quite different. He wasn’t sure that Jesus was the answer to his search for “truth.” I gathered that he was introduced to a number of systems of thought and ethical standards of conduct. I learned that he knew quite a bit about communism and he told me, “They are the most zealous and devoted people I have ever met.” If this man had been seen as a person in that Sunday school ready to commit his life to Christ, if that college would have seen this young intellectual as a prospective recruit for Christ, today Christ could have a son of His serving as head librarian in University — a place where there are many others searching for meaning to life. But the grain wasn’t harvested when it was ready and it fell to the ground. Today his life is also reproducing — but in the thorns and brambles of modern thought and philosophy and never coming to ripened grain. Today this man works at a place where he meets many students. If he were a Christian, Christ could use him as a light in the midst of darkened lives. But he is not a Christian and when the blind endeavor to lead the blind, they will both end up in despair and disappointment.

As painful as it may be to accept, this incident again underscores the truthfulness of the Word — “Where there is no vision, the people perish.”

The Bible Speaks Again, a guide from Holland commissioned by the Netherlands Reformed Church. Annabeth Mackie, illustrator. Augsburg Publishing House. 1969. 224 pp. $3.95

The book represents the result of one church body grappling seriously with the question of the authority of the Bible for today. It is written by a group of people who are convinced that the Bible can assert itself and that there is much to be grateful for on the contemporary scene. They are also concerned that readers of the Bible approach it in such a way as to interpret it correctly. They begin therefore with a section on the way in which the Bible has been interpreted in the church.

Much more valuable are the last three sections. In the second section, a strong case is made of the necessity for the Bible to stand on its own, without the external buttressing of church creeds. The Bible is seen as a free book, as one which is both Word of God and word of man. In the third section the key secrets of the Bible.

In the last section concrete examples are given on how the church uses the Bible to arrive at decisions on such matters as nuclear war, capital punishment, etc. This section is especially recommended to Mennonite readers who have had their own difficulties in this area. The authors see the Bible as a document in which the church as a body of believers engages in an earnest dialogue with God. I know of no single book which I can as highly recommend for Mennonite readers, both preachers and laymen, in this important area of biblical authority. In many ways it is similar to Markus Barth’s Conversation with the Bible, but most readers will find this easier to read. Fine for church libraries.—William Klassen.

Television’s Doctor Smith has put his advice on the normal health problems of childhood into a book, from infancy to teen years. All the old problems, thumb-sucking, temper tantrums, lying, are treated, but special emphasis is put on the problems and age-groups that are usually missed in such books.

There are 61 yellow pages, a directory of diseases and conditions that will help parents to know what to look for and do before calling the sometimes hard-to-reach doctor. With more than usual humor the doctor discusses matters which are common but poorly understood. Most parents will profit from and enjoy reading this book. Excellent for church libraries which serve young parents.—Helen Alderfer.

The Church and the Single Person, by Frances M. Bontrager. Herald Press. 1969. 31 pp. 50¢ (paper).

What is the role of the single girl? What is the church’s responsibility to her? These are the two questions that Frances Bontrager has focused for the reader in this pamphlet. What does the single girl (there are 13 million) elect to do with her life and how does the church help her? The author feels that the church has failed the single girl in many ways but she also lists some suggestions to help the church with its responsibility.—Helen Alderfer.

It is a shame if not a hopeless calamity that this treatise to the churches is needed at all. But it is needed and it may help! Dr. Grounds delivered this lecture at a Peace Witness Seminar at Eastern Mennonite College. Its appearance in print should make it possible for all churches to have in their files a clear statement of the Christian’s responsibility to the poor and the oppressed. But unless its message is digested and implemented we will still be hypocritical in our verbal commitment to others.

Dr. Grounds makes it very clear that the concern for the socially deprived found in the Old Testament was emphatically reinforced by the life and teaching of Christ. Evangelism and positive help for the poor are two sides of the same coin. Every responsible Christian has the dual responsibility to his fellowman. I personally hope that this “good word” from a Southern Baptist scholar will be carefully studied by all our congregations.—Vern Miller.

The by-line of this book reads, “What every thoughtful parent should know about homosexuality.” The authors’ thesis is that homosexuality is preventable. Therefore, the respective roles of both father and mother are crucial in the development of proper sexuality in the child. The ideal home environment is described as relaxed, tolerant, and sensible, especially about sex knowledge and behavior. Acceptance and love of each child as he develops in his or her respective gender role is important.

Homosexuality has been a controversial and often closed topic. In this book the subject is discussed openly and in nontechnical terms for the lay reader. Varied views concerning the deviation are considered, although there is an absence of discussion about any theological dimensions. The inclusion of extensive case studies is helpful. Most of all, this book assists parents and others who work with children and youth to understand homosexuality in terms of prevention and early detection of symptoms. Recommended reading for every responsible parent.—Harold D. Lehman.
Items and Comments

Mankind has reached a turning point in history where it must curb deteriorating environmental trends or leave the planet earth “quite uninhabitable” for the next generation.

This warning was sounded by President Nixon’s science adviser, Dr. Lee A. DuBridge, at the 13th national conference of the U.N. national commission for UNESCO.

The conference of some 450 leading experts on human environment heard Dr. DuBridge describe the problem as “nothing else than changing the habits of billions of people and the adoption of wholly new attitudes and very expensive new technologies by the whole worldwide industrial system.”

This crisis was characterized as the story of modern civilization: more people, more production, and more waste products.

“Our spacecraft called the earth is reaching its capacity,” Dr. DuBridge said, adding that to arrest the population explosion to a growth rate of zero “is the first great challenge of our time.”

How many people is enough for planet earth to survive?

Conservationists said that the allowable limit was approaching fast. Some argued that the reasonable limit had already been overtaken by the population explosion.

Paul R. Ehrlich, professor of biology at Stanford University, said that sooner or later the growth of the human population “must stop.” He argued that in the battle to feed humanity, “our side has already been routed.” He noted that only ten countries, including the United States, grow more food than they consume. Mr. Ehrlich said he expected “full-scale famines” by 1975.

Right-wing extremists are financing attacks on sex education in schools in an effort to obtain power, according to Dr. Franklin Littell, chairman of the Institute for American Democracy and a professor at Temple University.

“In 1961 the radical right was being financed by slightly less than $1 million,” the Methodist clergyman claimed. “In 1968, some $46 or $50 million has poured into their coffers.”

Right-wing attacks on sex education, he contended, can be explained only in the context of parallel attacks by the same groups on the U.S. Supreme Court and the World and National Councils of Churches, and the attempt to infiltrate police departments and legislatures with “front men.”

Author of Wild Tongues, a handbook on social pathology, Dr. Littell charged that the John Birch Society is the “hub of the conspiracy,” which received heavy financial support from some major corporations.

Organized right-wingers work in a conspiratorial manner, he held, using anonymous calls and other techniques such as those employed by the Nazi party in Germany. “Their attack represents a well-organized thrust for power, not a grassroots opinion change.”

Charging that totalitarianism is also receiving support from Maoists on the left, he said, “Conservatives must be careful not to be fellow travelers with extremists of the right, just as liberals must not be misled by communists.”

More than 3,000 delegates from all over the world are expected to attend the first International Congress of Learned Societies in the Field of Religion at Los Angeles, Sept. 2-6, 1972.

Announcement of the massive undertaking that will involve charter flights of scholars from Britain and Europe came at the annual meeting of the Society of Biblical Literature (SBL). The society, which has a membership of 2,800 in Canada and the U.S., drew more than 600 delegates.

Members heard papers by more than 100 colleagues on such subjects as “Some Notes on the Concept of the Autograph of the Gospels,” “Excavations at Ai, 1969,” and “Use of the Computer at the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity.”

The age of ecumenism as institutional unity of Christians is dead, a Dutch Roman Catholic priest told Protestant and Orthodox leaders in Detroit.

Dr. Leo Alting von Geusau, secretary of IDOC International (Center for International Documentation of the Contemporary Church), addressed the eighth General Assembly of the National Council of Churches. His independent, Rome-based center will begin a North American operation in February, 1970.

Research of IDOC International in many places indicates that traditional ecumenical structures, as well as church structures, are breaking down as “living” Christian communities unconcerned about institutionalized religion emerge, the speaker said.

Ecumenism as the unifying of institutions is the interest of “a smaller and smaller group, meeting and meeting again in huge congresses, or in endless commissions running behind the facts,” he stated.

Seven different nations recently invited the Baptist World Alliance to hold its 1975 Congress within their borders. The July 1970 Congress will be held in Tokyo.

Mini-skirt causing maxi-damage. In the eyes of some, mini-dresses may be cute, youthful, and in keeping with our present attitudes of sexual liberality, but according to a report prepared by the National Committee for Furtherance of Jewish Education, current trends in dress and undress are “seriously eroding the moral fiber of the nation.”

According to the NCFJE, many of society’s ills such as the rising rates of divorce, adultery, and promiscuity, the nudity in theatrical productions, and the recent upsurge in mass distribution of pornography can be traced to today’s immodest dress.

“The bikini, mini-skirt, bare midriff and see-through dress are causing far more damage than most people realize,” commented Rabbi Jacob J. Hecht, NCFJE executive vice-president.

According to the NCFJE report, the most serious effect of today’s immodest dress is that “it creates false standards of social behavior by distorting out of all reasonable proportions the role of sex in our lives.”

According to Rabbi Hecht, clothes are the mirror of one’s personality and morals, and when a young girl is dressed modestly she is displaying self-respect. “A girl who attires herself in good taste is honoring herself,” Rabbi Hecht said, pointing out that one of the sages of the Talmud understood this when he said centuries ago that clothes were a person’s “badge of honor.”

The NCFJE report emphasized that what many young girls do not realize is that dressing modestly is dressing fashionably. “Good taste in clothes has always been fashionable, and bad taste unFashionable,” Rabbi Hecht said. He added that, once young girls realized how important the proper choice of clothes was, they "would think twice about wearing a bikini or see-through blouse.”

Linkletter blames music for drugs. An AP report from San Francisco says that "The Beatles, rock music, and drug culturalist Timothy Leary are strong contributors to the drug crisis facing Americans today," according to Art Linkletter who testified before a congressional committee.

"Leading missionaries of drug culture," Linkletter said, "are the Beatles." He said he considered "the people who say LSD is harmless — Dr. Timothy Leary and the others — among the murderers of my daughter."

"The television star's 20-year-old daughter died in what Linkletter called a suicide leap last month (September) while on an LSD-induced 'flashback.'"
Quaker-Mennonite Team Evacuates

Linford Gehman and nurse Martha Bender, MCC workers with QMS team in Biafra, are safe and en route to the States. Tuesday, Jan. 6, Gehman and Bender cabled MCC headquarters in Akron of their safe arrival in Sao-Tome. Sao-Tome is the island off the coast of Nigeria-Biafra from which the emergency relief flights originated the past two years.

Monday, Jan. 12, Biafra announced its surrender to Federal Nigeria.

Prior to Christmas the Federal Nigerian troops pressed from several sides upon Biafran-held territory. On Christmas Eve the QMS team crossed the Imo River to Obizi. Christmas morning the bridge was blown up and Ihie, the village from which the QMS team last operated their clinics, fell to the Federal troops.

During the past weeks, Federal Nigerian troops continued their attacks against Biafran defenses. Gehman and Bender evacuated only when it was obvious that the collapse of Biafra was imminent.

On Sao-Tome island there still remains a month's supply of food which was to have been airlifted to Biafra. MCC has both foodstuffs and money for any expanded relief program which might develop.

MCC is in contact with the U.S. State Department, the American Friends Service Committee, and the Christian Council of Nigeria to learn how it can best respond to the situation.

Vietnamese People Enter New Decade Restless

To the question, "What are the villagers in your area thinking and feeling?" a Vietnam Christian Service volunteer said, "The Vietnamese are restless." This "restless feeling" was the overriding impression of my week (Nov. 15-22, 1969) in Vietnam —my third visit since leaving in midsummer, 1967. The feeling was more apparent among the Vietnamese than among the foreigners, but felt among the latter as well.

The predominant cause for restlessness and constant subject of conversation was the tremendous jump in prices due to new taxes —gasoline doubled, luxury items almost doubled, and food prices increased about 20 percent. The taxes were imposed by the Thieu government to try to bring in balance government income with expenses. The taxes were intended to raise revenue among the more wealthy classes, but in fact, most of the cost was passed on to the consumers. Again, the poorer classes of people were forced to bear the brunt of the price raise.

With the inflationary economy, providing enough rice for one's table is no easy task for the majority of Vietnamese. VNCS workers report that more and more Vietnamese girls are forced into prostitution because of increasing economic pressures. The growing number of bars in Saigon and other towns throughout Vietnam give ample evidence of this.

Discontent with the price increase is causing some political repercussions. The Thieu government is receiving the most vocal and intense criticism of its more than two-year life. Former government leader, Duong Van Minh, called "Big Minh," and several political blocs within the Vietnam Senate and House are stirring the political waters. A group of Khmer monks, Cambodian Buddhists, sat in front of the palace for a week, demanding special minority recognition, before they were evicted.

That there is a lull in the fighting—except along the Cambodian border—is not questioned, but its cause and meaning are. Various interpretations of the present scale of military activity are given: improved pacification of the U.S. and GVN, a decisive defeat of the NLF, a deliberate scaling down of the fighting by both sides, greater concentration on political activity by the NLF and North Vietnamese, a lull before the storm. The inability to interpret this lull and its unknown duration contribute to the restlessness. The feeling, "What will be next?" is very evident.

The news of the My Lai massacre broke shortly before my visit. News articles about the massacre and world reaction to it appeared in the local Vietnamese newspapers. I did not sense as great a shock among the Vietnamese people at the news of the incident as was expressed in the U.S. and the rest of the world. I think the Vietnamese people have been "shocked" too much and too often to react strongly to this one incident.

Definitions of murder may be important for lawyers and judges, but for many Vietnamese who have experienced war with the rain of bombs, B-52 raids, and rockets bringing death to friends and relatives, the precise manner of death for a few villagers is unimportant in the destruction.

Two hundred or five hundred civilians killed at My Lai is a small number when compared to the larger unknown numbers of civilian casualties that have been the war's toll. The Saigon government has reported that 9,500 civilians are wounded or killed every month.

One heard criticism by many Vietnamese of both the U.S. government and the U.S. peace movement for their somewhat sinister attitude toward Vietnamese suffering. The peace movement's focus has been on the cost of American lives and American dollars with almost no concern about the much higher cost to the Vietnamese. The U.S. government's reason for Vietnamization of the war is also understood to be because of the cost to America. This apparent lack of concern for the Vietnamese rings hollow to many caught in the conflict.

Nowhere was the feeling expressed that the war will end soon. To many, the Nixon administration's plan of Vietnamization is not an end to the war for the Vietnamese, but a continuation of it under a different form. Some U.S. military personnel are being withdrawn, but the war with its destruction, social, and economic dislocation will likely continue or possibly intensify.

The cry for peace and justice by the Vietnamese dare not go unheard.

— Paul Longacre,
MCC Director for Asia.

Kraybill Appointed Secretary of Commission

Paul N. Kraybill, Salunga, Pa., was appointed executive secretary of the Study Commission on Church Reorganization, beginning service Jan. 1, 1970, on a 3/4-time basis.

In view of concerns raised by Mennonite General Conference and the three church boards, the Study Commission, in consultation with the respective executive committees, changed the date of meeting for consideration of the Study Commission's proposals from Aug. to Oct. 20-22, 1970. This is to allow needed time to further revise and refine the proposed model.

Persons having concerns are urged to share such with Bro. Kraybill. He is available to meet with conferences, organizations, and other groups to discuss organizational concerns. He may be contacted at Box 128, Salunga, Pa. 17538. Tel.: 717-898-2251.
Haiti Revisited: Decade of Progress

For ten years now MCC in cooperation with the Haitian government has operated Hospital Grande Riviere du Nord, Haiti. Only acutely ill patients are admitted to the 15-bed hospital. Major emphasis is on daily clinics, with approximately 40,000 clinic consultations conducted in 1969.

In January 1969 an expanded public health program was inaugurated. It included Grande Riviere and the surrounding rural communities. The program flourished. By the end of the first nine months of 1969, public health personnel had given 14,000 immunizations, and had seen 2,342 pregnant women and 1,566 women with babies in well-baby clinics. The complete medical project is headed by Richard Stoltzfus.

Stoltzfus, a recent visitor to MCC Akron headquarters, spoke of Haiti and MCC's involvement there. "There are several outstanding things about Haiti," he said. "First, of course, is the extreme poverty of the country. The level of underdevelopment is a second thing that strikes you immediately. You become aware of this particularly through the medical program. The type of diseases that are seen and the type of practices that one sees is pretty much the result of poverty, underdevelopment, and lack of education. For example, nutritional diseases are major there, many as a result of lack of education and the low level of the economy. Parasitic disease is another example where lack of education plays a role," Stoltzfus noted.

"I don't think the general level of the economy is improving much, as far as it affects the individual. In fact, I think this may have even deteriorated during the past few years. The per capita income, for example, has fallen rather than risen. There is still a high level of disease and infant mortality and a low level of employment. But there are a few examples of where the government is trying to improve the plight of the people, and hopefully these projects will grow."

MCC work at Grande Riviere was begun as a medical program — staffing the hospital and operating a clinic. But this has expanded to the point now where, although the medical program is still central, there is a large community development program also.

In community development, MCC has helped in the construction of three public schools in the rural communities around Grande Riviere, and supervises a literacy program. Local talents and abilities are channeled into a self-help project where wood carving and embroidery are produced for sale in other countries. Several cooperatives and individual growers are buying chicks from the MCC poultry project, raising them for a period of time, and then selling them in Port-au-Prince markets. MCC supervises the feed-mixing, processing, and marketing procedures.

The educational assistance program was greatly expanded recently. Sponsors send money to Haiti and children are selected and sent to school. The cannery project which cans local food has been attempting to find local markets, but so far the larger market has been the U.S.

MCC also assumes administration and direct sponsorship of a school for training in domestic arts, carpentry, and mechanics. Other projects include swine-breeding, veterinary clinic, gardening, rabbits, a nutrition center, teachers, and an initiated credit union.

"This year we have begun offering Home Bible Studies courses to some people," Stoltzfus said, "and several unit members have begun correcting these courses. The possibilities of expanding to include mission-type work in our area is being investigated by the Eastern Mennonite Board, Salunga."

As Stoltzfus looked into the future, he projected two great needs he would like to see satisfied. "There is a great need in Haiti for some kind of agricultural work. We must teach the people things such as soil conservation, terracing, use of fertilizers, and better farming methods. There has been some interest expressed in this area. Second, there is also a great need for expanding into the area of education, perhaps even starting a school." Bro. Stoltzfus probably won't inaugurate these projects himself. He specializes in keeping people alive. He is an only doctor in an area which includes a town of 6,000, plus the population of the surrounding rural countryside.

Spared for a Reason

Members from various community churches in Carlsbad, N.M., had assembled for the Pecos Valley hymn-sing being held at the Carlsbad Mennonite Church. During the service a 76-year-old man got up to give his testimony. He introduced himself as a retired sailor and a member of the Baptist Church. Then he said that he had just been released from the hospital after a three-month stay.

After thanking everyone for their interest and prayers, he said, "The Lord spared me for some reason, and I want to give my testimony now in a song." He began singing "Jesus, Use Me." He sang two stanzas of the song and was going through the chorus the second time when he suddenly sat down on the front bench.

VS-er Gerry Swartzentruber, a registered nurse, knew that something must be wrong and ran to the front of the auditorium to give assistance. The man, having experienced another heart attack, was stretched out on the front bench while an ambulance was summoned. However, by the time he could be taken to the hospital for treatment, he had passed on to his eternal home.

Wayne and Gerry Swartzentruber, program directors for the Carlsbad, N.M., VS unit who reported the recent incident to Mennonite Board of Missions, concluded: "The Lord was able to use this elderly gentleman's testimony one more time. Perhaps this very meeting was the reason that he had been spared."

Martens Becomes Estate Consultant

The Mennonite Foundation, Inc., Goshen, Ind., announced the appointment of Harry E. Martens to the newly created position of Estate Planning Consultant. Mr. Martens began his new assignment on Jan. 1, 1970. Mr. Martens will devote full time to assisting Mennonites with their Christian estate planning, and he will serve Mennonite institutions as a technical resource person and coordinator on matters relating to special and deferred giving programs.

For the past ten years Mr. Martens has been Assistant to the President at Mennonite Biblical Seminary, Elkhart, Ind. Prior to 1959, he served at Bethel College, North Newton, Kan., as Director of Student Office, Dean of Men, Business Manager, and Assistant to the President. Mr. Martens and his wife, Olga, have given over six years in voluntary service during special periods of leave from church institutions. Mr. Martens has had various administrative responsibilities in MCC relief programs in Europe and the Middle East. He is a graduate of Bethel College and Columbia University.

Mr. Martens will be working closely with other Foundation staff persons, particularly Harold P. Dyck, Financial Services Field Manager, and John H. Rudy, Director of Financial Services.

The Mennonite Foundation, Inc., is an inter-Mennonite service agency dedicated to helping concerned Christian stewards to faithfully manage and employ their accumulated possessions. It furnishes a convenient channel for distribution of gift funds to any part of the Lord's work. The Founda-
Church Purchases Mission Truck

A check for $3,283 was received at Mennonite Board of Missions on Dec. 12, 1969, from the Stoner Heights Mennonite Church near Louisville, Ohio. The amount is intended to replace what the Mission Board spent to purchase a truck for use at the Blue Gap Mission in Chine, Ariz.

Spring Missionary Day, Mar. 9, 1969, marked the beginning of concerted fundraising efforts. Stoner Heights had selected the truck endeavor from a folder listing various children's mission projects released each year by the General Mission Board.

“Our plan was to involve every person in the church regardless of the size of his or her gift,” reported Elvin J. Sommers, pastor of the Stoner Heights congregation.

On Spring Missionary Sunday, persons were asked to write on a piece of paper what they felt the Lord wanted them to give. $3,167 was pledged on that day.

According to Sommers, members began tackling various projects throughout the spring and summer months. Children planted vegetables, raised rabbits, or worked odd jobs and gave what they earned. The church softball team won the league tournament and donated $55. Families worked together, many foregoing personal items they had planned to purchase.

Three persons from the congregation spent a month at Black Mountain Mission near Blue Gap in a special summer VS project helping to construct a parsonage for the Naswood Burbank family who serve there. Upon their return they shared a first-hand report of the need for a pickup truck to haul supplies, transport Indian children, and assist with other work in the Black Mountain-Blue Gap area.

By Fall Missionary Day on November 9, the congregation had raised the sum of $3,283 which in turn was forwarded to Mennonite Board of Missions. A letter accompanying the check was signed by more than 100 members who participated in the project. The vehicle, a 1/2-ton Chevrolet pickup, has already been purchased and is in use at Blue Gap.

“This project has helped us see beyond ourselves,” wrote Pastor Sommers. “I trust our vision will be further broadened as we let Christ give us a greater view of our world mission.”

Black Community Is a Field to Translate the Gospel

More than 600 people jammed the Paradise Mennonite Church, Paradise, Pa., Jan. 4, to hear Tom Skinner speak and answer questions. The New York evangelist, former leader of a gang called Harlem Lords, shattered many of the myths which surround the black people. Skinner urged that the gospel be preached to the black community. He pointed out that for this to be effective blacks will need to go to their own people with the gospel because blacks are suspicious of whites — many have been deceived too often.

Evangelical schools have in the past been closed to blacks who wanted to train for preaching.

Said Skinner, “Many people are all so ready to go to Africa, but yet would not cross a street in the United States to help a black.” The Christian church must recognize the social injustices it has inflicted on blacks and must see in the black community a viable field for the gospel to be translated.”

Health and Welfare Personnel to Meet

H. Ernest Bennett, executive secretary for the Association of Mennonite Hospitals and Homes, has announced plans for the 19th annual meeting of the Association. The program will take place at the Sheraton-Park Hotel in Washington, D.C., Mar. 2-5, 1970.

Bennett noted that the Mennonite Association is a part of the annual meeting of the American Protestant Health Assembly. The two groups will meet conjointly during the week. The Mennonite Association is also a member organization of the American Protestant Hospital Association which meets as part of the Health Assembly.

The registry of the Association of Mennonite Hospitals and Homes encompasses Mennonite institutions of all Mennonite groups in the United States and Canada and includes 25 hospitals; 63 children’s, retirement, and homes for the aging; and 22 Mennonite chaplains. The meeting is open to all interested persons related to Mennonite health and welfare programs.

This year’s program features Senator Mark O. Hatfield of Oregon who will address the group at its annual fellowship luncheon. Other areas of program include special discussions on current health and welfare issues, personnel relations, and sectional meetings.

The complete program with registration information will soon be mailed to all Health and Welfare institutions. Individuals not included on this mailing list are invited to write for more information to H. Ernest Bennett, Box 570, Elkhart, Ind. 46514.

A meeting of the Health and Welfare Committee of Mennonite Board of Missions, which administers the 21 hospital, retirement, and children’s programs affiliated with the General Mission Board, will be held on Mar. 6 in conjunction with the Association meeting. Plans call for a complete program to be released in the near future in several church periodicals.

Students Involved in Mennonite Fellowships

What does a Mennonite student do in a community where his denomination is not represented? The more than 2,000 full-time Mennonite students in non-Mennonite schools beyond high school seldom find themselves the sole Mennonite — although some do — in a community or especially a given campus. What place and shape does the church assume for these Mennonites involved in academic studies?

Mennonite and Church of the Brethren students attending Madison Business College in Madison, Wis., have met in homes and in a meeting room in the United Campus Christian Fellowship Building. The group is concerned that they do not merely organize as a church but rather that they meet for the purpose of furthering relationships. Such an idea implies more than merely planning a series of programs of interest to the immediate group.

The group is considering the questions: What are the implications of being a church? What type of meetings would best pursue this idea? Is the initial concern to discuss the idea in an academic manner or to attempt some actual experimentation?

Interested persons at Indiana University Mennonite Fellowship, Bloomington, Ind., have been meeting regularly for discussion at the University Presbyterian Chapel followed by worship with the chapel congregation. Two graduate couples have been assisting in a study of Concern, No. 5, dealing with the small congregation.

The discussion group, composed primarily of graduate couples, is examining its relationship to each other and to the campus community. The group proposes to involve more undergraduates in the discussions. Periodic social events have included a picnic and a joint carry-in supper with Church of the Brethren students. The fellowship is represented on the Campus Interreligious Council.

"Someone Must Have Been Praying"

"Our most unforgettable experience during the past year was an armed robbery in July," wrote Luke and Mary Martin to family and friends. "During those awful 45 minutes, someone must have been praying for us somewhere. With a pistol and one of Uncle Sam’s grenades, the robber kept us pretty well where he wanted us. We were so aware of God’s protection. We thank Him many times.”

The Martins shared one of their prayer burdens with their friends: “Join us in prayer for this broken bleeding land and for its people. Our true peace is always in Christ, yet how His heart bleeds for those who suffer. Pray that we may know how to weep with those who weep, and to rejoice with those who rejoice.”

"Pray too,” they concluded, “that in our busyness we will not neglect our worship and adoration of Christ. Only in Him can we find justice, love, forgiveness, and peace.”

Luke and Mary Martin, Eastern Board missionaries, are currently serving their second term in Vietnam. They have two children, Steven, age four, and Becky Joanne, three years.

Off-Campus Interterm Courses Planned

Eighty-seven students at Hesston College, Hesston, Kan., will continue their studies off campus during the month of January. These field studies are designed to provide greater freedom and flexibility in college education, as well as to emphasize experience as an essential ingredient in the educational process.

Ten students with their instructor will come to Wichita to study urban sociology. Here they will have the opportunity to make on-the-spot contacts with social agencies such as CAP, RAP, the County Health Department, the County Welfare Department, Police and Fire departments.

Field-trip experiences will also include schools for the underprivileged, school board meetings, and senior citizens' groups. Required readings and lectures by competent sociologists in Wichita will supplement the field experiences.

A group of 17 students and an instructor will do a similar field study in St. Louis.

Thirty students, including an instructor, will travel to Mexico to study Mexican history and culture. In addition to scheduled classes and field trips, the course includes basic readings in Mexican history and culture, living in a Mexican home, and visiting places of historical interest. A highlight of this field study is a weekend trip to Mexico City.

Sixteen students with their instructor will participate in a work-study program in schools on an Indian reservation in Arizona. Students will study the history of the American Indian, his treatment by the white man, and his present circumstances. As observers and assistants, they will gain experience in the techniques of bilingual teaching.

Still another group of 20 students will travel to a camp in the Rocky Mountains at Divide, Colo., to study camp counseling, camp crafts, nature study, and conservation, and winter sports such as skiing, tobogganing, and rock climbing and rappelling.

The one-month interterm is an integral part of the year’s educational program. Courses apply toward social science and physical education requirements. Four hours of credit are granted by the college.

Prayers are being answered—for two young men young in the faith who are experiencing ‘growing pains’ in the Christian life; for another of the staff who recently found her Savior but whose husband will not give permission for her baptism; for softness in the hearts of some officials in government toward the UMN ministry; for the privilege of spending another new day here in the kingdom of Nepal.”

James and Marva (Stutzman) Blough, Heaton, Kan., write: “We finally have definite plans made for our departure for Brazil (Araguacema). Because of the holidays we had some difficulties getting reservations. We will leave Wichita Jan. 8 and arrive in Belem Friday morning.” The Bloughs went to Brazil as self-supporting Overseas Mission Associates.

Erma Grove reports from Accra, Ghana: “I have moved from the village of Pokoase to a new housing area on the edge of Accra. I continue to teach my four Bible classes in the Pokoase government middle school. This work is very challenging. Several weeks ago the Presbyterian minister came to the school and baptized 17 of the pupils. I pray that the teaching they have received in the past few years will bear fruit in their lives.”

Mr. and Mrs. Michael Mast write from the Chaco in Argentina: “We thank God as we consider the blessings of the past year. Having sold almost 500 copies of the Bible lesson booklet we prepared has encouraged us. A good response in the two Bible study conferences we held we must credit to God’s leading and blessing, too. Pray in 1970 for the Bible study conference we hope to hold in perhaps 14 churches during our winter months, for the preparation of another Bible study booklet, for us as we travel and visit in the Indian churches.”

John Driver, Montevideo, Uruguay, reports: “In addition to the assignment in the seminary our family assumed responsibilities this year in the mission of a local congregation. La Paz is a small town located about 30 minutes by city bus from the seminary.”

Wesley and Sue Richard, Sapporo, Japan, say: “With the planned termination of language study coming up next March, we keep one eye on the calendar as we concentrate on study as much as possible. Although we’ve been through a lot of material we still need to cope with discouraging days. We discover daily how closely bound up are words and a people’s way of life. We have also discovered how capable God is of supplying experiences to balance out faith—at just the right time.”

Don Brenneman writes from Pehuajo, Argentina: We organized a vacation Bible school this year—it hadn’t been held here for more than 10 years. We had an average of 26 and have made some valuable contacts. We will baptize 3 members of the Haupt family soon—they have been won for Christ through the radio ministry.”

John Powell will be featured as guest speaker on The Mennonite Hour on Jan. 25. Formerly of Wichita, Kan., Powell serves as executive secretary of the Urban-Racial Council of Mennonite Board of Missions. Powell graduated from Tuskegee Institute in 1964, and since then has served as a junior high teacher, vocational counselor, and as associate pastor at the Detroit Mennonite Church. His work now is to help Mennonite Board of Missions and other church agencies evaluate priorities in urban outreach programs.

Readers Say

Submissions to Readers Say column should comment on printed articles.

I have enjoyed the series of testimonies "I Met God." I appreciate the willingness of these men and women to share some of the intimate realities of their faith. As I read the biographies or testimonies of men I am generally moved to a greater appreciation for them and their cause; this is especially true in the church.

These articles testify to the fact that life is great when devotion to Jesus Christ is undaunted. These testimonies remind me and encourage me to live my life with greater devotion to my Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. These testimonies remind me that the Holy Spirit plays a very significant role in living a purposeful and successful life. It is the Holy Spirit who gives me the understanding and power to activate faith.

I would encourage the readers to turn back to these articles if they have not read them, and I recommend to the editor that he continue to include such testimonies from time to time. — Donald C. Miller, Harrisonburg.

We are requesting that you print the following letter in "Readers Say": It is a shame that a Mennonite would write an article such as "Conversation with Erna" appearing in the Dec. 9 issue of Gospel Herald and it is an equal shame that our church paper should print it unless under the heading "For Discussion." I have not been able to figure out whether Mr. Shelly has simply not been around very much, or has read very little left-wing literature, or has simply chosen to close his eyes to what the Marx-Leninist and their pupils are saying and doing all over the world, or whether someone has simply been able to sell him a pair of rose colored (pink) glasses.

Presumably this article was written to shame and ridicule folk who respect Welch, Hargis, McIntire etc., and who believe that these men are honestly engaged in warning the people of this nation because of real and not imagined dangers. By some queer coincidence, ridicule happens to be the latest method which Moscow is using to "liberate" its religious people from the things they believe to be the truth. Judging from conversations with various people, I feel that this article I would guess that it has succeeded quite well in producing more right-wing defenders.

I never cease to wonder why almost invariably whenever a Mennonite speaks out as a communist, our organization such as that headed by Dr. Franklin Littell is founded to deal with extremism, they wind up furiously fighting those on the right, but have merely "love pats" for those on the left.
I am deeply puzzled why a number of my Men- nonite brethren seem to feel they have a "holy calling" to defend the left and even the commu- nists with their Anti-Christ and Anti-All religion. We readily admit that the fact that the Lord "hates the􏪲nd DF; they love me in this world, and the world loves me not." This is a very unpleasant thought, but it is highly im- probable that our coming to their defense will cause God to ameliorate His righteous judge- ment.

I wonder if author Shelly is assured that wisdom and knowledge resides with him. Could it be just possible that these men on the right which he berates might know a few things too even through their methods of instruction, that we at times offend our sophisticated nature? — Marie- nive W. Landis, 100 W. Roseville Rd., Lancaster, Pa. 17601.

Thank you for the good articles appearing in the Gospel Herald dealing with current issues facing us. There are no simple answers to the problems pressing us today. We cannot run away from them, as some try to do, nor dare we be the proverbial ostrich putting our heads in the sand. We need the best counsel and information that men with experience and spiritual discernment can give us. The salt in this world and to witness for our Lord as we ought.

In the Dec. 9 and 16 issues I was helped by Leighton Ford's articles on "The Church and Evangelism" and on "revolution in a church and must meet the challenge. Some fear the word and speak of it as something we must try to prevent. Ford's biggest question should be every Christian's, is how does the church fit into God's revolution? These articles should help us find the way to effective evangelism in today's revolution.

I must mention also Maynard Shelly's very good articles on "Conversation with Ema. Bro. Shelly is well qualified to write on the subject of extremism and has done a good job of it. The analysis of both the extreme right and the extreme left puts the issue in proper focus. It is not difficult to see that "fear and frustration mark the person drawn to the doctrine of the extremists." Many of our people have accepted the philosophy of extremism because it gives them an explanation of what is going on around them. They have polarization in the church. This is divisive. We must try not to offend the extremists in our midst, otherwise we will lose the opportunity of a positive testimony for God in the church. We must continue steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers. This was not a revolutionary at- tack, but a pointed response, following a total transformation. — S. C. Brubacher, Ayr, Ontario.

By Robert J. Baker

You are a barber. You live in a wee Michigan town out in the boondocks of the Upper Peninsula. Your wife is diabetic. She has a baby, your first. The doctor warns that such children are not healthy and strongly suggests that you have no more children. You name your son, Timothy: he’s your son in the faith. He gains, grows, is alert, is healthy. You decide the doctor is wrong. Another child is born. You are overjoyed. You and your wife are Christians and God has blessed you with a second child. The doctor is wrong indeed. No, the doctor is right. The newborn one weakens, in a few weeks is dead. You will have no more children by natural birth.

Now what? It’s a good time to tell God off. It’s a good time to withdraw from Him, from the church, to feel hurt. It’s a good time to take that first son who survived and lavish your affection upon him. Let the rest of the world go by. You still have your Tim. You wanted more, but God said “No.” O.K., if that’s the way God wants it, so be it. You were willing to distribute your love among many children, now you will concentrate it on this one you have, Tim, bone of your bone, flesh of your flesh.

I wonder what you would have done under similar circumstances, I wonder what I would have done? Would we have done what Simon and Patsy Schwartz of Pickford, Michigan, did? I doubt it. Their faith is not the common-run-of-the-mill type. No, not many people have their brand of faith. And in addition, their love comes in the king size container, not the small two-ounce jar.

When they pray, they come boldly to the throne of grace, walking in the front door to find the Lord Himself. They know God on a first-name basis. God is a personal friend of theirs. If they need $500, they ask Him for it. And they get it. If there is something they want, and they believe that God wants them to have it, they go after it hammer and tongs, even to arranging for their congressman to introduce a special bill into the Michigan legislature so that they might have that desire of their heart. Selfish? I think I would rather define this Schwartzonian trait as “Determination,” and you best spell it with a capital “D.” Their determination springs out of a simple, childlike faith in God, sort of a scarce commodity these days.

I received a letter this past summer from Simon that said he wanted to tell me about how “God gave his children to him.” Now people used to tell their little ones that God sent tiny babies to this earth, but we decided to be more honest and canceled out the arrival of babies via angels, storks, or doctor’s little black bags. But Simon in his letter bluntly stated that God gave them their children. The strange thing is that Simon Schwartz has some remarkable evidence to support his case, proof that God “gave” him and his wife at least five of their six children. I say this after talking to him. If you think that Brother and Sister Schwartz are a little naive, put me down that way also. I too believe that God gave them five children.

It was in 1951 that Timothy Schwartz arrived. As stated above, his birth and childhood was normal. I met him this past summer (1969) in the U.P. of Michigan. Today he is a strapping boy of 18. He has no natural siblings, but he has five sisters, four of them Korean. When I asked him what he thought of this unusual family, his eyes sparkled. He confessed, “They’re the greatest!”

The unusual thing, however, is not that the Schwartzes adopted five daughters, although that’s no mean task for one to do on a barber's income. The unusual thing is how God entered the scene when each child was sought. God seemed to provide the “angle,” God seemed to provide the money whenever necessary. When that happens five times in a row one begins to expect that the Schwartzes have something going for them. They do. That “Something” is God.

In 1958 Patsy Schwartz, wanting a family, but not being able to have that family, was reading in the little weekly paper, “The Grit,” about a Harry Holt, an Oregon farmer, who went to Korea and adopted eight orphans. He was seeking to interest other Americans in this worthy project.

Robert J. Baker is a writer and teacher from Elkhart, Ind.
The Schwartz family of three asked him to make their family a foursome, to "get them a child." After much paper work a Korean orphan, Jennifer, was assigned to them. Her picture arrived and happiness reigned in the barber's home. Then sadness. A letter arrived saying that an epidemic of virus pneumonia had struck the orphanage. Jennifer was very ill. They did not expect her to live. And what did Simon, Patsy, and Timothy do? They had a prayer meeting. Simon said to me simply, "The Lord healed Jennifer." In a few weeks they had God's gift to them, a three-month-old Korean baby. When I saw her this past summer, she was a petite beauty of eleven, lovely in looks, lovely in action.

Two years later, Simon and Patsy, now well satisfied with Jenny, sought to adopt another Korean child. Immigration laws were changing, it was more difficult, but Patricia, another Korean orphan, was assigned to them. The Immigration Service upon investigation, however, decided that the Schwartz barber income was not sufficient to support another child. Sorry, no Patricia. So what do the Schwartzes do? Why, they do as they always do, they pray. They obtained recommendations from friends and authorities fired them off to the Immigration Service. In less than two weeks the immigration authorities reversed themselves. Soon Patty arrived from Korea, eight months old, full of spunk and spirit. By now a law is passed stating that only two immigrant orphans could come to one home. So again, Brother and Sister Schwartz thought their family was complete.

"In 1962," Simon told me, "the Lord spoke to Patsy and we applied for a child through a local adoption agency." At first, the adoption agency said, "Yes, a child would be available in January 1963." Then for unexplained reasons the adoption agency changed their minds. There would be no child available to the Schwartz family. Was it because of their integrated family? Or, again, was it because there are a limited number of heads of hair to cut in Pickford, Michigan, a factor that decides the income from the little barber shop operated by Simon Schwartz? It doesn't matter, the "No" was definite. But God got busy again for these Upper Peninsula Mennonites. A sister from the church they attend was in the hospital. In her ward was a woman who just had a baby but could not keep it. She wanted to put it in a Christian home. Bells started ringing in the mind of the Mennonite sister. She immediately thought of the Schwartz family. Would they want another child? She would ask. Did Simon and Patsy want a new addition to their family? Of course, they did! They had been praying for one. Quickly Simon made arrangements with the local courts and he and Patsy became the proud parents of a six-day-old baby girl, Julie. God moves in a mysterious way. His wonders to perform.

The year is now 1966. The Lord was speaking to Patsy about getting another child from Korea. Her heart went out to these tragically orphaned little ones. But Simon thought it useless to try. It would take nearly $500 now to bring a child here from Korea and that was about 250 haircuts in those days. Besides, the law said only two to a family and the Schwartz family had Jennie and Patty. But God began to get into the act again. Company came to the Schwartz home one weekend and out of a clear blue sky gave them $500. That's right, "gave" them $500. I would love to invite such company to my house. Simon told me, "We took that as a sign from the Lord and sent in another application to the Holt agency." Mr. Holt thought there was a chance to sneak another Korean orphan into the Schwartz family since Jennie had been obtained before the law was passed restricting two to a family. They went to the immigration authorities with a request for another Korean child. Request denied. They called the Detroit office where their request had been rejected and were promptly rebuffed. The Schwartzes got out their prayer guns and pointed them at Detroit. Pow! They fired off another petition, explaining, clarifying, requesting, seeking. Like the widow of Luke 18 they pounded away at the "unjust judge." Their petition was finally approved. Another trip to the airport in Chicago and the third Korean girl, Linnea, was theirs. The Schwartz family now swarms with five children. One is their own, one another Caucasian, three Korean. Time to quit? You must be jesting.

Simon and Patsy have been supporting a boy in Korea for four years. In 1969 they decided to try to adopt him. He is seven years old. How can they pull this one off? This may take a little politician pressure. So they contact their congressman. He agrees to sponsor a special bill in the Michigan legislature to get their child to America. Thus backed up by this power offer, they apply, apply for the seven-year-old Korean boy they have been supporting for four years. For seven years no one has wanted this orphan child. Now, suddenly he is assigned to an American family living in Japan. They adopt him. Tough. But that's the way the ball bounces. There is no Korean boy available to Simon and Patsy Schwartz regardless of how many bills you can get rammed through the Lansing, Michigan, legal machine. The Schwartzes decide to sit tight for the moment. Let the Lord pick out the child He wanted them to have.

And God does exactly that. The Holt agency sends a picture of a six-month-old Korean girl that could enter the United States under a special "non-preference quota number" that would be limited to only nine people coming from Korea. If the Schwartzes wanted her they should write immediately to the American Consulate at Seoul, Korea. The law concerning two Korean orphans only per family would not apply, nor would they need a special congressional bill. In two months Brother and Sister Schwartz went to the O’Hare International Airport in Chicago to pick up Anne, age, eight months. When I saw Anne at Camp Manikiki in the Upper Peninsula of Michigan, she was a little Korean butter ball contently siphoning American milk from an American Evenflo baby bottle. These Korean children are good-looking children.

But wait a minute! There is the matter of $500 for transportation costs. They round it up, but how can they repay it? The profit on a haircut is not exactly earth shaking. For one and a half years they have been praying for the additional money they would need if this sixth child was to be theirs. Will the Lord come through with another $500? Well, He came through with 90 percent of it! They had gotten another car some time ago. How long ago? One year and a half ago. They wanted to sell their old car. But no one would buy it. The week that Anne came, that old car was sold. For eighteen months no one wanted it, but in the fullness of time, God came. The car was sold for $450. For the other $50 Simon performed tontorial operations. The borrowed money is repaid.

I asked Patsy Schwartz if she would do it again. Her expression was one of amazement as she said, “Why, of course.” To me it seemed like a terrific undertaking to add five children to your family by adoption, four of them Oriental. To her it was the normal thing to do.

Simon said to me, “People often tell us what a wonderful thing we have done for these children by making a home for them. They forget what these children have done for us, the thousand blessings that are ours because of them.”

The standards for measuring success are funny things. Simon and Patsy Schwartz would not appear to be wealthy, influential, leaders, important personages. Few people in the Mennonite Church have heard about them. They have served on no important churchwide committees, preached no conference sermons, written no books. The little Mennonite Church they attend in the Upper Peninsula has only 18 members according to Zook’s 1969 Yearbook. It is the Wayside Church near Brimley, Michigan. It is not the Blooming Glen behemoth near Philadelphia or the Goshen College gargantuan congregation of Mennonite Alley fame in northern Indiana. No, it is a wee church near Whitefish Bay which is a part of Lake Superior. It is fitting. They are a humble people, the barber, his wife, their six children.

And yet one suspects that these humble people are living far above many of us spiritually. While we fearfully hesitate, they brazenly do. How can they? It’s simple. They have mustards seed faith put up in ten-pound packages. They take God at His Word. And as a result God has done for them the fantastic, the unbelievable, the impossible. Simon and Patsy Schwartz’s simple, sweet faith in God plus their special brand of love for the lonely child of this world appear to be the catalysts that moves God into action on their behalf. For them He opens the closed door, cuts through the binding red tape, twists the unwilling arm.

Pretty neat, Lord, how You work.

Loose Livers Needed

A preacher was surprised when a lady asked him one Sunday morning to pray for her gall bladder. He told her apologetically that he wasn’t in the habit of being quite that specific in his prayers. “Oh but you are,” she replied. “Last week you prayed for all the loose livers.”

It is easy to be misunderstood. And I would certainly not encourage that persons live loosely as loose living is commonly understood. I would, however, encourage congregations to do more to free people to be more fully what God intends for them. They are God’s gifts to the congregation. Each person in your congregation is an unrepeatable event.

To take God’s good gifts seriously requires a certain “looseness” in congregational life. In the decade just beginning, persons not only should but must be taken more seriously than they have been. Young people see this need more clearly than most adults. They talk about depersonalization. They refer to the limits the church, home, and school place upon them. Some such comments are calling for a kind of worldly freedom, but not all. What is really needed is the assurance that the church will not crush a new generation into the mold of the old.

The last half of the decade just past saw the denomination, the conference, and many congregations concentrating on rebuilding their organizational structures. I have no reason to question the good work that was done. But let us begin the new decade with a determination not to let people become the slaves of structures. Rather, let us make structures serve to enhance the gifts of people.

Your congregation can begin with some very simple things like these. Appoint a Sunday school teacher not for a year but for a quarter. Ask him which quarter he would be most comfortable with in terms of his interests and skills. Many persons say no to a year of teaching because they feel incompetent to teach this or that quarter.

Watch for emerging talent. Some congregations find a song leader or a Sunday school superintendent then stop looking for ten years. Don’t!

Encourage the use of the best materials (Herald Press, of course) and the best methods. Give teachers the freedom to try new things especially with youth classes.

Make a concerted effort to find out where people would like to be involved and what they would like to see done in the congregation. Then take them seriously. Even if it creates a certain congregational “looseness.”

The Church and the Mini-religions

It appears that the Protestant churches’ long-standing and embarrassing habit of spinning off new splinter denominations with almost assembly-line efficiency is on the wane. The new situation, however, may not be reason for applause. Splinter groups often were the result of strongly held opinions and convictions. Now, with increasing frequency, people who are at odds with the church tend to opt for a non-church relationship altogether. The idea of setting up a new congregation or denomination more to their liking isn’t even considered an option.

The vacuum left by this diminished interest in denominational Christianity is being filled to some degree by the “mini-religions.” This word was coined by Melvin L. Arnold, president of Harper and Row, Publishers, Ltd., who commented recently that “mini-religions” may be exerting more influence today than traditional religions.” By mini-religions he meant astrology, spiritual mediums, drugs, the cult of violence, and the magnification of sex.

Martin Marty has made a similar observation in a recent essay entitled, “The Spirit’s Holy Errand: The Search for a Spiritual Style in Secular America.”

According to Bruce Shelley, writing in the NAE Action, Marty predicts that the search for a spiritual style appropriate to our secular setting will result in many wild experiments. As examples he lists ESP (extrasensory perception), LSD, speaking in tongues, entering Trappist monasteries, becoming involved in East Harlem, joining the Peace Corps, and seeking liberation through the new morality. Although some of the above “experiments” would be viewed as quite in keeping with traditional church activities by most church people, other items on the list would be quickly identified as totally unacceptable for Christians.

This turning to the so-called “mini-religions” should cause the church to ask very seriously again, as it has at several critical points in its history, where it is failing and why, and how it can correct these deficiencies.

Two things seem to be coming through. First, many people are yearning to experience life more deeply, to be ecstatic, to be carried away by joy and beauty and hope. This is revealed, I believe, by the growing preoccupation with speaking in tongues, the use of drugs to go “tripping,” and the revived interest in ESP and spiritual mediums.

Second, there is still a surging desire to combat the world’s ills through service, pure and simple. The “marches for millions,” the establishment of a growing number of community volunteer organizations, and church-related voluntary service are just a few of the ventures which attest to the high priority which many people are giving to the extension of a helping hand to the downtrodden.

The Mennonite churches have extensive service programs, but so often this service is rendered with little joy because we want our service to carry so much other freight. We still find it difficult to see service—the variety which doesn’t have strings attached—as part of our central mission.

Churches need not go paddling after every transient little wave of public opinion, but there are currents running today which they need to take more fully into account. Churches need to do more than sit and listen and talk; it is imperative, we believe, that they give people opportunities and encouragement for service and room and reason for ecstasy.

Knowing and Doing the Word

I’m not sure what it says about the religious life of America when polls point out that over half of American Christians cannot as much as name the first five books of the New Testament. One’s salvation is certainly not based on how many books of the Bible can be named. Yet one wonders if this lack of knowledge might say a good bit about the level of present-day faith.

In a Sunday school class some time ago the teacher pointed out that young people today often find study of the Scripture dull and uninteresting. He questioned whether the Bible has become too familiar. You know, we’ve heard it from the time of our birth.

A college Bible teacher in the class answered this question by saying, “Let me assure you, young people today do not find the Bible dull because they know it so well. Many of our young people are biblically illiterate.”

Why is the Bible dull? First of all it is not dull to the person who has taken time to really read and study it. Second, perhaps the primary reason why the Bible lacks intrigue is that we come to it without a sense of commitment. We seem to have created a climate of hearing without any expectation to do. That is, we preach and teach but really do not expect people to make a definite, to the death, commitment to what God says. Only as we commit ourselves to the truth of Scripture will it have power, persuasion, and profound interest. In a real sense it is only after doing what the Scripture says that we really know and appreciate what it says.—D.
The Thousand-Year Period

By T. E. Schrock

This is an attempt to ascertain what the Bible says will take place during the thousand-year period in Revelation 20:1-16. The writer believes that God does not intend that such an important part of our Christian faith should be clouded with uncertainty. Only the Bible can clarify it.

The Devil Is Forcefully Vanished

"And I saw an angel come down from heaven, having the key of the bottomless pit and a great chain in his hand. And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the Devil, and Satan, and bound him a thousand years, and cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more, till the thousand years should be fulfilled: and after that he must be loosed a little season." (Rev. 20:1-3). The incident is referred to in Jude 5-7 "... The Lord, having saved the people out of the land of Egypt, afterward destroyed them that believed not. And the angels which kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation, he hath reserved in everlasting chains under darkness unto the judgment of the great day."

In 2 Peter 2:4-6 we read, "For if God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment; and spared not the old world, but saved Noah the eighth person, a preacher of righteousness, bringing in the flood upon the world of the ungodly; and turning the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah into ashes condemned them with an overthrow, making them an example unto those that after should live ungodly." Not only is it stated of Satan’s binding in past tense, but it is included as a judgment of God, with three other historical events of the past. This by scriptural rules of interpretation, is established biblical truth. Then the devil is "chained" and "bound" now, by whatever way the terms imply.

Satan’s Judgment Came at Christ’s Crucifixion

Christ by His birth was prepared to die. One of His purposes for dying was to destroy the devil. In Hebrews 2:14 we read, "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same; that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil." Other declarations of the devil’s doom are: "No man can enter into a strong man’s house, and spoil his goods, except he will first bind the strong man; and then he will spoil his house" (Mk. 3:27). "And he [Jesus] said unto them, I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven" (Lk. 10:18). "Now is the judgment of this world: now shall the prince of this world be cast out" (Jn. 12:31). "And there was war in heaven: Michael and his angels fought against the dragon; and the dragon fought and his angels, and prevailed not; neither was his place found any more in heaven" (Rev. 12:7, 8).

This is the beginning of the thousand-year period. (If this is incorrect, please let it be shown from Scripture.) This is the time the Great Redemption was wrought through our Lord Jesus Christ, and His kingdom was ushered in.

The Region of Satan’s Banishment Is the Earth

"And the great dragon was cast out, that old serpent, called the Devil, and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world: he was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him. And I heard a loud voice saying in heaven, Now is come salvation, and strength, and the kingdom of our God, and the power of his Christ: for the accuser of our brethren is cast down, which accused them before our God day and night. And they overcame him by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony; and they loved not their lives unto the death. Therefore rejoice, ye heavens, and ye that dwell in them. Woe to the inhabitants of the earth and of the sea: for the devil is come down unto you, having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time" (Rev. 12:9-12).

That this is the Church Period is shown in verses 10, 11, 17. "Now is come salvation, — they overcame him by the blood of the Lamb, and . . . testimony." See full quotation above. "And the dragon was wroth with the woman [evidently the church], and went to make war with the remnant of her seed, which keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ." Revelation 12 reveals the real character of the devil. He fought hard to remain in heaven but was expelled. He was furious because his time was limited (thousand-year period). Paul writes of him in Ephes-longsuffering taken of or were taken of their and was able to them. Wherefore, then will follow this assurance that is given.

But Satan had lived among the saints, and had been the centre of their thoughts and prayers.

Yet, they were not to refuse worshiping the beast with the crowd.

This the saints considered worth being beheaded for, and to refuse worshiping the beast with the crowd. Death is the passageway to this reign with Christ. “To day shalt thou be with me in paradise,” Jesus said. “Having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ,” says Paul.

There is nothing stated in this passage, that could be taken as establishing a literal, earthly reign or of sinful people participating in this holy company.

Salvation Is Open to All to the End of the World

After answering the scoffers about the Lord’s return, 2 Peter 3:1-8, the Bible states the reason for delay, and what takes place when He comes. “The Lord is not slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness; but is longsuffering to usward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance. But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up” (2 Pet. 3:9, 10).

Then follows a Christian exhortation to be ready, “Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness. . . . Nevertheless we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. Wherefore, beloved, seeing that ye look for such things, be diligent that ye may be found of him in peace, without spot, and blameless” (vv. 11, 13, 14).

With this admonition and urgency, agrees the whole New Testament. It seems there need be no feeling of compulsion to explain the puzzling passages of Ezekiel, and some other prophets. Neither Paul, nor any of the other New Testament writers explained them.

Disappointment is a little-lauded but invaluable aid in long-range programming. With it I use the “glorious dream.” The contrast is devastating.

Christians are committed to live lives of hope. This is one of the big sales pitches they use with their worldly brothers who are bowed under the weight of sin. Because of this mental set, they are most susceptible to my suggestions of hoped-for perfection. I feed them visions of the perfect marriage, the perfect church, the perfect society. They know, of course, that none of these have ever been achieved—but nearly every Christian at some time or other believes that his impossible dream can become reality.

I won’t go into the disillusionments of marriage again; they’re so commonplace as to be almost boring. The perfect church is just as impossible, but it usually takes a bitter experience to convince the true believer that there’s no use trying. Sometimes I get him to fasten his faith to an individual that he feels symbolizes the best the church can produce. When the hero worship is ripe, even a small deviation—a critical word, a slight, or a poor performance when great things are expected—can spoil the image. The same goes for the church as a whole. The more glorious the dream, the sadder the awakening.

And what disenchantment is in store for the Christian who thinks he can restructure society! His heart torn by the inequality and misery he sees among his fellowmen, he fervently dedicates himself to righting wrongs and alleviating suffering. And he succeeds—part of the time. This is what makes the moment of truth so painful—his sudden realization that some to whom he has given most are unreformable opportunists, and a few for whom he has prayed, sweat, and shed tears laugh at him or kick him in the shins. These are the characters that turn Christians into cynics.

Sometimes I feel a little sad myself as I witness the disappointing outcome of some noble endeavor. It must be empathy. I can’t help wondering what the Opposition may be programming for my favorite dreams.

Even if you are on the right track, you will get run over if you just sit there.

Can I Accept Myself?

By Alta Mae Erb

Many people do not like themselves. They are discouraged by a burden of inferiority, afraid to reach out for experience, afraid to let others come too close to them, or unable to attain their ideals. Self-rejection is so full of self-hurt that it cannot be God’s will.

One is asked to participate in a dialogue on forgiveness, “I can’t do that” may be a true estimate of his ability. But if he follows with “I can’t do much of anything,” he reveals an underestimation of self. His I-can’t self-concept may keep him from good performance, even if he attempts the task in a good spirit.

Continued inadequate feelings keep the person from wholesome approaches to experience, and therefore, from tasting success.

“Will you take a class in the primary department next quarter? You do so well with your own children.”

If this offer is rejected, it may mean both loss of self-growth and of a needed service in the church. Feelings of adequacy are basic to a good self-concept, and need the encouragement of successful performance.

Another attitude some people hold toward self is seen in such expressions as these: “Nobody talks to me”; “People shun me”; “I don’t know how to make friends”; “I am so lonely.” Such self-deprecating people may turn to superficial aids to success. Women may voice this feeling of rejection more than men, but any man who feels he is rejected is suffering.

Self-rejection, whether verbalized or not, comes from the many details of the self-picture one has. Dwelling on how far I am from my ideal, my many failures in the past, my guilt feelings, my lack of a safe place in which to stay (Ps. 91)—such personal-worth pictures are defeating. Tragedy may follow some of these stances.

Self-acceptance is not so readily verbalized, but is just as real and just as effective in one’s living. It makes for enjoyable living, for growth in Christian living. “The Spirit that God has given us does not make us timid; instead, his Spirit fills us with power and love and self-control” (2 Tim. 1:7).*

Self-acceptance thinks, “I am a person.” “I can do some things well.” Jesus praised the woman who did what she could, and told us about her. Persons who can look at themselves with increasing respect see that they are in some sense unique, and therefore valuable. Jesus said, “Thou art Peter,” and so He speaks to each of us by name.

Proper faith in one’s self enables one to function adequately and prevents his being easily frustrated. A consciousness of ability is a powerful force in one’s behavior. “I think I can, I think I can!” The command not to think more highly of self than one ought to think (Rom. 12:3) tells that a certain degree of self-acceptance is in God’s plan for “reasonable service.” One must think something of oneself. The caution comes because there is the possibility of either pride or humility. “God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble” (1 Pet. 5:5). Psychologist Jersild thinks that “humility is a form of inner strength, a kind of dignity that makes it less necessary for a person to pretend.” (Arthur T. Jersild, When Teachers Face Themselves, Bureau of Publication, Teachers College, Columbia University, N.Y., 1955, p. 96).

False humility keeps some people from accepting themselves, for they think acceptance would be pride. Since such persons are very unhappy with themselves, we know God’s plan for man is a better one.

Proper self-evaluation is a great help in relating to others. One need not view others as a threat, and become jealous, nor reject giving and receiving in relating to others.

Rightly appraising oneself as a person is a difficult task. God would have us “think soberly” about ourselves—moderately, gravely, calmly, realistically, rationally, honestly. Such thinking is found only in a good relationship with God.

Man gets his self-assurance from who he is—the creation of God. “I have created him for my glory” (Is. 43:7). “It is he that hath made us” (Ps. 100:3). “I am fearfully and wonderfully made” means not only the physical makeover. The person is more than the body. What God made is a whole person—body, mind, soul, and spirit. David’s self-estimation led him to praise God: “Marvellous are thy works; and that my soul knoweth right well” (Ps. 139:14).

Paul says, “We are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works” (Eph. 2:10).

Faith in God implies that believing these basic facts, we properly view ourselves in the light of them, with the psalmist whose heart was fixed, trusting in the Lord (Ps. 112:7); with Job, who knew God would put strength in him (23:6); and with the Apostle Paul, who knew that he could do anything God asked him to do (Phil. 4:13).

God had a purpose in making each person. He made each one for some distinct task in His kingdom. My worth is not mine through merit, but it is a gift from God. Each one has a different measure of faith for the use of his gift. Self-acceptance is an act of faith in God. Christ enables each one to be and do what He wills. I can do something good in His kingdom. There is a place for me. “I have worth”—this is a fundamental requirement for right thinking about self.

I feel my limitations, but I can see that others are limited too. To be irked under one’s limitations is a lack of appreciation for the gift I have. Self-acceptance enables me to face limitations and live happily with them, knowing my limits are set by God.

Armin Grams says, “Frequently we forget that true greatness and genuine humility exist only where an individual has appropriately assessed his capabilities and worth for what they really are and then acknowledges their limitations in the face of infinitely superior standards" (Children and Their Parents, Denison, 1963, p. 87).

Sin and guilt may cause depression and feelings of inferiority. But with God is forgiveness for sin and the removal of guilt. He can restore to a right view of self. When one is crucified with Christ the old self no longer reigns. A new self is operating. Self-condemnation gives way to the reality of God's continual forgiveness and cleansing.

To function adequately in life one must be at peace with himself. This peace is a result of the confidence I have in God to restore me to right thinking about myself at any point in my life.

Faith for building self-acceptance is a "support from behind . . . that which relies on what one has done and what one possesses. Christianity does not despise it, since all we possess is given of God, and all we do comes from the creative spirit implanted in our hearts by God. Support from in front is that which relies on what we hope and believe in, on the promises of God."

Open Letter

Thanksgiving, 1969

Main Street
Your Town, U.S.A.

Dear Mr. Mennonite:

Last Sunday I sat with you in your Sunday school class as the needs of the poor and underprivileged of the world were discussed. You seemed to be so concerned! Your church is supporting the work of MCC and the Mission Board as they reach out to help the poor. (While you didn't mention it, we both know you are making large private contributions to these causes in addition to contributing more than the average church member does in your local congregation.)

Some in the class pointed out that their son was in VS really helping in some pretty bad situations. As I recall the discussion the whole class was concerned about those in other countries who because of war or communist governments didn't have all the blessings we have in this country. Then someone mentioned the poor in our own cities. Another talked about the $6.00 per member that the church is trying to raise for the minorities in our own cities. A number of the businessmen in the class mentioned the shortage of labor in their plants and concluded that if these people would work, they wouldn't be poor. Anyway all your money, and then some, will be needed for the new church building; remember how I jabbed you then?

Today I sat with you in your company meeting as you distributed profits at the end of a very successful year. A cloud on the horizon is the competition from foreign imports. People there will work for so much less than your own employees so the competition isn't fair. You decided that you must ask the government to protect you from these poor people in foreign countries with low living standards. The average hourly wage of the worker in your plant is already 65¢ an hour above minimum wage which exceeds the national average for your industry. But it was a good year, so naturally management and ownership must be rewarded for its hard work. That's the way we do things in this country. All salaries from the top to the bottom were raised 6 percent because of the increase of the cost of living. To meet the competitive labor market you also inaugurated a graduated pension plan based on earning.

All day I tried to get your attention. I wanted to point out to you that your salary was already three times higher than that of your average employee. The cost of living increase meant an increase for you of $900 while your employee receives only $300 additional per year. On top of that, you received a large management bonus plus a good dividend on your invested capital. When you retire you will receive full social security benefits, plus the benefits of a previously approved pension plan set up to cover only management personnel. And all of you also have large life insurance policies. I wanted to remind you that the husband or wife of your employee must work in order that they together will hopefully have enough for the necessities of life.

Today you had the power in your hands to alter many of the inequities in our society. I tried to point this out to you, but every decision you made was for your own advantage so that the gap between you and your average employee is wider than ever. You told me to leave you alone. Sunday was the only day you needed me. During the week you could handle the business affairs much better without my advice. With this letter I must inform you to seek another conscience. Either you must use me full time or not at all.

With great concern for your future.

In the wake of a gloomy study by professional consultants who reported that United Church of Canada congregations in Toronto could get along with only half their 150 buildings, Anglican officials reported they may have to close some churches too.

Leaders of the Diocese of Toronto said attendance has dropped 10 percent in the last 10 years in Anglican churches, some of which may have to be closed in the next few years. In 1958, Anglican parish rolls carried 224,000 members, but a census last year showed only 200,000.

Dr. Benjamin Spock, the noted pediatrician and anti-war leader, has called for new laws to curb what he calls a trend toward “shock obscenity” in movies, art, and literature.

“For decades I was an uncompromising civil libertarian and scorned the hypocrisy involved with the enforcement of obscenity laws,” he states in an article appearing in the January issue of Redbook.

However, he notes that the increasing glut of “shock obscenity” and the courts’ acceptance of it has forced him to change his position concerning just forms of censorship.

“Of course, I’d be best satisfied if people would decline in such great numbers to support shocking literature and presentations that the producers would give up in discouragement,” Dr. Spock said.

Conceding that it is unlikely “an overwhelming revulsion” will occur for another 10 to 20 years, Dr. Spock promises to join a majority, if such develops, “in favor of new laws . . .

These new laws would “determine guilt simply on the basis of judges’ and juries’ sense of shock and revulsion.”

“I’d want such laws to specify that they are not intended to discourage the presentation of themes involving immorality, lawlessness, cruelty, or perversion . . . but only to curb a shocking manner of presentation,” the author explained.

An American Baptist editor said in Valley Forge, Pa., that the U.S. civilian population cannot cleanse its conscience of the guilt of Song My by blaming “a Green Beret, or a few soldiers who become scapdogs.”

The Rev. Norman DeFuy, editor of Missions, commented on the reported massacre in South Vietnam in the January issue of his magazine.

“The only thing more disgusting than the reports of the massacres . . . is the obscenity of a nation trying to cover its sins through the sacrifice of a few of its military agents,” he wrote.

Mr. DeFuy declared that no knowledgeable person is “surprised by reports of U.S. soldiers massacring Vietnamese” since weapons which “scatter on impact and cut people to ribbons” have been used and defended.

The editor said that the guilt of Song My and the war in general is so great that all U.S. citizens must bear it.

For a nation which “prides itself on its good manners and righteousness,” he added, “the only possible redemption lies in the direction of facing our sins and recognition that it is high time that man found some instrument other than war to solve his problems.”

Dr. David Poling warned that when the communication media is “curtailed, coerced, democracy withers and totalitarianism surges to the top.”

The president of The Christian Herald Association and Christian Herald magazine made his comments in testimony before the Senate Subcommittee on Communications. It is conducting hearings on a bill proposed by Sen. John O. Pastore (D.-R.I.) to revise television licensing procedures.

Dr. Poling, taking note of recent criticism of newspaper and television practices by Vice-President Agnew, said:

“I recall that during this period a tone, a sense of intimidation, has emerged that was encouraged and inspired by the vice-president. Should this become a strategy, an administrative device to deal with one’s critics, this would be a bleak day for television, and a bad day for the public.”

A test case brought by 15 Connecticut residents is challenging the allocation of federal funds to church-controlled colleges.

Sponsored by the American Jewish Congress and the Connecticut Civil Liberties Union, the suit in the U.S. District Court for Connecticut seeks an injunction to halt grants to Sacred Heart University, Fairfield University, Anhurrs College, and Albertus Magnus College, all in Connecticut.

Among the 15 plaintiffs are a minister of the United Church of Christ, the Rev. Charles L. Pendleton of West Hartford, and a physician, a high school teacher, an aeronautical engineer, a housewife, a former member of the state Election Laws Commission, and nine college professors.

John Warwick Montgomery, a church historian and professor, charges that a “self-satisfied church is a damned church.”

The teacher at Trinity Evangelical Divinity School of the Evangelical Free Church makes the statement in his book Damned Through the Church to be published in Minneapolis in February by Bethany Fellowship, Inc.

Dr. Montgomery quotes the words of Christ from the Revelation, warning: “Because you are lukewarm and neither cold nor hot, I will spew you out of my mouth.”

The author is chairman of the Division of Church History and Christian Thought at Trinity and serves also as a guest lecturer at De Paul University in Chicago. In his foreword to the book he reminds of the New Testament price demanded of disciples: “Only those who lose their lives for Christ’s sake will ever find them.”

He prescribed strong medicine for the church today as he defined “biblical concepts” of churchgoing and compares current attitudes with “damnable epochs” in church history.

A family of six serving under the Sudan Interior Mission were among 87 passengers killed in the Nigerian Airways VC-10 crash on the outskirts of Lagos, Nigeria, Nov. 20.

Mr. and Mrs. Ross Carson and their four children, ages 4 to 11, were returning home to New Zealand on their furlough when the plane dropped into thick forest and burst into flames attempting to land at the Ikeja airstrip.

The airplane was piloted by a New Zealand member of BOAC’s elite corps of pilots who had flown Queen Elizabeth. It was the first VC-10 to crash.

The accident marked the first time in SIM’s 76-year history that life has been lost during travel to or from Africa.

Agencies claiming to be successful in smuggling large quantities of Testaments, Gospels, and evangelical booklets into Red China may be considered suspect.

This view is held by the editors of Asia News Report. They stated that some missionaries decline to state their methods of smuggling while others offer the “incredible and naive” method of contacting Chinese People’s Liberation Army soldiers in Macau, who take the books across the border for them.

“No credible Christian source in Hong Kong or Macau will accept that it is possible to smuggle quantities of Bibles or other Christian literature into Red China,” the report said.
Urban-Racial Council Changes Name

The executive committee of the Urban-Racial Council, meeting in Elkhart on Jan. 9 and 10, voted to change the name (effective immediately) of the organization to the "Minority Ministries Council."

In giving a rationale for the name shift, John Powell, executive secretary for the council, said, "When formation of a commission for urban-racial affairs was authorized during Mission '68 at Kidron, Ohio, there was at that time one primary focus of concern - black. We now have to look seriously at the Spanish-American and Puerto-Rican demands for equality. This name change is crucial in bringing about a simplification and unification of structure and lines of communication to better work at all areas of minority problems."

Because the Mennonite Board of Missions relates to a wide range of minority group areas, Powell anticipates a confrontation with other groups demanding adequate representation; for example - Indian and Appalachian.

"If a structure can be created from the start that encompasses all minority concerns, less problems will appear later," Powell said. "It is better to have one unified workable body rather than having several splinter groups competing with each other for the same dollars and other resources."

Executive Committee members working with Powell on the newly titled Minority Ministries Council are: Sammy Santos, Bronx, N.Y.; John Ventura, Denver, Colo.; Hubert Schwartzzenteruber, St. Louis, Mo.; Gerald Hughes, Cleveland Heights, Ohio; and Hubert Brown, Goshen, Ind.

The council's executive committee convenes four times a year. The Minority Ministries Council, composed of representatives from all Mennonite interracial congregations, will in turn meet once a year.

MCC Responds to Nigerian Emergency

With the collapse of Biafra and the cessation of relief flights to that former area, an expanded emergency relief operation is shaping up within Nigeria. One such effort is that sponsored by the Christian Council of Nigeria (CCN).

A cable received Wednesday, Jan. 14, at the MCC headquarters in Akron reads: BIAFRA SURRENDER STOP THOUSANDS OF REFUGEES RELEASED STOP RELIEF OPERATIONS SHIFTED TO AGENCIES OPERATING FEDERAL SIDE STOP DESPERATE NEED FOR FUNDS SAVE AS MANY LIVES AS POSSIBLE STOP PLEASE RESPOND WITH WHATEVER YOU HAVE AVAILABLE SOONEST GRATEFUL. The cable was signed by Emmanuel Urhobo, the director of the rehabilitation commission of the Christian Council of Nigeria.

In response, MCC is sending $25,000 from funds on hand designated for relief in Nigeria to CCN to enable them to purchase local medicines and foods.

In a telephone conversation with CCN officials in Lagos, Vern Preheim, MCC director for Africa, was encouraged to release Warren and Linda Grasse, TAP director for Nigeria, for a three-month assignment in Lagos. Warren would assist the Christian Council in its administration of an emergency relief program. Keith Gingrich, a TAP teacher recently returned from Nigeria, will return to Jos to cover Grasse's TAP administration for the three-month period.

Barbara Souder, Spring City, Pa., an MCC nurse in the States for a short furlough from Nigeria, is returning immediately. She had been working with an interdenominational CCN medical relief team to civilian victims of the Nigerian conflict. For the past year, her team worked out of Enugu, secessionist territory recaptured by the Federal Nigerian forces early in the conflict.

It is reported that two other nurses, Valletta Goering and Vera Schertz, recruited for Nigeria and awaiting their visas since September, have been cleared by the immigration office in Lagos. They too will be leaving for Nigeria as soon as their visas are issued.

After the political situation stabilizes, and the emergency feeding lessons, MCC will study how it can work best with the Mennonite and other mission interests in Nigeria in long-range rehabilitation.

Herald Press Wins First Prize from Printing Industry

Herald Press was awarded first prize for excellence in case-bound books for design, materials, and quality of workmanship by the Printing Industry Association of Western Pennsylvania on January 12, 1970, at their annual exhibition of Western Pennsylvania Printing. The book receiving the award was Meditations for the Newly Married written by John M. Drescher, designed by Joe Alderfer, and printed by the Mennonite Publishing House.

Kraybill Granted Partial Leave of Absence

The Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities has granted Paul Kraybill a partial leave of absence as of Jan. 1 to accept a call as Executive Secretary of the Study Commission on Church Organization of General Conference and the three major Mennonite Boards. Initially this will be a ten-month assignment culminating in the special session of General Conference to be held in Oct. 1970.

Kraybill had previously presented his resignation as Overseas Secretary effective May 15, 1971. Harold Stauffer, Associate Overseas Secretary, has been designated to this office. The transfer date has now been moved up to December 1, 1970. Authorization has been given to employ an assistant to Harold Stauffer.

Kraybill will continue to serve as Eastern Board Secretary; he will share with President Charles and Treasurer Buckwalter in giving leadership to the Salunga staff. Until December 1 he will give one-fourth time to Salunga responsibilities. As of that date he has been granted a sabbatical leave of absence, with continuing responsibilities at Salunga.

VS-ers Respond to Financial Situation

"We are the first orientation group of Voluntary Service personnel in 1970. As such we feel a special call to express our Christian commitment in concrete terms at the outset of our assignments." With these words at the close of the Jan. 15 commissioning service at Mennonite Board of Missions, VS-er Richard Miller of Ft. Wayne, Ind., summoned treasurer David Leatherman to the podium. Leatherman was presented the sum of $56 on behalf of the orientation group to be channeled into the Compassion Fund.

"It bothered us to learn that the Mission Board was being forced to cut back in program because of a lack of necessary funds," Miller told the headquarters staff. "So during unit council meeting on Tuesday, Jan 13, I suggested that we might register our concern in some way.

"A Tupperware bowl was placed on the dining-room table in the VS hostel," he continued. "In less than three hours, fellow VS-ers had rallied to the cause beyond expectation.

"It is humbling to experience a demonstration of Christian concern such as this," Leatherman said upon receiving the unexpected gift. "This has special meaning when such a symbolic act is performed by persons who have stated their interest to give sacrificially of themselves through Voluntary Service."

Gospel Teams Travel During Christmas Vacation

Two gospel teams represented Hesston College in states in the East and South this Christmas Season, December 19-January 4. The teams were sponsored by the student organization on the campus.

Programs on the theme "Tough Love" were presented in churches by a seven-member team who traveled in Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, and Ohio. "Tough Love," as expressed in their program, is going the second mile, a love which runs from no situation, no matter how big or how small, a love which loves people who don't feel that they want or need love.

Informal group meetings with youth were held at "The Loft," a youth center at Pettisville, Ohio, and at other locations following services in churches.

The team to the Southern states visited churches in Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Oklahoma. The theme for the program was "The Triangle of Love" — a triangle created by love that comes from God, our love in response to God, and love that is communicated to our fellowmen.

Red Cross Decision Affects VS-MDS

Mennonite Board of Missions received word on Jan. 15 that the Red Cross plans to terminate its services in the Pass Christian, Miss., area within the next ten days to two weeks. This termination, for which the cause is unknown at this writing, comes sooner than the pattern which the Red Cross normally follows.

This decision will have an effect on both Mennonite Disaster and Mennonite Voluntary Service, primarily the loss of funds for doing casework and for purchasing building materials, food supplies, and transportation for MDS and VS workers.

Mennonite Voluntary Service plans to continue its work there if adequate financial resources can be found. Leonard Garber of the Relief and Service Office will travel to Mississippi soon to assist the VS unit in planning its role and strategy in the absence of Red Cross. Eleven persons serve in the VS unit at Pass Christian, Miss.

Mennonite Disaster Service will also remain in Mississippi and has filed a petition for additional emergency relief funds. Designated funds may be sent to Mennonite Board of Missions or to Mennonite Central Committee, Akron, Pa. The prayers and support of the church are requested in this needy area of service.

Team Ministry Extended

An extension of the Chicago Team Ministry began on Oct 19, 1969, when the Southwest Mennonite Fellowship met for the first time. (The Chicago Team Ministry was formed in Sept. 1968 when the Bethel and Englewood Mennonite churches and pastors teamed together in a cooperative work.)

The need for a church in this area was realized last winter when quite a number of folks who formerly attended the Bethel Mennonite Church were contacted through home prayer meetings. After moving from the Bethel area they found it difficult to attend regularly because of the distance involved.

Sunday morning services are held in the basement of the Otis Seymour home. Average attendance for the first three months was 25, with the highest being 34 and the lowest 19.

Pastor Stanlee D. Kauffman has been giving leadership, with others of the team sharing from time to time.

The Englewood and Southwest congregations share in home Bible study and prayer meetings, and in evening services once a month.

For the past year the Chicago Team Ministry has been participating in a radio broadcast the second Sunday of each month over radio station WBEE.

The L. C. Wesley's Memorial Chapels have a one-hour broadcast each Sunday. After coming in contact with Clarence Yutzzy, pastor on the team, Mr. Wesley asked the Mennonites to share once a month in their program, which is broadcast live from their chapel.

Bro. Ambers Wright, lay minister on the team, is director of this ministry.
Mennonite General Conference reports contributions 26 percent below budget for the first six months of the biennium. This is $18,000 short for this period. It would simply require seven cents a week from each member of the Mennonite Church to provide the regular needed amount. Have you and your congregation sent your contribution recently? Send through your conference treasurer who will then forward it to the Scottsdale office.

Change of address: J. Stanley Friesen from Accra, Ghana, to Pierre Benignus Study Center, P.O. Box 4045, Ibadan, Nigeria.

Duplicate Women's Winter Retreats are planned at Willow Valley Motel, R. 222, south of Lancaster, Pa., for Friday eve. and Saturday, Feb. 20, 21, and Feb. 27, 28. Mrs. J. D. (Minnie) Graber will be the meditation leader on "Life in the Blood." For information and reservation write to Mrs. M. Rohrer Hershey, R. 3, Lititz, Pa. 17543, or call 717 626-5549. Homemakers, business, or professional—all women are encouraged to attend. Excellent facilities.

The National Register of Prominent Americans announced the selection of Laban Peachey, president of Hesston College, as a recipient of their Honorary Award Certificate and a listing in the 1970 Register.

The Register of Prominent Americans is an informational center listing prominent men and women who deserve notable mention for outstanding achievements in their business, profession, community, or country. Peachey became president of Hesston College in July 1968. He came to Hesston from Harrisonburg, Va., where he served as Professor of Psychology at Eastern Mennonite College. He also served as Psychological Consultant for the Rockingham County Public Schools.

Chester M. and Georgia A. Helmick, Cumberland, Md., celebrated their fiftieth wedding anniversary on Jan. 17. They were married on Jan. 21, 1920.

Tanganyika Mennonite Church has announced the ordination of three pastors in recent months. Naftali Birai, a recent student at Eastern Mennonite College, has been appointed to serve in the Nyabasi District and to supervise Bible instruction in the primary schools. Salmon Butenge, who graduated from the theological college last November, will serve in the growing town of Tarime. Manaan Wadugu, also a graduate from the theological college, will give leadership to the newly formed Mro District, formerly a part of the Shirati Church District.

Science faculty and facilities at Eastern Mennonite College received a $10,000 boost recently in the form of a grant from the National Science Foundation. Glenn M. Kaufmann, associate professor of chemistry at EMC, said that faculty at the college have conducted research sponsored by the National Science Foundation, contributing to EMC's qualification for the grant.

Special meetings: William R. Miller, North Liberty, Ind., at Cascadia, Foster, Ore., Feb. 8-13. Fred Augsburger, Youngstown, Ohio, at First Mennonite, Nampa, Idaho, Feb. 11-18.

The resident telephone number of Mark Peachey, Secretary and Service Director for the Conservative Mennonite Board of Missions, has been changed to 614 857-2144.

The thirty-seventh Annual Ministerial Meeting will be held Feb. 17, 18 at New Danville Mennonite Church. Guest speaker will be Ernest Gehman, Harrisonburg, Va. The brotherhood is invited to attend.

Mrs. Anna Mayer of Pigeon, Mich., mother of Mrs. John Wenger in Israel, passed away on Jan. 8. S. Jay Hostetler, formerly a missionary to India and Ghana and now pastor at the Detroit Mennonite Church, represented the Board at the funeral. The address for Mrs. John Wenger: 46 Hazelt St., Neve Magen, Ramat Hasharon, Israel.

Word has been received via AFSC-MCC that Dr. Linford Gehman and Martha Bender, who were serving on the Quaker-Mennonite relief team in Biafra, had reached Sao Tome and expected to proceed on to the United States by way of Europe yet this week. No details of their evacuation are yet known, but it was reported by the news media that all expatriate relief workers had been evacuated as Biafran resistance to the final Nigerian Federal Army offensive crumbled.

David W. Powell writes from Aibonito, Puerto Rico: "Last Sunday we baptized five youth from our church, four from families which are not from the church. One of these is a sophomore in college, three are in high school, and a fifth is a 14-year-old girl. Perhaps we will baptize two or three more during the end of this month."

Mr. and Mrs. Wesley Richard, Sapporo, Japan, report: "We are now praying for God's will for us in March when we stop formal language study and move closer to Hokusei College, here in Sapporo, where Wes will be a full-time faculty member. We expect at that time to become self-supporting, thus in some measure attempting to work along with other Japanese Christians in the workaday world, sharing Christ in ways that we can. With all the student unrest there is certainly need to spread the message of peace as widely as possible."

Ross Goldfus, Salto, Argentina, writes: "Summer has arrived with flying dust and heat. The congregation also shows signs of warmth. A young mother testifies and shows definite evidence of a changed life. She has now entered into the life of the congregation with dedication and enthusiasm. Her husband, though not too interested in Christianity as yet, is quite friendly."

Kay Yutzly was scheduled to leave India on Jan. 10 for furlough. Plans called for her to arrive in Colorado on Jan. 18. She did some denomination work in Colorado, Nebraska, and Illinois, arriving in the Elkhart-Goshen area on Jan. 26, en route to Ohio to visit her home and then to school at Western Reserve in Cleveland.

Mildred Schrock, director of secretarial services at Mennonite Board of Missions, has accepted a special assignment effective Feb. 9 as secretary to Paul N. Kraybill in Salunga, Pa. Kraybill was recently appointed executive secretary of the Study Commission on Church Reorganization. Miss Schrock, originally from Metamora, Ill., has served in the Mission Board's Personnel Office since 1951.

Readers Say

Submissions to Readers Say column should comment on printed articles.

After reading two articles in the January '70 issue of Moody Monthly (pages 32, 33) by Arnold T. Olson and W. A. Criswell, "The Church in a New Decade" and "What's Right with the Church?" I felt moved to write you and ask for an editorial on the latter idea. Now, in today's Gospel Herald you did the very thing I was so hoping and praying for.

My wife and I always agree with you that the time is far past when this negativism toward the church, particularly our own beloved Mennonite church, is overdue. If we want to win and hold our young people we must declare the virtues as Criswell so aptly says: "The sick man does not care to hear about the medicines that will not cure. He is seeking a doctor who has an answer to his need. We have that answer. There is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved" (Acts 4:12). Jesus overcame darkness with light, evil with goodness and hate with love. We ought to book the up-side, the for-side, the believing-side."

Thank you again for the excellent editorial. May your good and faithful message inspire many pastors to once again speak in positive terms.

— Maurice A. Voder, Hesston, Kan.

Your editorial, "Let's Affirm Our Faith" in the Jan. 6 Gospel Herald, expresses so totally my own sentiments I cannot refrain from telling you. There has developed a philosophy that measures pietly by how much one can be "against" rather than how much we can be "for." My prayer is that we begin to talk stock of our faith, and make the exciting discovery of the greatness of His grace which will satisfy both our own hunger and spill over onto our society and heal many ills there. Thank you for putting your finger on one of our greatest needs of today.

— Kenneth G. Good, Lanham, Md.
I just finished reading your editorial of Jan. 6: “Let’s Affirm Our Faith and say a hearty amen!” I believe that if we can get our eyes off our problems long enough to fix them on Christ and really ‘experience’ Him we will find a solid, radiant faith worth sharing. We will find that the problems are not as impossible as they first appear.

To the question on page 20 “Will the Menonites Survive the Seventies?” Yes! and more! — From Indonesia to Pennsylvania, Canada to South Africa. The testimony of the Mennonites is of the living Spirit, and when any person meets Jesus Christ and learns what He meant when He said, “... he shall receive power, after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you: and we shall be witnesses unto you...” (Acts 1:8), that person is not merely a “survivor,” but a “victorious conqueror” through Jesus Christ our Lord, “Priest to the Lord.” — Richard S. Weaver, Harrisonburg, Va.

Thank you so much for publishing Glenn Mennon- selman’s July 5 message in the Jan. 6 issue of the Gospel Herald. To one who has been deeply concerned by our denominational trend toward a “social gospel” this article is indeed refreshing. While we are re affirming our unique peace position on various social issues of the day it is noteworthy that some of those in evangelical circles have already tagged us as liberals and will classify us with those who have abandoned the teaching of the Mennonites.

Thank you also for the editorial of the same issue. Your comments about continual analysis are well put. It seems that we are prone to objective analysis from an academic halcyon perspective rather than the type experienced by Isaiah in chapter 6.

May the Lord undergird you in your responsibility as editor throughout the coming year.

—Claude Beachy, Fairlawn, Mich.

Dear Friends,

It is a humbling experience to see the letters of greetings from home and from lands afar and not be able to respond in a proper way. My eyesight has grown dim after having served me extraordinarily. For this I thank God for His kindness in providing other means of fellowship, at the present time, after a long and strenuous life, a life which I hope may be as profitable as it was strenuous. The ravages of storm, the healing balm of His sunshine and the joys of fellowship have kept me and my companion going to these fourscore and eleven years where we now abide under divine mercy, and grace to hear the last call “Come on over.” What a day that will be, looking back to you for your kindness and goodness we remain, very sincerely yours, S. C. and Emma Yoder, Pleasantview Home, Kalona, Iowa.

Urban Crisis: Test of Our Missionary Concern

Emerging from the Mennonite communities across our land is a flood of young people who are pouring into the mainstream of urban American life. They find themselves suddenly thrust into the teeming urban complex, scarcely prepared for the adjustment that needs to be made. I was one such young man.

I grew up in a typical eastern Pennsylvania Mennonite home where my parents attended the Franconia Mennonite Church. The second son of a family of twelve, I enjoyed the disciplines and privileges of a family working to establish themselves in postdepression years. A deep family commitment to the church, coupled with an uncompromising devotion to faithful Sunday school attendance, set the pace for our family’s religious commitments. Early in life I developed a deep desire to read. Egermeier’s Bible Story Book was read and reread until I knew the Bible characters and the circumstances in which their lives unfolded as well as I knew my own family. My parents had a real task to train me to do the expected family chores since at any moment I might disappear into the attic or hayloft with a book.

My earliest experience outside the Mennonite community was with my father on his butter and egg route in Philadelphia. My father’s deep commitment to honest business dealings along with spiritual, rather than material, values made an early impression on me.

When I was twenty-three years old, I was faced with life away from home. Called into alternate service, I served in a Veteran’s Hospital at North Port, Long Island. Here some of my concepts were tested as I, along with a corps of other Mennonite I-W fellows, faced a society of people who were not accustomed to Mennonites or “the Mennonite way of life.”

One of the exciting dimensions of I-W experience was the privilege of sharing in a mission church. Centereach Mennonite Church provided an opportunity for service and fellowship.

A conscious call to Christian service motivated me to stay involved in Christian outreach after my I-W service was completed. Ties in New York City drew me there. My wife-to-be was involved in a developing New York church, serving in the Voluntary Service program. As a couple we soon discovered ourselves deeply involved in the lives of New York people. Then the church called us into active leadership.

What are the outstanding experiences that brought me to this? Early in my teen years I made a conscious commitment to be a Christian. The decision was the result of seed sown by Sunday school teachers, personal Bible reading and my family’s motivation to obey God. It climaxed one night when I couldn’t sleep. I knew the time had come to declare myself on the side of God. After a brief personal struggle, I wrote a note to my Dad, placing it on his bedroom bureau, telling him of my decision. The next morning the note was on my father’s plate at the breakfast table. I think it took him by surprise. Later that day he expressed his joy and encouraged me in my decision.

This experience led me into a baptismal class of young believers at the Franconia Mennonite Church. As a Chris-

Christian had set out to be good. I thought I had a number of things on my side. I knew the Bible better than most of my peers. I had a perfect attendance record at Sunday school for a number of years. I also had a secret desire to become a pastor someday.

I soon discovered, however, that the pathway I had charted for myself was one of inner struggle and frustration. I taught Sunday school only to discover that my conscience began nagging me for posing as a better Christian than I knew myself to be. I began the battle for a pure mind. I lost again and again.

The conflict became more intense as time went on. I gave out tracts, did personal work and increased my Christian service at various places, all to no avail. It did not settle the struggle within. One day the climax came while I was praying in the haymow. I told God He had to confirm His love for me or I would do something desperate. We had a cat on the farm that was very wild. Just at this moment this cat ran across the haymow, took one look at me and as usual, turned and fled. I prayed, "Lord, if You love me, make that cat come back." Something strange happened. The cat stopped short, turned around and came running back to me. It sat in my lap and purred like a kitten: A swatch of wool for Gideon, a donkey for Balaam, a lion for Daniel, a worm for Jonah, and a cat for me. With that answered prayer came a deep release. God had listened to me when I called on Him in desperation. Along with this experience came a conscious presence of Christ which has not left me to this day. I had many lessons to learn in my life. However, no one could tell me God wasn’t real.

While in Christian service in New York City another crisis came in my life. I was attempting to help an alcoholic friend of mine to an authentic relationship with Christ. However, my words bounced off this man like a rubber ball off the hot cement sidewalk. This again set me searching. God answered again. This time, however, in the stillness of the night. He told me, "John, you are as bankrupt spiritually as your friend is physically. You may know some answers but you are not putting them into practice in your own life."

Yes, I knew the answer to my friend’s need, but I was feeding them to him as cold and as fast as a computer and with no feeling. That night I gave up operating a mechanical answering service. I vowed to give only those answers tempered by the fresh touch of the Holy Spirit. This daily presence has become very precious to me. I discovered that the price of freshness in witness and vitality in Christian communication is constant communion with Christ. All shortcuts lead to computerized answers and mechanical bankruptcy.

With that out of the way I began to discover the deeper sins sapping my strength. Sins of unbelief, pride, covetousness, and slothfulness had a deep hold on my human spirit and I was not released all at once. I discovered the need of constant fellowship as the recesses of my human spirit came under the searchlight of God’s Spirit.

An exciting discovery on this pathway brought the liberating resources. Brethren in whom God was working began to appear everywhere. They were persons who really cared. They appeared in the subway, in the taxi, and even in church pews. Each time there was an authentic consciousness of living reality working out in practical life.

An amazing thing began happening in our urban churches. People started coming to life. They started caring and when they came to the difficult people they just loved them more deeply. Difficult pastors became brothers. Persons with deep needs were released becoming radiant communicators of authentic Christianity.

One day while sitting at Kennedy Airport in the taxi, which I was driving at the time, a verse from the Book of Habakkuk came to life. "Behold ye among the heathen, and regard, and wonder marvelously: for I will work a work in your days, which ye will not believe, though it be told you." Rather simply I said back to the Lord, "You mean to tell me, God, that You are going to do a work here in New York City that I wouldn’t believe if someone told me about it?" That was exactly what He meant.

That was ten years ago. I saw Him carry out His promises. The changes that have taken place in personal relationships, in group relationships, in church development and vision for the future, have gone way beyond anyone could have predicted.

God met me . . . stopped me . . . turned me around, in His grace. He sent me out loving, praising and partaking of His joy. I met Him . . . He met me. What does it matter how I say it. It was . . . It is . . . He.

Just Thinking

There is a story of an old man who went about carrying an oil can, and whenever he went through a door that creaked he would pour a little oil on the hinges. If the gate was hard to open, he would oil the latch. And thus he passed through life lubricating the hard places, and making it easier for those who came after him.

The people called this man eccentric and queer, but he went merrily on, refilling his oil can when it became empty, and oiling the hard places in life.

There are lives that creak and grate all about us, which need lubricating with the oil of gladness and thoughtfulness. Have you your oil can with you?

In the January 13, 1970, Nurture Lookout entitled "Leadership Needed" it was recorded that if all members of the Mennonite Church gave $1.75 each, the General Conference budget could be met and the program continued. In other and previous promotional communications, it has been stated that $3.50 per contributing member is needed. This calls for some clarification.

According to the 1969 Mennonite Yearbook the membership of the Mennonite Church in the United States and Canada is listed at 94,200. If these members all paid $1.75 each, as the article stated, the receipts for Mennonite General Conference would be $164,850 per year, which would be enough to meet the budget for this year amounting to $140,000. But we must face certain facts.

First of all, not all members contribute to the General Conference fund. Many small congregations are unable to meet their membership quotas. This places a heavier burden on the larger and more established congregations.

In the second place, there are 28,664 members of several conferences and various congregations who are not "supportive" members of Mennonite General Conference. Some of these do contribute towards the budget in lesser amounts. This leaves the "contributing" constituency at only 65,536 members. Many of these find it difficult to share fully along with their other commitments. If these members all gave their share, the $1.75 per member would provide only a fund of $114,688 which is considerably short of the needed budget.

Thus with a number of smaller congregations sharing less than their suggested quota, and with many members and congregations not being in supportive conferences, then the quota of contributing members needs to be $3.50 per year to achieve the budget goal for Mennonite General Conference.

There has also developed a tendency on the part of many congregational leaders to use per member quotas as ceilings when they could do more. Thus if no one exceeds the quota how can we fill the vacuum for those unable to reach the quota? There is therefore no other way for MGC to approach this problem but to continue to ask "contributing" members and congregations to give at least $3.50 per member per year.

When we reach the ideal goal of 100 percent contributions then the $1.75 per member will be sufficient, but from the present and actual responses we will need to work with the $3.50-per-member program. We trust that this will explain the situation and provide you with information so that you can respond accordingly.

Christmas -- Six Weeks After

By L. C. Gooding

The tinsel and the lights are put away.
The wonder pales to ordinary day.

Silent the chimes. Now fades the frantic cheer
Into the drab, pedestrian new year.

Few memories linger of a glorious birth,
"Joy to the World," "May There Be Peace on Earth."

The Christmas truce is ended, and the war
Has been resumed with action as before.

Huddled and hungry, children sleep unsed
In rooms where rats contest their claim to bread.

Black men, white men compete for place and power.
Hate, violence, shot and flame possess the hour.

The mutilated trees, all stripped of gold,
Are refuse now. The Child is six weeks old.
What Does God Say?

Sometime ago I attended a meeting in which great speeches were spoken. Great papers were presented. Great responses were given. Many excellent insights were shared. Nothing was proposed which sanctioned wrongdoing as far as I could discern. Some weaknesses and some strengths of the church were called to attention. Several good suggestions were given for improvement.

At the close of this two-day meeting one of the great spiritual leaders of the past several generations shared with me an observation. I’ve pondered it many times since. “It seems to me,” he said, “that our forefathers would have used some Scripture in such discussions to help us know what God has to say on the subject.”

Here is a growing weakness in church, family and individual life. Too many discussions include only what we think. Even some preaching is simply the propounding of another philosophical idea. Exposition of the Scripture may be at an all-time low for this century in certain pulpits while people inwardly crave spiritual food. God, through Jeremiah, has seven statements concerning the spiritual leaders of that day. One has to do with pastors who do not feed the flock but follow many fancies and philosophies of their day.

But we in general seem to take less time with the Scripture. We blame the preacher for not feeding us, yet we do not eat at home. Few, if any, could survive physically if we ate only once or twice a week. And it would sound insane to blame a person who invites us to a meal on Sunday for not feeding us enough for all week, if we ate nothing the other six days. Yet there are those who do not study the Scripture all week and yet complain that they are not fed enough on Sunday morning. What this says is that the obligation for spiritual nourishment is on all, the individual Christian, the body of believers and the spiritual leaders.

Are we asking what God has to say about the common concerns? In the past no doubt we tried to settle matters by sight ing a quick proof text and making it absolute — no gold, no movies, no dancing, etc. This approach sometimes closed all discussion and cut off any who differed. No doubt also sometimes our Bibles became clubs to fight any who did not agree with us.

Then, because changes came and we felt we could not be so absolute in some things, we began to speak of holding to the overall principles. Certainly this was better. However, the danger now is that, in many discussions, not even the principles of the Scripture are sighted. Discussions are held and decisions are made with little or no reference to what God has to say. At times one may even feel sort of naive when he says “but the Bible says . . .”

Yet the fact remains that our forefathers, the Anabaptists, cared little about any decision which did not draw its conclusions from the Scripture. Their belief was that if the Scripture said it then it is to be followed. Christ was Lord of life and His whisper was to be obeyed above the words of the world. Christ’s call was above the cries of the crowd.

True, the brotherhood, guided by the Holy Spirit, was, for Anabaptism, important in making decisions. Yet the Scriptures were central in consultation. And brothers were bound together to live in the light of the Bible as they understood it, always searching for more illumination.

So a mere discussion of current events is not enough. Neither will new or old philosophies do. Nothing will satisfy until followers of Christ determine to obey the gospel. And to obey the gospel means to know what it is about. Therefore the gospel must be central in all our life and discussions. Else we will become increasingly biblically illiterate and spiritually at sea.

Even the Holy Spirit is helpless to do a spiritual work until the Word is presented. The Holy Spirit uses the Scripture to convict and convince. Until the Word is shared the Holy Spirit cannot use that Word to meet the needs of man. Until the Scripture is studied the church or individual cannot receive spiritual illumination or truth to share.

This editorial then is suggesting that the time is ripe for a fresh concern with what God has to say in His Word. Pastors ought always be declaring what God says on the issues of today. Congregations must be discussing present problems in the light of the Scripture. The old titles used for many sermons and studies “what the Bible says about . . .” was a rather good way of putting it. And one has a feeling that such topics might pick up a great deal of interest where persons are weary of discussions in which personal opinions are rehashed again and again. Down deep, if we are at all serious about being Christian, we want to know, what does God say? — D.
Urban Crisis:
Test of Our Missionary Concern

By Ralph R. Covell

The time has come to ask frankly whether our home-base theology and culture are a sufficient foundation for a worldwide outreach. This is one of the big values of our current urban crisis.

Missions that do not begin at home do not begin. It is a sham, and it is time we see it as exactly this.

A Time for Testing

Today, the urban crisis forces us to ask the right questions. As we answer them, we may be able to restate our unchanging convictions with more meaningful worldwide implications.

1. The urban crisis is the test of our true concern for people.

We seem to have a tremendous concern for men and women in all corners of the world. According to the Missionary Research Library, the North American Protestant missionary force abroad has reached an all-time high of 33,270—an increase of 22 percent over 1960. Nearly 300 million dollars is the present annual expenditure in missions, which is an increase of 75 percent. Evangelical missionary personnel account for nearly 70 percent of the total, and evangelical mission giving about 45 percent. The sacrifice and dedication involved in this worldwide commitment are obvious.

Many churches continue to operate on a “come-to-me” philosophy which is the very opposite of missions. We profess a great concern for people if only they will come to us and receive from our generosity. Missions by proxy is easy because we need not be involved. And where it has seemed that we might become involved, we have quickly tucked our robes about us and gone by on the other side to seek a comfortable haven.

In doing this, we have forsaken multitudes who need the Savior whom we proclaim. Some are black; some are white; some are rich; some are poor. Are we as concerned about these at home as we are about those abroad? Only as we are, will there be integrity and authenticity to our work overseas. Only then will we continue to attract committed young people. Only then will we be willing to give in the increasing measure that is necessary. Only then will our missionaries have that deeply rooted concern—rooted in the community of concern at home—to convey Christ’s love adequately to the distant lost sheep.

A pressing priority of this concern at home, as churches in the midst of the urban crisis, is to meet real needs. The concern that starts at home will reassure our critics abroad, who are often national Christians, that we have taken our own medicine.

From this standpoint the urban crisis may be God’s provision to the church to test our integrity, to force us to be honest and to keep us from congratulating ourselves for a ministry abroad that we are loathe to practice at home.

A Whole Gospel for All of Life

2. The urban crisis is the touchstone of our profession to expound, preach and apply the “whole gospel.”

The “inner city” has become a catchword for many segments of the Christian church. Nothing excites the imagination and quickens the pulse as much as the possibility of “doing something” in the inner city. Some, with commendable zeal and concern, have forsaken biblically anchored theological perspectives and have adopted a purely humanistic sociology. Declaring themselves to be co-creators with God in healing all urban illness and blight, they have equated “redemption” with cooperating with Christ as He manifests Himself through social engineers. They have forgotten or choose to ignore the vertical dimension of God’s relation to man. Many environments have changed, but man continues with unchanged self-centered motivations that alienate him from both man and God.

But is our gospel a whole gospel? I recall a test I took at seminary. We had studied the Gospel of Matthew for an entire semester. The final exam had one question. After quoting the Great Commission, it asked: “What were the ‘all things’ Christ taught His disciples to observe as recorded in Matthew’s Gospel?” This is the “whole gospel,” and we teach it in the process of making men true disciples of Jesus Christ. As we learn what the whole gospel is here at home, we will be better prepared to teach it to national leaders and church members in the overseas context. Failing here, we will reproduce there the “soul winning only” emphasis which is such a pathetic distortion of the whole counsel of God.

Are we prepared to call a spade a spade? Is sin truly sin

Ralph R. Covell is presently associate professor of missions at Conservative Baptist Theological Seminary in Denver, Colo., having served for 34 years as a missionary in China and Taiwan. His article was condensed and reprinted through the courtesy of World Vision magazine, Monrovia, Calif. whether it manifests itself as adultery, drunkenness, racial prejudice, unwarranted profit from illegal housing conditions, inferior quality of education or unfair employment practices? All are a stench to God and a violation of His holiness. All proceed from that sinful self-centeredness of rebellious man alienated from God. And yet, we talk about only some of them. The others are an evangelical taboo and cause our theology to be suspect.

Unfortunately, it is very hard to talk to a person caught up in the urban crisis about his “spiritual” need. It is particularly difficult when the awful reality of the injustice and sin impinges upon him daily — with our implicit consent.

Theoretically, we may agree. Yet this myth imprisons us: when a man believes in Christ, he will automatically be changed and desire to effect change in his environment. We can never overestimate the power of Jesus Christ to revolutionize our entire being. But never is the power and work of Christ divorced from His Spirit, His truth, and His church which through its teaching ministry is the bulwark of the truth. In our instruction we can hope that the Christian will automatically mature in every area of life, but this is an unwarranted presumption. It is not an act of faith — it is a partial gospel.

Revivalists of the pre-Civil War days in our country saw this. Timothy Smith says: "In summary, the revivalists (Al-

... the urban crisis may be God’s provision to the church to test our integrity, to force us to be honest and to keep us from congratulating ourselves for a ministry abroad that we are loathe to practice at home. Credit: Carousel Films, The Tenement.

3. The urban crisis challenges us to divest ourselves of a cultural gospel.

Missionaries overseas have constantly been confronted with this pressure. In the nineteenth century, the gospel was closely identified with civilization. It was assumed that when one became a Christian he automatically put on clothes, took a new name, ceased paying respect to local leaders, sang with a western style major-minor key, became "clean" and sat on chairs in church services. But more important, ideals and practices associated with Christianity in our setting were given to other peoples in the name of the gospel. These included democratic procedures, individualism, free choice, competition, efficiency, equality, romantic love, middle-class concepts of effort, optimism and success, and businesslike legal relationships.

Jesus Christ was remade into the image of the domineering, condescending, "oh-so-nicely civilized" white American/European. The possibility that the Spirit of God could produce Christians who would ardently prefer their own cultural values to ours was not a very live option.

The nature of this fallacy has been seen in this century, and missionaries have been given broader training in cultural and social anthropology. Often, however, the basic philosophy has been wrong. The concept has prevailed that we need to understand the culture of other people in order to win them to Christ, but when they are really saved, they will change and become more like us. We still are ill-prepared to believe that many, if not most, aspects of culture are neutral and may be vehicles and embodiments of the message and person of Jesus Christ.

Missionaries still are happier if western music is used in church services; if sermons have the logic of Greek rhetoricians; if piano, accordion or pump organ are used instead of drum, guitar and reed instruments; if people pray quietly and reverently; if all types of nonsocial dancing are barred; if young people do not follow the advice of Christian parents in choosing a mate, but rather, “pray it through”; and if western-type 4-5 step approaches are used in personal work rather than less pressurized, less formalized procedures.

We have tended to absolutize the white Anglo-Saxon, middle-class Protestant way as the right way. Our Bibles are read in this light, and we do our work with this perspective. To conceive that Christ could identify with any society on any other level is difficult for us. It might be possible, we concede, for poor heathen peoples in other lands. But the “nitty gritty” of the process bothers us. And then eventually, they will be like us anyway!

One of the values of the urban crisis comes precisely at this point. We are forced to see within our own society that the gospel may have many valid cultural expressions. Spanish-surname, Puerto Rican, and black people can trust Christ and maintain their own identity and cultural values. And precisely because they are different, they must be welcomed into our fellowships. The body of Christ must be an inclusive fellowship representing all social and racial groups. Unity of heart and mind in worshiping and serving Christ are demanded—not lifeless uniformity and conformity. We understand this necessity to some degree for the overseas church. This is at a safe distance. It does not threaten us. Now we are beginning to sense it for our many American subcultures such as students, blue and white collar classes and racial minorities. As the American churches really become inclusive, the best possible seedbed will be afforded for the next generation of our missionary volunteers.

Exposing Racism

4. The urban crisis has focused as never before on a dominant American sin — even a Christian sin — of “white racism.”

This unique type of American white supremacy compared with local nonwhite minorities is a part of our national heritage. It really is not our American dilemma — a departure from some earlier dream. We as a nation have never really believed that all men are created equal. This fact must be recognized and repented of if we are to fulfill the ministry God has for us in the American urban crisis or on overseas mission fields.

Race and missions have never been far separated. Foreign missions itself is a concern for other races. The evangelistic message has been preached worldwide. Concrete love has been demonstrated through medicine, welfare, and vocational schools.

But, unfortunately, there is the negative side. Early in the nineteenth century Africa was suggested as a potential mission field. But some Christian groups rejected this out-right as not pleasing to God who had put a curse on the black man. American mission boards have not been eager to appoint nonwhite missionaries for overseas service. Intermarriage between evangelical missionaries and nationals has more often than not meant the resignation by the missionary from his mission.

Evangelical missionaries have often gone forth to serve in Asia and Africa from churches that practice segregation. Frequently they were trained in segregated schools where they were taught that the black man, under God’s curse, was an inferior person, or even worse, a type of nonperson. Evangelical black leaders have little good to say about many of our well-known evangelical schools.

Sometimes this “racist” emphasis has been expressed overtly on the field. Some missionaries make it the rule that all Africans come to the back door, or do not shake hands with “natives” if there are any whites around, or object to having them in for tea or for a meal.

Unfortunately, this heritage of personal racism may take forms for us which are more subtle and less easily identified. A noted anthropologist suggests three manifestations of white racism on the mission field. (1) A rather superior attitude toward national peoples, with the suggestion that in more primitive contexts they have “the mentality of a child.” (2) A paternalistic attitude of pity and often condescension, driving us to speak to people rather than sharing with them. We do things for people rather than working with them. (3) A lack of real enthusiasm for authority and leadership to be left in the hands of national Christians. We often betray our position by the phrase “giving them authority,” “our school,” “our converts” and “our church.” This terminology reveals this colonialistic mentality which comes from subconscious racial prejudice.

So What Do We Do?

The solution to our white racist attitudes must begin in our homes. Family devotions should stimulate Christian attitudes and biblical insights about race. Right examples in conversation will reflect the highest respect for other races. Action that breaks down racial barriers in our neighborhood and community will confirm our Christian convictions to our children.

Responsible biblical preaching will deal with this problem with candor and grace. Our churches will not only welcome those of other races, but seek them out. We will partake in Christ’s mission and stop fleeing our responsibility. Our Christian education program must help us to understand God's Word and instruct us as well on how we (not merely the non-Christians) have failed to implement our Christian ideals in confronting race and other closely related aspects of the urban problem.

Increasingly the world is becoming one big city. By the year 2000 over 2.6 billion people will live in communities over 100,000. Problems haunting us in America now will spread everywhere with frightful acceleration.

As we learn our lessons now in dealing with these problems, light will be given for present and future strategies to fulfill the Great Commission of our Savior.
Vietnams In the U.S.

By Paul Leatherman

After spending two years in Vietnam there is no forgetting the war nor escaping the real part the United States takes in it. I saw homes destroyed, whole villages wiped out, people burned from napalm and children made orphans. I saw thousands of refugees full of despair because they had been torn away from their soil. They found life no longer worth living, and the prospect of death away from the graves of their ancestors brought only greater fear. The machinery of war and the honor of the United States had much greater worth than the aspirations and the very lives of thousands of Vietnamese.

We saw them as fellow human beings — God’s creation. They were our friends. We shared their joys and sorrows and hatreds. But now it was war, and in this game they counted for nothing.

From the shock of Vietnam I have returned to the United States and have been quickly immersed in the problems confronting the poor and minorities of this great land. In horror I see that the privileged in the United States are largely responsible for tremendous sufferings and injustices. I would like to point out a few of the similarities of plight between the minorities here and the people in Vietnam. I call these Vietnamese in the U.S.

The feudal system has been the traditional structure of Vietnamese life for many centuries. The land has been and even today is owned by wealthy individuals. By using pressure in collecting heavy fees these absentee landlords are able to keep the peasants in lifelong debt and subjection.

Look now at the ghettos in our own cities both large and small. Who owns the houses and apartments? Who is it that collects the highest possible rent while giving as little service as possible? The problems of absentee ownership with the rich collecting heavy toll from the poor is practically the same. In Appalachia it is the big steel company or coal company that have the wealth and the tenants on the land are virtually starving.

The history of Vietnam shows that in the midst of terror and famine, starving peasants demonstrated and even attacked landowners. The Vietnamese peasants rose up against the French demanding ownership of land and share in the wealth and even talked about a new social order.

Over 100 years ago the slaves in the U.S. were freed only to find themselves in many cases worse off. The white man always managed to keep “niggers” in their place. The Man kept the title to all the land and would allow the black man to live only in certain parts of the city with opportunity to work only at jobs which were below the dignity of the whites.

The French effort to regain colonial power in Vietnam was translated to the world as an effort to defeat communism. “The Communist Adversary” was soon said to be not only Vietnam but also China. Then, attributing to China the intention of conquering Vietnam and the rest of Southeast Asia, the French insisted that the fight against the Vietnamese peasants was the best means of combating China. With this argument the U.S. entered the war alongside the French against the poor Vietnamese peasants. Eventually we sent in half a million soldiers and dropped over 50 percent more bombs on this small land than were ever dropped by both sides during all of World War II.

In the U.S., first there were boycotts, marches, and all sorts of nonviolent demonstrations. But still the schools remained segregated, housing limited, jobs denied, and whole people treated as subhuman. Then the cities exploded—Watts, Detroit, Cleveland, Newark, York, Pa., and many more. White America responded in a way it had consistently responded through its history by bringing in tanks and guns and National Guards and police with the cry of law and order.

Black Power is evil! Do these people want everything at once? Can’t they be patient?

The U.S. is now involved in the Vietnam war which few people like. “But after all,” many say, “we have to stop the communists or soon we’ll be fighting them in California.”

“Those blacks just want to move into our towns so they can marry our daughters and you know that isn’t God’s will!”

We wonder why the peasants don’t support the South Vietnamese government. Why is the South Vietnamese apparently such a poor soldier? We need only to look superficially to see that the rulers are much more concerned about lining their own pockets than improving the lot of their people.

Why do the inner-city poor seem to fight every effort to improve the city? Their houses are substandard anyway so they should be happy to move. The city would even pay them a few hundred dollars more than their house is worth. Can’t they see that the new highways and hotels and businesses will make it easier for the surburbanite to get into the city and in this way the city can prosper? Why don’t they work as we do?

I saw thousands of Vietnamese refugees forcibly driven away from their homes and the graves of their ancestors. They were clustered together in refugee camps with their means of living removed. They were forced to depend on the government or relief agencies for food distribution to remain alive.

The modern city rises out of the dust of destroyed ghettos, with transplanted persons moved into high-rise slums away from friends and family to subsist on food stamps and public assistance.

The poor and common people in Vietnam are conscripted to fight on both sides of the conflict there. By one way or another the rich can buy their way out of the army and do not need to sacrifice their lives.

Here in the States if one has sufficient funds he can complete college and maybe graduate school. In the process he may avoid the draft entirely. If not, he will certainly be assured of a position which will keep him far from the fighting front.

To protect its own interests, the U.S. has launched a massive pacification program to win the loyalty of the Vietnamese peasants. Hopefully a few schools, a new water system, and even a church will drown from the peasants’ memory the death, the destruction, the breakup of moral values, the tearing apart of the family, and the turning of a whole generation of children into beggars. After many years of war the South Vietnamese don’t seem to be doing their share of the fighting. Can’t they see this is all for their own good?

We are also trying to pacify the minorities and poor in the U.S. with food stamps, welfare payments, and, in a few cases, new homes and schools. Yet we refuse welfare payments where the head of the family is an able-bodied male. Since the income of the father is insufficient to support the family, he is forced to leave the family so they can get welfare payments and on this basis survive. We give all these food stamps and assistance to the poor while making sure that they stay in their place and all the while considering them far inferior to us. But they don’t seem to appreciate all that we do for them.

If ten years ago we would have come to the aid of the Vietnamese peasant so that he could have realized some of his aspirations, instead of forcing him to remain in virtual servitude, we might have spent only a fraction of the amount of money which this war has cost and saved up to 750,000 lives. In addition, there will be tremendous rebuilding costs, and the rehabilitation of a whole generation of people who have known nothing but war.

We now face the same choice in our own land. If we will move drastically to reverse the trends which make the rich richer and the poor poorer, there may yet be hope. The Bureau of Budgets has already estimated that for every $1.00 we save by failing to eliminate hunger and malnutrition, it costs our nation $3.30. In this nation we never have considered all men to be equal. We have always had our “niggers and white trash.” The time is short. The poor and downtrodden will rise up. It is time that the church should identify with the poor. This was the stance of Christ. He was a friend of the poor and needy.

At the recent Congress on Evangelism, race, poverty, and Vietnam were identified as the greatest problems facing the church today. The call to Christians is to be involved in a personal way in alleviating the hurts and inequities in their own communities and speaking forcefully about the injustices of the world.

Missions Today

Is This Trip Really Necessary?

By H. Ernest Bennett

“Your coming to be here with us has given us new vision and renewed commitment to meet our problems. You folks at home cannot understand adequately our need for an opportunity to share personal needs, to discuss our program plans, to help evaluate our work, and to simply worship together.”

This brief expression of thanks is only a sample of the many factors that press mission program administrators to travel to fields overseas and to program locations here at home. I use the word press intentionally because most of our mission administrators prefer not to be away from their families and from their desks that pile up with work while they are away.

But we have seen so often the value of getting “to the field.” Many times a field visit will help in changing a program, in making more effective use of funds, and in helping a missionary or VS-er serve better. We know it costs money and it takes time to administer effectively.

A simple review of Jesus’ ministry and the Apostle Paul’s work shows the importance of on-the-spot confrontation and witnessing. I see the mission and service administrator not as a technical machine, but as a living, witnessing, mission worker along with the total staff of missionaries and service workers. He must inspire others to serve; he must understand all of the problems and the program; he must be a servant to those who are sent out by the church; and must be ready to help others in their decision-making by sharing broader perspective and objective points of view. Many times this means being there in the midst of the problem and struggling together to find the leading of the Spirit of God.

As the world about us becomes smaller and more complex, and as program decisions have broader implication for our churches here at home as well as overseas, I believe we must maintain an effective, personal contact between our workers. This will also be true among our brethren from overseas churches coming for fellowship with us in addition to our going to share and worship with them.

We can be most thankful that modern transportation and forms of communication enable our Mennonite brotherhood to become “one church” worldwide.
God's Chosen People

One finds it to be a very agreeable experience to be chosen by some important person as a recipient of his favors. To be chosen by God Himself is the highest honor and greatest favor and blessing that is possible for anyone.

When a man chooses a bride he chooses the one who responds favorably to his proposal. Any young woman who says no to his proposal, though she may be his "apparent" first choice, never becomes his chosen one. God's chosen people are those who accept Him and His Son Jesus Christ as Savior and Lord. Jesus showed in His parables of the wedding feast (Mt. 22:1-14), and the great supper (Lk. 14:16-24), that the ones chosen to receive invitations did not respond to the invitations, and so were rejected. The respective hosts declared, "they which were bidden were not worthy," and "none of those men which were bidden shall taste of my supper," and "many are called, but few are chosen."

God chose Israel on the condition that they should obey Him and keep His covenant. Exodus 19:5: "Now therefore, if you will obey my voice and keep my covenant, you shall be my own possession among all peoples; for all the earth is mine." But eventually they rejected Him and failed to obey Him or keep His covenant, the condition upon which their being His people depended. So the Bible quotes God as saying in Jeremiah 31:32: "... my covenant they brake..."
And in Hebrews 8:8, 9: "For finding fault with them, he saith, Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah: not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day when I took them by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt; because they continued not in my covenant, and I regarded them not, saith the Lord." Here the writer of Hebrews is quoting what God had said centuries before through the prophet, Jeremiah 31:31, 32.

By Amos W. Weaver

Believers Chosen

To the Christian believer the Bible says, Ephesians 1:4, 5: "Before the world was made, God had already chosen us to be his in Christ, so that we would be holy and without fault before him. Because of his love, God had already decided that through Jesus Christ he would bring us to himself as his sons — this was his pleasure and purpose" (Good News for Modern Man). In 1 Peter 1:1-4a we read, "From Peter, apostle of Jesus Christ — to God's chosen people who live as refugees scattered throughout the provinces of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia. You were chosen as a result of God the Father's own purpose, to be made a holy people, by his Spirit, and to obey Jesus Christ and be made clean by his blood. May grace and peace be yours in full measure. Let us give thanks to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ! Because of his great mercy, he gave us new life by raising Jesus Christ from the dead. This fills us with a living hope, and so we look forward to possess the rich blessings that God keeps for his people." Ibid. Also in chapter 2 of the same epistle, vv. 9, 10, he writes, "But you are the chosen race, the King's priests, the holy nation, God's own people, chosen to proclaim the wonderful acts of God, who called you from the darkness into his own marvelous light. At one time you were not God's people, but now you are his people; at one time you did not know God's mercy, but now you have received his mercy." Ibid.

Peter's ministry was chiefly among the Jewish people, and Paul's chiefly among the Gentiles, but neither were so exclusively. Peter in his epistles is reassuring those Jews who believe in Christ that they are truly God's chosen people. Paul in his epistles assures the believing Gentiles that they are accepted as one with the Jewish believers as God's chosen people too. He points out in Ephesians 1 how God had chosen them all in Christ even before the world was made, before there was any Israel, or Abraham. In Christ there is neither Jew nor Greek.

The new covenant, the gospel, was first taken to the Jews; Peter at Pentecost, and afterwards, and Paul on his missionary tours. In line with this Paul asserts in Romans 1:16 that the gospel of Christ "is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth; to the Jew first, and also to the Greek."

The Seed of Abraham

In Galatians 3 Paul emphasizes the fact that God's covenant with His people was first made with Abraham on the basis of his faith, long before the law, or the nation of Israel. And that those who are of faith are the children of Abraham, and not those who are of his bloodline.

Amos W. Weaver, Ronks, Pa., is minister of the Paradise Mennonite Church.

Gospel Herald, February 3, 1970
When the Jews came to John's baptism he did not see them as Abraham's children at all. He called them a generation of vipers, as descendants of the serpent, Satan. The bloodline he showed to be perfectly meaningless by telling them God could raise up children to Abraham from the stones lying there on the ground. In John 6:63 Jesus said, "the flesh profiteth nothing." Nothing certainly is nothing. The flesh and blood of the best human is only dust and ashes.

In John 8:39-44 Jesus said to the Jews who rejected Him, but claimed Abraham as their father, "If ye were Abraham's children, ye would do the works of Abraham . . . Ye do the deeds of your father . . . Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do." So, like John, Jesus says the unbelieving Jews are not Abraham's children but children of the devil. Every Christ-rejecting Jew, just as every other Christ-rejecting unbeliever, is a child of the wicked one, not a child of the kingdom. In no way, shape or form are they God's chosen people. God of course has chosen to save all men everywhere who believe in Christ. God wants all Jews to be saved just as He wants all other people to be saved. 2 Peter 3:9: "[He is] not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance."

Paul could boast of a pure Hebrew bloodline, as well as the highest rating as an orthodox, blameless Jew but declared it all to be absolutely worthless, of no value at all. Galatians 1:13, 14 and Philippians 3:4-8. To the Thessalonians, 2:13, Paul says, "God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth." God has not chosen those who do not believe the truth, or in Christ who is the truth.

Promises to National Israel

But what about all the promises of God to restore Israel to his own land where they will rebuild the temple, the temple worship, and the city of Jerusalem and the nation? The Old Testament prophets did very emphatically foretell of such a time to come. But all such prophecies that were given before the Jews' return under Zerubbabel in 536 BC, the rebuilding of the temple in 516 BC, the return under Ezra in 457 BC, and rebuilding of the city walls in 445 BC, are, to say the least, suspect as having their fulfillment then in concrete fact, in symbol, and in imagery in that return.

One also suspects that some of God's promises went unfulfilled by the Jews' own default through their unbelief, lassitude, and indifference as Haggai records it in Haggai 1:3-12. By dint of hard work and strong language he prodded them to action until they finally completed the temple building they had begun. If any of those prophecies were intended to be projected beyond that impending return to the land one would surely expect to read of some such prophecies in the Bible written after the events related to that return of 536 BC to 445 BC. This would include the Book of Malachi in the Old Testament and all of the New Testament.

But we search these postexilic Scriptures in vain for a single mention or reference to another such return and rebuilding of a Jewish nation as God's people. Neither Malachi, John the Baptist, Jesus, nor any of His apostles says a word about or shows any interest in such a regathering to the land in any of their writings. Their silence is most eloquent.

In their pre-Pentecost bewilderment, in Acts 1, the apostles showed they still held some of the ideas of the Jewish error of their day that their Messiah was to be an earthly ruler, when they asked Jesus if He was then about to restore the kingdom to Israel. This shows they not only had no inkling of a regathering of Israel to the land at a later date, they were also ignorant of Israel's imminent flight and dispersion from the land again.

Jewish Unbelief

That the Jews of our day are attempting, and will attempt in the future, to rebuild a national Israel, with a temple and reestablish their Jewish religion, is to be expected. After national Israel refused to believe and obey God when He bade them enter Canaan, God was greatly displeased and told them they now would never enter the land He had promised them. They would all die in the wilderness over the next forty years. Then they were sorry and decided they would go up against the people of Canaan after all. But they went on their own, God was no longer with them, and they miserably failed. God had forsaken them. Numbers 14. They were like Samson, who was a perfect type of national Israel, whom the Lord forsook when he broke his covenant relationship by disobedience. He knew not that his strength had left him and he attempted to continue as God's man but could not and was taken captive by his enemies.

Jesus so eloquently reveals this Jewish human trait of rejecting God's plans for them until it is too late. In Luke 19:42-44, when Jesus wept over Jerusalem and foretold its desolation, He said, "If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes . . . because thou knewest not the time of thy visitation."

But the door of salvation is open to all Jews, on an individual basis, as it is to every other person in the world, to accept Christ as Savior and receive the gift of eternal life. Then they too will be God's chosen people, and heirs according to the promise. "And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise" (Gal. 3:29). "Neither is there salvation in any other: for there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved" (Acts 4:12).

Big Talk, Little Light

Talk may not be as powerful as we think. A physicist explains that if all seven million residents of New York City were to speak at one time, the total energy generated would be just about enough to light a 60-watt lamp.

The small stones which fill up the crevices have almost as much to do with making the fair and firm wall as the great rocks. Likewise, the wise use of spare moments contributes not a little to the building up in good proportions a man's mind. — E. Paxton Hood.
Sister Annie Is Sick

By Simon Schrock

Sister Annie is sick. She deserves a card shower. We load her room with cards. One by one we crowd her bedside to visit her. We tell her we care. We show love and concern. We lay our hand on her and pray for her well-being. Her name is mentioned at Wednesday night prayer meeting. And one by one prayers go to God for Sister Annie.

Sister Annie — yes — we visited her. We eased our conscience and told ourselves we kept Jesus’ teaching to “have done it to the least of these.” Now Jesus can’t tell us, “I was sick and ye visited me not,” because almost the entire brotherhood visited her. Our mind is soothed now and we imagine we can hear Jesus call our name and say, “Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom.” We may even pride ourselves a bit with our easily earned ticket to the kingdom.

After all Sister Annie has it coming to her. She sends cards to people who are sick. Remember the card she sent mother? Really she is a fine person and we should share in her hour of illness.

She receives our reward for her goodness. She receives a spiritual blessing and has a taste of heaven with our visit. Our good deeds help her regain physical health sooner — because others care. Her faith and hope is renewed.

This is all good. Anything less than love and care for Sister Annie would be sinful. And surely we must remember that God teaches us to “do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith” (Gal. 6:10). It is good that we give our loving attention to Sister Annie.

But why let it stop there? Why not give Mr. Jones a visit? Mr. Jones is not a Christian and living for the Lord. He doesn’t come to our church. We have seen him only several times in the last month. Our meeting him was only casual. Now he is sick. Why not drop by to see him? Make a special effort to let him know you care. You should care — because Jesus cares. You don’t have to preach — just share and care. Share in his cares. Then share a testimony of what God means to you. Maybe he would be glad if you reached him your hand while you prayed to God on his behalf. And then he just may want to explore and discover faith in God — faith like yours. But I guess he won’t have the opportunity, because we won’t go to his bedside.

Sick Mr. Jones. Who will care? His mail will not bring him cards to cover his wall. There will be no waiting line to visit him. No one to cheer his slowly breaking heart. No one to surround his bed with prayers. No one to assure him that “we are all praying for you.” So there he is, on a bed of sickness, sorrow, and pain. And we leave him with no help slowly dying for hell to receive.

Could it be neighbor Betty Jane that is sick? She is young and lived wickedly. She is a midnight show girl. Now she is sick — but who will care? We comfort ourselves by the old standby thought that she has it coming to her. She asked for it, so why should I show up? What will the people think if I walk in to such a harlot? Let her companions help her in her trouble. Betty Jane sick? Yes — sick, in distress, and it may be that she is in search for an answer to life. She may be hungry for meaning and fulfillment for her own life. She may be in search, but who will let her know we care?

The people who lost their son really aren’t your friends. It was a bitter experience for them. But they didn’t respond to your hour of sorrow, so why should I show up at their house? I’d look out of place. Since they are the oddball family on the street and no one really cares for them, what would the rest of the neighbors think if I stuck myself out like that? And furthermore, there is a bit of tension between us anyway.

Think again. Isn’t this the very spot where Jesus wants us to serve? We join in response to those who receive a hundred and some greetings from our church. Shouldn’t we respond in true compassion to the man who will not hear from the hundred and some from our church? Here is your opportunity to share the burden, care for him, show true sympathy and heartfelt concern. And most of all share your faith in the all-sufficient grace of Jesus. He may see in a new way what you meant when you quoted 2 Cor. 12:9, “My grace is sufficient for thee.”

How about staying in touch with the family whose son is in very critical condition from an auto accident? Give them a call. Ask in a caring way about the son. Give your number to call for help if needed. Assure the family of your prayers. Send some appropriate mail. The son may be swinging between life and death and he may be swinging between faith and a nervous breakdown. Can you help?

What blessing do we receive in visiting only those who visit us? Praying for those who pray for us? Caring for only those who care for us? Calling only those who call us?

Simon Schrock is from Fairfax, Va.

Gospel Herald, February 3, 1970
There is friendship and fellowship in visiting those who visit us. But is that enough? Hardly, for a Christian. Here is what Jesus taught: "For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the same? And if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? do not even the publicans so" (Mt. 5:46, 47)? So there we have it, if we limit our sharing and caring to ourselves, we are no better than the hypocrite we talk about in our Sunday school. We talk about that man somewhere else who doesn't care for others. He lives for himself, but we may be just as guilty as he. If we love, visit, pray for, care for, greet, call, and listen only towards those who do it unto us, what reward have we? do not even the ungodly do the same?

The real blessings of visiting, sharing, listening, and understanding comes from giving of yourself to those who are not expecting it from you. The rich blessings come from serving those who serve not.

Why not visit the sick who aren't in your own circle? Call the family who lost a son or father in war. Show love—Christ’s kind of love. A love the Holy Spirit can use to show a man the way to peace, life, and faith. A love that is unexpected. A love that opens the door to his heart.

This is not a plea to stop being good to Sister Annie. Never neglect a good thing you already do, to do another task. It is a plea to keep visiting the brethren and add to your virtue a visit to those not of the faith.

Is Sister Annie sick? Then visit her. It is our duty. But don’t forget Mr. Jones and harlot Betty Jane—that is our duty too.

This book concerns itself with selected issues in the American pulpit from 1630 to 1967. It describes the message, issues, and impact of American preaching as it interacts with history and as it shapes church and society. The issues covered include social problems such as slavery, war, peace, race relations, and theological problems such as the new birth, experiential religion, neoorthodoxy fundamentalist modernist controversy, radical right, and church-state separation.

This book exposes the interrelationship between the course of American history and the events of the American pulpit and reveals the place of the American pulpit in the dynamic interaction of opposing forces. It is an excellent resource to students and preachers concerning the issues approach to preaching.—LeRoy Kennedy

When You Pray by Harold Lindell. Tyndale House. 1969. 182 pp. $3.95.

The chapter titles are: Presuppositions About Prayer, Kinds of Prayer, The Laws Governing Prayer, Problems in Prayer, Hindrances to Prayer, The Power of Prayer, Illustrations of Answered Prayer. The chapter on Problems in Prayer is especially pertinent and helpful, in which Dr. Lindell discusses the various reasons for unanswered prayer. This book is one of the best treatments of the doctrine of prayer that I have seen for some time. A fine selection for the church library.—Earl R. Delp

Three-Fifths of a Man by Floyd McKissick. The Macmillan Company. 1969. 223 pp. $4.95.

The title of this book was taken from a statement in Article I, Section 2, of the Constitution of the United States which says that free persons shall be counted by number excluding Indians not taxed, "and counting three-fifths of all other persons" meaning of course slaves. This was later altered by Amendments XIII and XIV.

Writing from the perspective of a lawyer the author describes the milieu created by the white man in which the Afro-American has had to live and in which he has struggled against the reluctance of the white man to grant him the rights and privileges of a human being. It is a sad and depressing story. Progress has been made in the treatment of blacks by whites but it has never been voluntary. The white man always wants the marches, protests, and violence to stop, and will make promises to get them stopped only to go back on the promises as soon as the action stops, hoping things will return to normal. The black person either loses hope, gives up in despair or turns to militancy.

The theme of the author is that we really need no more civil rights provisions than those already in the Declaration of Independence and in the Constitution with its amendments. These lie given in the appendix.

This will be a valuable book for the church library. It warns also of a national blood bath if progress is not made speedily in allowing a man to be a real man, regardless of color.—Nelson E. Kauffman

Sourcebook for Mothers by Eleanor Doan. Zondervan. 278 pp. $5.95.

This book might better be titled, A Sourcebook About Mothers. It contains poems, readings, toasts, devotional thoughts, plays, dialogues, etc., all about mother. The authors of these writings include Billy Graham, Lincoln, Longfellow, Amos R. Wells, Henry Ward Beecher, Susanna Wesley, Shelley, Carl Sandburg, plus a host of others including the inevitable Unknown. Not only are all phases of motherhood touched upon but there are sections on Children, Sons, Daughters, Mothers-in-law, and Fathers to name a few.

It would seem that one could scarcely plan a program honoring mother without the aid of this book. It would provide many inspirations for sermons honoring motherhood or on any topic dealing with mother. The book can be used for inspirational reading as well as for reference. It is probably one of the most complete collections on mother that has been published. An excellent addition to the church library.—Jocelle Meyer

At the very heart of real prayer is the living Christ! So claims this homemaker-writer who also moves in theological circles. She sets out to convince her readers of this by discussing in the first half of the book The Foundations of Prayer followed by The Practice of Christian Prayer. Quite often she seems to be speaking directly to persons of the liberal Protestant approach, with which she has found disillusionment in her own life. Prayer cannot be excused as a mere psychological phenomenon; it is a living relationship with a living Christ.

Prayer is not a rigid, disciplined act, although it takes determination to allow it to be the vital force it is. It is release and relaxation. Prayer is not the last thing we must do; it is the most effective work we do. "Prayer through the living Christ is our main source of strength and action," declares Mrs. Wuelnner.

As a book about prayer, this is refreshing. It is written from both a practical and a theological viewpoint. But it always brings the reader back to Christ Himself, without whom prayer has no use or meaning at all.—Sylvia Jantz.

Pacifism in the United States by Peter Brock. Princeton University Press. 1968, xii plus 1005 pp. $18.50.

Here is a deeply documented treatment of this theme from the colonization of America to World War I. Without letting his treatment be skewed by his own commitment, the author understands his material empathetically. The varieties of emphasis and shading which distinguish the three peace churches and the nondenominational pacifists are carefully delineated.

One of the significant sections is the narrative of the Quaker experiment in colonial government (drawing extensively from the studies of G. F. Hershberger). This experience is often appealed to as demonstrating a radical dichotomy between nonresistance and political activity. As Brock shows, it proves no such thing. Quakers could not continue to govern Pennsylvania according to their consciences because they were ultimately outvoted, because they were subject to royal charters over which they had no control, and because the Quakers active in government were not of deep pacifist conviction; not because of any intrinsic irrelevance of nonresistance to the common life.

In every major period a chapter is devoted to Mennonites and Brethren. Brock here brings together more material, in more adequate analysis, than has yet been done by any Mennonite author. Careful study of these sections throws much light on contemporary Mennonite problems of self-understanding. John F. Funk and John S. Coffman in their renewal of peace awareness during and following the Civil War give the lie to those who assume that Mennonite nonresistance was always until recently unmixed with borrowings from Quakerism or nonsectarian pacifism. All three peace churches (except for the earliest Quakers) are burdened with a legalist, nonmissionary conception of their rejection of war and violence, but (as distinct from today) they found the clarity and stamina for a costly nonconformity.

This book is not too expensive when considered a reference book. It says more per dollar and per page than most books at a quarter the price.—John H. Yoder.

Never Underestimate the Little Woman by Clarissa Start. Drawings by Betty Wind. Concordia. 1969. 256 pp. $4.95.

With a twinkle in her eye, one of the little women tells us how it is. There is no whining and pining for the days of yore when that "ideal" (?) woman mothered and grandmothered the generations past! Instead, the woman of today is pictured as still baking bread, braiding rugs, and making quilts, but doing infinitely more. She chauffeurs, referees, teaches, writes, volunteers for community work, paints, and trains animals. Lest there be some unbelievers, let them read the book!

Mrs. Start, now a widow, has had neighborhood chats with women in her St. Louis Post-Dispatch column for more than twelve years. Because she is an American housewife, worker-mother-volunteer, she knows the joys and dilemmas of the little woman. Who can help laughing with her at life's foibles and tangles? Don't take yourself too seriously, she says indirectly.

Behind the humor which makes this book so appealing, the reader can sense a standing on solid ground which brings meaning and solidarity to the family and the individual woman.

The drawings add flavor.—Sylvia Jantz.

Miss Glenn, a spry and witty lady of 103 years, writes her memoirs of a useful, adventurous life. She was born near Atlanta, Georgia, and now lives in a retirement center at Emory University in Atlanta. She remembers interesting details of her early life on a southern plantation, teaching in a one-room schoolhouse, preparation for missionary work in Brazil and the 35 years she spent there under the Methodist Church. While home on an extended furlough during World War I she was given a translating assignment in New York City and helped break up a spy ring through her knowledge of blueprints learned as a girl. She founded the first Methodist women's college and other schools in Brazil.

Miss Glenn received a physical fitness citation on her 100th birthday, was received by President Johnson at the White House, and also made a visit back to Brazil that year. Now retired, she writes a column for four local newspapers.

This book is lively, witty, and refreshing.

Miss Glenn could be a stubborn woman at times, but she is certainly dedicated and warmhearted.—Evelyn Bauer.

Nationalism is perhaps the most pervasive of modern idolatries. There are over 125 separate nationalisms. Each is idolatrous in itself but like Baal of old each is subservive of other societal institutions. No institution or idea is as unavoidable or has succeeded as often as has the church and Christianity.

James Wood has written a perceptive account of what nationalism is and its development in history. Very briefly he suggests the "problem". The problem is twofold. First, "nationalism is a denial of the universalism of the Christian gospel...

Second, the problem is the negation of the gospel by a "wedding of religion to nationalism" which may be "the most important problem confronting the churches in American public life today...

This is a good short introduction. What we now need is a major account showing how in the age of the cold war American religion has become a major ingredient of both fortress America and Pax Americana. Those of us who are critical of these stances in foreign policy may become quite uncomfortable in seeing the intimate relationship of faith and foreign policy. But then judgment does begin in the household of faith itself.—John A. Lapp.

What happens when the church is asked to get involved? Do rank and file church members have the courage to allow their workers a free hand? What part do clergy play in guiding the parish to sociocultural relevance? Can these inhibited Christians be of any help to the black community?

This revealing book is a careful study of what happened when six congregational churches were asked to fund a social action program in community organization. As the Christian community divided into those who were against and those who were for the program, mistakes were committed on both sides. Perhaps the greatest lesson of all is one we know without testing; most western churches are completely immobilized by internal differences. When these are brought to the surface through confrontation, all creativity and most action is effectively brought to a standstill by our tendency to "divide and subside."

What happened in Oakland, Calif., was not unique. The lesson of the schizophrenic church is that we are not now ready to do our part in the urban crisis. We are not ready because we are not willing to trust our brothers who are on the scene to direct local action.—Verin Miller.

For the first time in its history the Rockefeller-endowed Riverside Church in New York has revealed the amount of its financial assets. The balance sheet as of Dec. 31, 1968, showed endowment funds totaling $23,994,000 and property having a replacement value of $86,105,000.

The endowment includes not only "many gifts and bequests" from John D. Rockefeller, Jr., but also gifts from "many other generous members," according to church treasurer Ward B. Ogden.

The amounts stated for the endowment represent market value of the securities or other assets at the time they were given. Mr. Ogden said. In addition, "realized and unrealized net gains, accumulated to Dec. 31, 1968, amounted to $13,700,000."

The Board of Selectmen in Holbrook, Mass., has been asked to order a huge "Christmas card" removed from a public park because it displays a Vietnam moratorium peace symbol.

The display was constructed by senior students of Holbrook High School.

Everett W. Walker of Holbrook petitioned the Selectmen for removal of the 8 x 8 foot painting, one of eight executed by the students, on the ground that the peace symbol is "political."

Robert Kindelan, high school art director, defended the students' display. "It is just a peace symbol," he said. "What," he added, "could be more appropriate for Christmas?"

It would be "gross hypocrisy" for churches to push such programs as the guaranteed annual income if they haven't taken the lead in transferring their own resources to the poor, Miss Jean Fairfax told the Friends of the World Council of Churches at their annual meeting.

"We need the aid of the churches in working for these programs," the World Council and NAACP official said, "but they must come with clean hands."

Recounting the history of civil rights reforms in the 1960's, she said that the focus of discussion has now changed from wider participation in the structures of society to control.

"We are hearing the voices of the take-over generation," Miss Fairfax said. "And some of us should be the move-over generation."

Military chaplains should be instructed to uphold officers and enlisted men who refuse to carry out orders which are "immoral," according to the Secretary for Chaplains of the United Church of Christ.

The Rev. Leon A. Dickinson "demanded" that such instruction be given in letters to the chaplaincies of the Army, Navy, and Air Force.

He referred to the alleged massacre at Song My as dramatizing "the gravity of the war and the extreme stress and intense demand for high responsibility by youthful officers in the field."

In a moving, heartfelt prayer, Pope Paul VI recited a litany of horrors for which man is responsible — nuclear-arms buildup, class hatred, racial exclusiveness, self-satisfied individualism, wars, slaughter, devastation — and cried out, "Lord, it is true! We are not on the right path!"

The pontiff uttered his prayer at the Church of Jesus, a 16th-century parish shrine, where he celebrated Mass on Jan. 1, the "World Day of Peace."

"Lord," he said, "our hands are still bloodstained from the last World Wars, so that not all our people have yet been able to take each other's hands in friendship."

The Pope noted that man now possesses "instruments of death" which "in a single instant could set the world ablaze and perhaps even destroy mankind."

Senate hearings to determine whether users of birth control pills are being adequately informed concerning the pill's potential health hazards began Jan. 14.

The open hearings were conducted by the Monopoly Subcommittee of the Senate Small Business Committee, of which Sen. Gaylord Nelson, Wisconsin Democrat, is chairman.

"It is important," Sen. Nelson said, "that women be informed about all aspects of the use of the pill so that they are able to make an intelligent, personal decision about their use."

Sen. Nelson said the package insert, which the pharmaceutical companies are required by law to send with their shipments to druggists, warn of 'skin blotches, liver damage, mental depression, jaundice, breakthrough bleeding, loss of sex drive, and a very large number of other serious adverse reactions' associated with use of the pill."

"The only way the world is going to stop short of the brink of nuclear holocaust is a return to God and the principles of the Bible — and this is what the young people, even the militaries, are trying to tell us," Dr. George Wald said during a two-day symposium on Science and the Social Imperativer.

Dr. Wald, Nobel prizewinner, Higgins Professor of Biology at Harvard, teacher, and humanist, received tremendous applause from the academicians gathered at Southern Colorado State College.

"Nuclear holocaust," Dr. Wald declared, "can only be averted by faith, love, and hope, and the precious principles of the Bible. I know that this is the sincerest, non-academic sentimentality, but I'm convinced that this is the only way we are going to prevent the total chaos that we are headed for — and probably within the next 10 years."

An orderly throng of young Christians nearly 5,000 strong marched down Hollywood Boulevard under a banner proclaiming, "Jesus Christ Is Coming Again."

The event on Dec. 14, resembled earlier and smaller marches by students of Chinese for Christ in Los Angeles.

The most recent parade saw many youth with placards reading, "Jesus Set Us Free," "Merry Christmas: God's Gift Is Christ!" and "Traveling with Christ Is the Perfect Trip," plus a multitude of others.

The Rev. Don Williams, minister to college students at Hollywood Presbyterian Church, originated the idea. Word spread to other churches until some 30 congregations took part in the massive and orderly demonstration.

As usual, Miss Elizabeth Aageson attended a worship service in Immanuel Baptist Church in Portland, Me., on Sunday, Dec. 14 — her 100th birthday.

She taught in the church's Sunday school for 81 years, retiring last spring only because she suffered a shoulder fracture. She was believed to be the oldest Sunday school teacher in the nation.

A piano teacher most of her life, Miss Aageson still lives in the house in which she was born.

A Time to Build

Biafra is dead. But the tribal tensions which gave birth to Biafra are not dead. It will take some time before soldiers from both sides of the conflict can embrace each other. Biafra’s surrender to Federal Nigeria on Monday, Jan. 12, 1970, opens the way for reconciliation. But for reconciliation to come about the victors must be generous and the defeated cooperative. It will be weeks before the world learns whether or not such human qualities can emerge from people who have been 30 months in open combat, and decades, if not centuries, wary of each other.

The struggle of the Eastern Nigerians, chiefly the Ibo, was against not only the Lagos government, but against the combined arsenals of Britain and the Soviet Union, and Egyptian bomber pilots. The Ibo had spirit, an ingenious ability to improvise, and tribal solidarity. With such resources they might have prolonged their struggle against the Federal government. But in the last months, they lacked weapons and food.

One of the most important paragraphs in the statement of surrender broadcast by Brig. Philip Effiong from Biafra-held territory reads: “Our people are now disillusioned, and those elements of the old government regime who have made negotiations and reconciliations impossible have voluntarily removed themselves from our midst.”

Obviously it refers to General Ojukwu, top man in Biafra, who had fled the besieged remnant of the secessionist territory. With him out of the picture, it appears that the more realistic members of both the military and civilian communities moved quickly to end the war.

Things Fall Apart

At the time of its independence from Britain, Oct. 1, 1960, Nigeria was divided into three regions: North, East, and West, roughly corresponding to the areas in which the three largest tribes live: Hausa, Ibo, and Yoruba.

Tribal antagonisms began to harden soon after independence. Suspicion and fear grew among these three tribes, so much so that peoples of each region had greater loyalties to their regional governments than they did to the Federal government in Lagos, which was dominated by Muslim Northerners.

Six years after independence the Prime Minister was assassinated in a military coup. The officer then to rise as supreme ruler was an Ibo. Within months the North looked upon the military coup as an Ibo coup, and directed their anger against Ibo civilians living in the North. More than 30,000 Ibos were killed and the surviving two million fled to their homelands in the Eastern Region. Another military coup brought Colonel Gowon to supreme command of Federal Nigeria. But military forces under Lieutenant Colonel Ojukwu, then Military Governor of the Eastern Region, remained faithful to him rather than to Federal Nigeria.

Six months later, in an attempt to break the Ibo power of the Eastern Region, Gowon attempted to carve Nigeria into 12 regions, with the East to be divided into three. Three days later, on May 30, 1967, the Eastern Region declared itself an independent state, to be called the Republic of Biafra, taking its name from the sight whose waters wash its shores.

The Mennonite Central Committee recruited two nurses in September 1968 to join an interdenominational relief effort under CCN to civilian victims of the Nigeria/Biafra conflict. They worked in secessionist territory recaptured by the Federal Nigerian forces.

Susie Miller, assigned to the Enugu General Hospital, supervised a ward for victims of kwashiorkor, a disease resulting in swelling of arms and legs from the lack of nutrition. Barbara Souder joined Nigerian medical personnel in holding mobile clinics five days a week in the area surrounding Enugu.

January 1969 saw the creation of the Quaker-Mennonite Services, a jointly sponsored program by the American Friends Service Committee and the Mennonite Central Committee to work solely within Biafra. Returning the Dr. Wallace Shellengerers and Martha Bender, RN, to the Abiriba Hospital was the first venture for the new Quaker-Mennonite Service. Dr. Linford Gehman joined the Shellengerers within a month, taking over their medical and relief program upon their termination.

Gehman and Bender worked within Biafra-held territory until Friday, January 9, 1970, when they evacuated to Sao Tome, an island off the coast of Nigeria from which the emergency relief flights originated during the past two years. They were to return to the U.S. immediately.

During their year in Biafra, it was necessary for the Quaker-Mennonite Service team to move their medical facilities several times as the Federal Nigerian troops pressed upon the Biafran-held territory.

On Christmas Eve, Dec. 24, 1969, the team crossed the Imo River to Obizi. Christmas morning the bridge was blown up and the village from which the QMS team last operated their clinics, fell to the Federal troops.

During the weeks following Christmas, leading to the Jan. 9 surrender, the Federal Nigerian troops continued their attacks against the weary, defeated Biafran defenses. Gehman and Bender evacuated only when it was obvious that the collapse of Biafra was imminent.

On Sao Tome island there still remains a month’s supply of food which was to have been airlifted to Biafra. MCC has both foodstuffs and money on hand for any expanded emergency relief program which might develop. MCC is also in contact with the U.S. State Department, the American Friends Service Committee, and the Christian Council of Nigeria to learn how it can best respond to the situation.

Now that the Nigerian war is over, relief organizations the world over want to mount a massive operation for getting in food and medicines. Nigerian officials have made it quite plain that they are going to be very selective as to whom they allow in to assist them in such an operation. For the moment, it appears that organizations such as Joint Church Aid, which flew in relief to Biafra during the war, will not be invited by Nigeria to join in any expanded emergency relief program.

Such an attitude is difficult for Europeans and Americans to appreciate, especially the Western Christians, particularly those who make a career of corporate compassion. But Nigeria is trying to make two things clear: (1) she alone will determine how to feed her hungry and (2) she will decide also who gets fed.

On the second point African and European values would clash. Europeans rush to rescue dying babies and old people. But Africans would say: “Water the roots, not the leaves,” which means they intend to keep alive the adults who can again bear offspring. Americans and Europeans will have to guard against accusing the Africans of being callous, simply because Nigerians do not feed whom Westerners would, nor in the manner they would.

The call now is to sustained compassion, even though we may feel frustrated or indignant since we have less power in shaping the expression of that compassion.

— Omar Eby.
Orientation VS Style

Twenty-six youth attended an orientation—VS style—Jan. 5-10 at Salunga. The week was a unique exposure to sharing. Discussion leaders shared their insights and ideas and the volunteers responded with their questions and comments on the issues of war and peace, urban living, what we as Mennonites believe, unit relationships, and others. Divided in small groups Bible study came alive as each person shared in trying to grasp what Matthew 5, 6, and 7 really has to say to Christians in 1970. As the climax to a week of continual sharing of ideas, problems, victories, experiences, etc., the group joined together in an agape meal. This tremendous feeling of oneness and fellowship helped the group look forward to sharing with unit members and others at their respective assignments.

In the commissioning service at the Millersville Mennonite Church the group gave their testimony through word and song. Presented in choric fashion, “Light in the Asphalt Jungle” by Vincent Harding was a unique testimony and challenge. Jay Garber gave the charge and Ray Geigley encouraged the group to “Get Out of the Church” and respond to the needs of the world.

Service Workshops Scheduled

Persons having advisory and leadership capacities connected to the various service programs of the Mennonite Church can anticipate some guidance in the near future as a result of several upcoming special workshops. Ken Seitz of the Relief and Service Office in Elkhart has announced five CPS Sponsor - Service Counselor Workshops during March and April, 1970.

The dates and locations for each regional meeting follow: March 7 — Mid-continent, Omaha, Neb.; March 14 — Eastern United States, Stephens City, Va.; March 21 — Maple Grove Church, Belleville, Pa.; April 17, 18 — Midwest, Elkhart, Ind.; and April 25, 26 — Western United States, Denver, Colo. All CPS sponsors and service counselors are expected to attend the workshop scheduled for their area. Volunteer Service program directors are also invited to participate.

As a representative for churchwide interests in the government-controlled I-W program, the CPS sponsor assists the newly arrived CPS man in securing a service assignment or lodging and provides counsel and resources for group activities as requested. A service counselor is responsible to disseminate information on the different service opportunities available through all the mission and service agencies of the Mennonite Church. Both appointments are made on the district conference level.

The purpose of each regional workshop, according to Seitz, is to help service counselors see their roles more clearly and to discover the problems facing CPS sponsors and to help them better relate to men in I-W assignments. There will be special emphasis on current issues surrounding the draft and their effect on Mennonite youth. Visits will be made to VS or CPS locations in proximity to the places of meeting.

Persons have been appointed in each district conference to serve on the local arrangements committees and to notify all those who should attend. District conferences have been asked to assume transportation and other costs involved for each workshop. If there are instances when this is not possible, a limited amount of funds can be made available by contacting Ken Seitz at Mennonite Board of Missions, Box 370, Elkhart, Ind. 46514. Seitz invites anyone having questions concerning the upcoming workshops to contact him at this address.

Gerlach Dissertation Published

“Affluence produces revolutions too, contrary to Marxist theories to which many people subscribe,” reports Eastern Mennonite College’s Horst P. Gerlach in a doctoral dissertation just published.

“People who have higher incomes tend to reach for more political rights, thus becoming the leading force behind political uprisings.” Gerlach is visiting professor in history from Germany. His dissertation is entitled The English Peasants’ Revolt of 1381 and the German Peasants’ War: a Comparison.

Contributions Cautiously Climb

Response to three special missions giving appeals on behalf of Mennonite Board of Missions has been very encouraging in recent weeks, according to Leroy Yoder, Board controller.

As of Jan. 15, contributions total $20,364 for the 1969 Christmas Sharing Fund, an annual above-budget project. The total amount received for the 1968 drive was $15,339. Christmas Sharing Fund proceeds are divided equally between Mennonite Board of Missions, Mennonite General Conference, and Mennonite Board of Education (which includes the three church colleges).

Yoder also reports a total of $63,526 as of Dec. 31, 1969, in Missions Week offerings as compared to $54,488 received in 1968. Missions Week contributions are tallied as part of the regular contributions for Board program.

Enthusiasm and support for the much-discussed Compassion Fund continues to climb as $18,035 has been contributed as of Jan. 15, 1970. More attempts are being made to interpret the purpose and use of contributed funds for this special above-budget appeal.

David C. Leatherman, treasurer, reports an 8.7 percent increase in contributions for the Board’s program as of Dec. 31, 1969, as
Pease Center Opened

Three distinctions of the city of Albany, Ore., are: 1. It is the center of the largest concentration of (Old) Mennonites in the Pacific Northwest. 2. It has the largest Veterans’ Day parade west of the Rocky Mountains. 3. It is the largest producer in the nation of rare earth metals, so necessary for rockets and jet engines.

On December 6, 1969, in the center of the downtown shopping area, a storefront named “The Peace of Christmas Center” was opened. Free coffee and comfortable chairs were available for weary shoppers. Posters which conveyed the message of peace decorated the walls. There were books, some for sale and some to browse through, and a generous variety of literature for people to pick up at no cost. A record player played music appropriate to the season from “Joy Is Like the Rain” to Handel’s “The Messiah.”

This Peace Center was the brainchild of a Mennonite, David Mann, pastor of the Albany Mennonite Church, and a Methodist, Orville Coats, pastor of the First United Methodist Church in Albany, who shared the concern that Christians in Albany, in the midst of war celebration and war production, should find a creative way to witness to the Christian message of peace. What could be more appropriate than the Christmas season for such a witness?

The purposes of the Peace Center were set out by David Mann in a letter to his Church Board:

1. To attempt to put Christ more meaningfully into Christmas, and inviting persons to faith in Christ.
2. To proclaim the meaning and significance of the coming of Christ into the world as the Prince of Peace, and of the centrality of the message of peace to the heart of the gospel.
3. To make available to the community literature on the biblical teaching concerning love, peace, and war.
4. To provide a setting in the Christmas season for discussing with interested persons, questions concerning Christ, the Prince of Peace, and the issues of peace and war.

The Center was sponsored by interested individuals in the Albany Mennonite, Bethany Mennonite, and First United Methodist churches of Albany. These people accepted the responsibility of staffing the Center and underwriting the expenses. They were joined by members of other congregations.

While the response by shoppers was not overwhelming, keen interest was shown by people who stopped by. Appreciation was expressed that something was being said in a positive, dignified way about peace and about the meaning of Christmas.

Many teenagers expressed positive attitudes toward the Center. One approvingly said, “I didn’t expect to find anything like this in a conservative city like Albany.”

One of the helpful encounters took place when about a dozen pastors from more than half that many denominations met one morning to talk about peace. A Methodist pastor to students at Oregon State University provided the input with a short presentation on “The Scriptures Speak on Peace.” The discussion indicated a deep concern about the peace message among the Christian churches in this area.

In line with the objective of helping individuals to find peace with God a sizable amount of evangelistic material was displayed prominently. Our main thrust was toward the biblical meaning of peace and not primarily against a specific war. However, in our situation it is impossible to talk about war without talking about Vietnam and the draft. In both of these instances we attempted to select materials that spoke clearly to the issues in a way that was consistent with our total Christian peace testimony. Not everyone agreed that we were completely successful in this attempt.

Some people also raised the question of the appropriateness of an interchurch witness in the area of peace. There was some feeling that an exclusive Mennonite witness would have been better.

What about the future? In the scramble to get the peace center open sometimes one heard the phrase, “If we do this again we’ll . . .” This has been modified to, “Next year we’ll . . .” Efforts are under way to establish a continuing peace witness in the community. Who can say where the Lord will lead? We trust that our ears will be unplugged when He speaks.

—David Groh, pastor of the Bethany Mennonite Church, Albany, Ore.

Stoltzfus Appointed VS Area Administrator

Dale Stoltzfus has been appointed by the Eastern Board as area coordinator and administrator for New York City on a half-time basis. He is also working one-half time for Mennonite Action Program, which coordinates service ministries of the various Mennonite Churches in New York City, including camping, youth work, drug rehabilitation, etc.

Stoltzfus’ new assignment in Voluntary Service involves developing and maintaining relationships for VS-ers who serve as youth workers for the local churches; finding more meaningful jobs for VS-ers in community development (teachers, social workers, and community organization); and counseling current VS-ers. He carries the responsibility for the development and direction of the total New York VS area program.
“Maturity” Course Coming

Recognizing the need for an additional course in its Home Bible Studies series, Mennonite Board of Missions authorized the development of a new course entitled The Mature Person. After nearly four years of writing, discussing, and rewriting, the new course is expected in April.

In 1966 a committee representing Mennonite Broadcasts, Mennonite Board of Missions, and Mennonite Publishing House met to discuss the need for a new course. The realization grew out of students’ reactions to existing courses. They appreciated the direct Bible study, but many had questions which these courses did not answer.

The stated purpose of the new course is: (1) to help a person become more fully aware of himself, (2) to show the interrelationship of physical, social, emotional, and spiritual aspects of a person, and (3) to show the relevance of biblical categories of maturity to life here and now.

The focal point of the lessons is the person of Jesus Christ, the embodiment of maturity. He is the expression of God’s intention for man. But rather than pointing to a specific level or destination as a requirement for maturity, maturity is shown in the lessons as a process and not as an arrival.

Ray Keim, a psychologist at Oaklawn Psychiatric Center in Elkhart, was asked to write the lessons. Wilbur Hostetler, appointed to the Editing House as editor of Home Bible Studies, is helping to put the finishing touches on the new course.

Mennonite Broadcasts uses Home Bible Studies as a major part of its counseling work and the staff is eager to begin using the new course. Paul Roth, in charge of correspondence course work at Mennonite Broadcasts, is excited about the new lessons and is convinced that they will be a real asset to the Bible study program.

David Augsburger, Mennonite Hour radio speaker, is planning a series of talks on the subject of Christian maturity. He feels that this subject concerns a vital part of Christian growth and development toward a wholesome, healthy personality.

Students Abroad

This Winter

Eighty Goshen College students left the States by air the first part of January to begin a 14-week Trimester of Study and Service abroad in the school’s international education program.

The Trimester of Study and Service was inaugurated at the college a year ago and in its second trimester program. The Trimester abroad is unique in that it is available to all college students, and it sends students to developing countries in Central America and the Caribbean, where it provides for the study of economics, languages, and animal life. They go on field trips, visit government buildings and national shrines, and tour farms and factories. In the second seven weeks they work beside a national in an unsalaried job, often in a country town or village many hours from the capital.

One of the purposes of the trimester abroad is to help students learn how to serve God and man more effectively. Exposing them to hurts and needs of a part of the world strange and unfamiliar to him is an attempt to make his education “a process of self-realization and self-fulfillment, as well as the accumulation of facts.”

Faculty leaders on location in the countries are Mr. and Mrs. J. Daniel Hess, San Jose, Costa Rica; Mr. and Mrs. Ervle L. Glick, Pointe-a-Pitre, Guadeloupe, French
The students were the fifth contingent to go abroad since the program was launched in September 1968.

Calvary Church Dedicated

On the afternoon of Jan. 4, 1970, the Calvary Mennonite Church in Los Angeles, Calif., held a dedication and open house for its newly acquired facilities at 2400 West 55th Street in the Inglewood section of that city. Pastor LeRoy Bechler announced that over 225 persons representing the congregation and community were in attendance.

The dedication message was given by Dr. E. V. Hill, pastor of the Mount Zion Missionary Baptist Church. He began by asking if the Mennonite Church has a right to move into the Inglewood community.

"This question was very fitting," Bechler said later. "In the morning message I felt led to call for a rededication of our members before we dedicate the building. It was a real thrill to see the gathering around the altar, and we have confidence that the Lord will truly use the witness here in building His church."

Other participants in the dedication service included J. L. Hostetler, secretary of church extension for Southwest Mennonite Conference; the Mount Zion Missionary Baptist Church Choir; Arthur Cash, assistant pastor at Calvary; and Donald E. Yoder, overseer of Southwest Conference.

Calvary Mennonite Church was established at 151 West 73rd Street in Los Angeles over 40 years ago. LeRoy Bechler was installed as pastor in 1961. A five-member Voluntary Service unit is continuing at 147 West 73rd Street, relating to the church, as well as the community bordering the Watts area.

Spanish Radio Director Visits Mexico

"Though Lester Hershey was invited to Mexico primarily as an annual conference speaker, his visit provided opportunity to work on many radio matters in a more satisfactory and thorough way than is possible by correspondence." This was a comment from Aaron King in Mexico City following a visit from Hershey, Mennonite Broadcasts' Spanish director in Puerto Rico. King is a full-time missionary and director of Mennonite Broadcasts' radio and television work in Mexico.

One broadcasting project currently under way in Mexico is the production of minute spots for radio and television. Hershey met with Senor Bauche Alcalde, who assisted with Mennonite Broadcasts' special Easter program, "The Greatest Week in History."

While in Mexico City Hershey met with Pedro DeKoster, a university economics professor, to record his testimony and a talk entitled "The Absurdity of Violence." The talk is scheduled for use on a Luz y Verdad program in the near future.

Mr. Hershey also contacted several evangelical bookstores regarding Luz y Verdad records. He found an unsupplied demand and discussed ways of making the records available to them.

A Mexican version of the Heart to Heart program (De Corazon a Corazon) is being planned, and Hershey met with Senora Dorantes who is being considered for speaker on the program. She was converted to Christianity partially through the work of the Luz y Verdad broadcast.

In addition to serving as guest speaker for the Mennonite Church's annual convention, Hershey also conducted evangelistic meetings in several churches and visited in prisons and community homes.

After three weeks in Mexico, Hershey left for Bogota, Colombia, to attend the First Latin-American Congress on Evangelism.

FCA Responds to Hong Kong Fire Victims

More than 5,700 people in the Kowloon section of Hong Kong were left homeless Dec. 2, as a result of four fires during the day. The main fire, believed to have started when a kerosene stove overturned and exploded, destroyed 50,000 square feet of densely populated squatters' huts in Tai Hang Sai village, a basement factory, and the interior of a resettlement estate flat.

Everett Metzler, MCC Hong Kong director, reported that the largest of the fires leveled 400 squatters' huts, and the families lost everything. Fifteen Family-Child Assistance (FCA) families were among those who suffered great losses.

The Hong Kong government is attempting to help the fire victims by moving all those who are willing to resettlement areas. Unfortunately, the resettlement areas, Kwun Tong and Tsun Wan, are five to seven miles from their former homes. This has caused problems in transportation and has brought a disruption in the schooling for the children.

Many private and governmental agencies have been giving assistance to the people, but there is still great need. FCA helped each of the 15 families by giving them money grants and additional loans to buy items needed for their new homes. The loans and grants amounted to $65 per family.

FCA is a project of the Mennonite Central Committee which enables poor families in needy countries to continue living together as a family unit. The aid given supplies financial support for school tuition and books, medicines, and ways to help families become self-supporting.

A cablegram was received from Stanley Friesen on Jan. 18: “ARRIVED IBADAN JANUARY 15. ALL WELL.” A letter from Laurence Horst dated Jan. 16 commented: “We thought it noteworthy that the Nigeria/Biafra war ended on the day they (Stans) were to leave for Nigeria.”

Arlin Yoder writes from Sao Carlos, Brazil: “Some time ago I requested prayer for a family that had moved to Sao Carlos from Rio de Janeiro. I would like to report that prayers evidently are being rewarded. The mother is a baptized Christian, although she had not closely associated with any church since her youth. As we were reorganizing our Sunday school at the end of the year, the mother accepted a primary class and music director responsibilities. Continue to pray that their Christian experience might be deepened.”

The Earl Schwartzentruber family has arrangements to leave the U.S.A. for South America on Feb. 26. They are scheduled to reach Buenos Aires on March 4. The Schwartzentrubes are on a three-month furlough in North America.

Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Buckwalter report from Ohiboro, Japan: “The Bible School program continues even though the director, Takio Tanase, and his family are on leave of absence for two years. Working through a course in the Preexilic Prophets with nine regular students in the Kushiro and Ohiboro classes is an enjoyable experience, although the message coming through to all of us is certainly not comfortable.”

John Lehman and Clare Schumm of the Personnel Office at Mennonite Board of Missions will present the various service programs available under the Board during a second round of Service Emphasis contacts on the three Mennonite college campuses. The schedule for Eastern Mennonite is Feb. 9-11; for Hesston, Feb. 18-20; and Goshen is not yet determined.

Leamon Sowell has accepted an invitation from the Bethel Mennonite Church in Chicago to assume its full-time pastorate. The Sowells request prayer support that the Lord will bless them with a vision to carry out this task. Bro. Leamon who has served with the Chicago Team Ministry, begins his new duties on March 1, 1970.

An abstract oil painting by Erma Martin, teaching assistant in art at Eastern Mennonite College, has been selected to hang in the new State Office Building of the American Association of Colleges and Universities in Washington, D.C.

The painting was selected by the art faculty at Madison College upon request by the American Association.

Miss Martin said she did the painting several years ago in response to the tornadoes which swept through Indiana on Palm Sunday, 1964.

A native of Wakaru, Ind., Miss Martin witnessed the disaster and attempted to re-capture the feeling of turmoil in her painting.

I want to give a hearty “Amen” to your editorial, “Let’s Affirm Our Faith” in the January 6 issue. — Jacob C. Kulp, Telford, Pa.

Thank you for your excellent work in connection with the Gospel Herald.

I am not sure of an analysis of the situation, but I am of the opinion that one of the reasons our young people are striking the church off their list is that they are nauseated with a “pie-in-the-sky” religion that is happy to do nothing about the social ills of the world. I think the Gospel Herald represents the church at its best since it has both the evangelical Christian message and social concern. We can have social concern without the gospel, someone has said, but we cannot have the gospel without social concern.

I feel that the Gospel Herald helps our thinking young people to respect the church.

I just want you to thank you for what you are doing. — Ruth B. Stoltzfus, Harrisonburg, Va.

A boy of eighteen with deep feelings about the war in Vietnam and the air of contentment with the status quo present in our Mennonite communities.

I have really been encouraged and enlightened by the articles on the draft, VS and the reports concerning our conference’s response to militarism and conscription. I have also been moved by Doug Hostetler’s poems in the recent issues of Gospel Herald. — Paul E. Hartman, Elida, Ohio.

Guidelines for Compassion Funds

Ed. Note — During a recent meeting in Elkhart of the Urban-Racial Council Executive Committee, a vote was taken to change the name of the organization to the “Minority Ministries Council.” Also during that meeting, the Executive Committee adopted a set of guidelines established by the newly titled Minority Ministries Council for use in deciding project funding made possible by contributions to the above-budget Compassion Fund. It is hoped that a careful reading of these guidelines will answer many questions congregations and district conferences are asking concerning the use of Compassion Fund contributions.

A. Guidelines for Minority Ministries Council

1. “Compassion Funds” are to be used to alleviate racism and poverty in minority communities (Black, Spanish-speaking communities, Indian, and Appalachian).

2. The following are programs to be funded (by no means exclusive):
   - Projects which are designed to evangelize minority communities at their level.
   - Programs which are designed to train minority leadership.
   - Programs which provide for racial self-image.
   - Recreational programs with emphasis on character development.
   - Programs of remedial and home economic education (other forms of education).
   - Projects which provide an economic base in minority communities, e.g., shopper’s cooperatives and day care centers which hire indigenous staff.
   - Projects which prepare people to work at the problems of racism and poverty (training centers).

3. Funding of projects will be to those having reconciliation as the basis of their program, whether the group is church or community-sponsored.

4. All projects should have a self-help emphasis.

5. Projects funded must have indigenous participation in planning and decision-making. Where feasible, persons from indigenous minorities should direct program.

6. Funds are to be used for programming. However, if just cause is shown, monies can be allocated for rental facility. If monies are approved for facility, funds shall not be used for new structures unless there is already a proven project at work.

B. Guidelines for District Conferences and Local Congregations. The Minority Ministries Council sees the necessity of conferences and congregations becoming involved in problems on the local level. Because of limited resources it is difficult for local congregations and conferences to do the kind of work necessary in solving all of the problems. For this reason, Compassion Funds can be used for an effective ministry on the local level. We are establishing the following guidelines to be used in helping conferences and congregations effectively use Compassion Funds:

1. All guidelines of Minority Ministries Council evaluation are applicable to district conferences and congregations.

2. District conferences and churches should coordinate efforts with Minority Ministries Council. MMC stands ready to give help in administering the program.

3. “Compassion Funds” should be used only in projects that could not have been carried out unless these funds were available. (Note: conferences should not use Compassion Funds to carry out projected programs which would have been deferred if these funds were not available; e.g., buildings.)

4. In order to get a complete record of the per member giving to “Compassion Funds” all projects using Compassion Fund monies are to report amount to Minority Ministries Council.

5. Local emphasis on assistance should not be the only area of concentration. Funds not used to carry out local programming in minority communities are to be channeled to Mennonite Board of Missions designated for “Compassion Fund.”

C. Application Procedure. Projects seeking funding from general Compassion Funds should submit applications to Minority Ministries Council. Where there is a Mennonite group making application, a copy of the application should be submitted to the district conference in which the project is located. Mennonite Board of Missions departments should apply directly to Secretary of MMC. The secretary will process all applications for funds through MMC and the Executive Committee of MBMC.

The World Shall Be Destroyed

By Lester T. Hershey

In his autobiography, Eddie Rickenbacker, North American hero in World War I and II, makes the following predictions for the near future: Airplanes that will hold 1,000 passengers, planes that can remain in the air for a year, individual jet-flying belts, interplanetary flights, cars with jet motors, TV with two screens, extrasensory perception, recapturing of mental impulses and thoughts of the past, etc.

On the other hand Captain Rickenbacker predicts an increase in problems, misery, and hunger; there will be Communist guerrillas infiltrating Asia, Africa, and Latin America, there will be another half-century war, the white man will be turned out of Africa and there will be a world divided by color — whites stirring up trouble with the blacks.

His prediction is very similar to what Jesus Himself said, “Nation will rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom . . . .” (Lk. 21:10). The Greek word, nation, really means race, or “a multitude that lives together being of the same type.” A literal translation of Jesus’ words would read like this, “Race will rise against race.” We are seeing the first signs of the fulfilling of this prophecy. Unless our world undergoes a drastic change from that course which it now follows, our universe will enter a period of tremendous suffering as Rickenbacker predicted.

What Does the Bible Say?

God has spoken about future events through the writers of the Holy Word. The Gospel writers, Matthew, Mark, and Luke quote Jesus’ prophetic words, “there will be great earthquakes, and in various places famines and pestilences; and there will be terrors and great signs from heaven” (Lk. 21:11, 12). “All this is but the beginning of the sufferings” (Mt. 24:8). As to the spiritual condition in those days Jesus predicted that the very church of Jesus Christ would be persecuted, would suffer imprisonment, and hate.

“And brother will deliver up brother to death, and the father his child, and children will rise against parents and have them put to death” (Mk. 13:12). He who remains faithful in following the Lord in spite of all this can do so only because the Lord will cut short those days: “And if the Lord had not shortened the days, no human being would be saved . . . .” (Mk. 13:20).

When Will This Be?

Some believe that we are already entering these days of tribulation. If we look at the persecution of the church in the countries behind the Iron and Bamboo Curtains, or in those places where Communism is terrorizing the population by means of their guerrillas, we would have to agree. “Men fainting with fear and with foreboding of what is coming on the world” (Lk. 21:26). Certainly the devil is working harder than ever. It seems that he is trying to make his last and most powerful attack before being chained by God. It seems that the events prophesied in history are lining up in such a way, the way is being prepared for the coming of the Lord. His coming will be “as the lightning [that] comes from the east and shines as far as the west . . . .” (Mt. 24:27). It is possible that His coming may be very soon. It is important, therefore, that believers take care that their “hearts [not] be weighed down with dissipation and drunkenness and cares of this life, and that day come upon you suddenly like a snare” (Lk. 21:34).

Sudden Destruction

In the same way that the world in the past was destroyed by the power and Word of God, just so the world in which we live shall be destroyed by the same power and Word of God. Peter prophesied, “But the Day of the Lord will come as a thief. On that Day the heavens will disappear with a shrill noise, the heavenly bodies will burn up and be destroyed, and the earth with everything in it will vanish” (2 Pet. 3:10).*

If this has not taken place yet it is not because the “Lord is . . . slow to do what he has promised, as some think. Instead, he is patient with you, because he does not want anyone to be destroyed, but wants all to turn away from their sins” (2 Pet. 3:9).*

How much of a future we have depends not on our material progress, nor even on the tensions we often think are unbearable. Our future depends upon the grace of God, His forbearance, and mercy. Let us work for “the night is coming.”*

ssSS-A Report

The appreciative words and friendly adiue indicated that the Sunday School Superintendents' Seminar was a success. To encourage others to attend the second seminar scheduled for Camp Amigo, February 20-22, I will report on the one held in January at Laurelville Mennonite Church Center.

There were about fifty. Many participants brought their wives, which was a good thing. It is important for congregational leaders to participate in new experiences with their wives. In most cases superintendents took the initiative. They came as the guests of their congregations. Wives came as the guests of their husbands. It is great to see women taking an active part with men where vital issues about the shape of a congregation's future are dealt with. It is the beginning of a new era in the church when men and women can come together to an intensive leadership-oriented event like a Sunday school superintendents' seminar.

There was considerable concern that young people be taken seriously — both in terms of designing Christian education programs that meet where they are and that adults be taught how to build bridges instead of walls between the generations.

I noted a new willingness to consider a wide variety of educational options. At the same time there was an eagerness to know what was coming from Herald Press. There was enthusiasm when progress was presented on the revised graded materials, the new kindergarten program, the studies for new church members and creative youth materials such as Holy Now.

The seminar was many-faceted. It began with introductions and a film on communication. Next, congregational groups worked at planning their own programs for the year. Paul Lederach reported on a number of new and renewed Christian education programs in various stages of progress. One period was spent considering what we are doing right in our congregations. A number of creative approaches to Christian education were listed. On Saturday evening a hilarious hour was spent on 'Sunday School Superintendents Are People Too.'

Sunday morning included the use of several sorts of music — particularly the kind that is meaningful to young people. There were demonstrations on how the Uniform lessons may be taught creatively. The seminar concluded with the voluntary participation of persons in a communion service focusing on the meaning of discipleship in a world where Christ's followers are constantly being asked to be broken and poured out for the world God loves.

By Still Waters

For consider your call, brethren; not many of you were wise according to worldly standards, not many were powerful, not many were of noble birth. 1 Cor. 1:26.

One of the striking lessons of Scripture, stressed time and again, is that few of the wise, the mighty, and the great come to faith in Christ. Few such will be saved. This is not due to Christ's rejection of them but their rejection of Christ.

One does not join the ranks of the redeemed by becoming adequate at some point or all points. Only the inadequate qualify. Nor is one saved because of reaching a certain level of righteousness. Only the one who hungers and thirsts after righteousness can be saved. Neither is the one who imagines that he has no need a candidate for salvation. Only the one who senses great need can really come to Christ.

So strange as it may seem, today as always, the presence of the foolish, the base and the weak among the believers indicates that not many wise, mighty, and noble are storming the gates. We may not like to think of it this way. But it is necessary to ponder what the Scripture says when it reminds us that one of the greatest stumbling blocks to salvation is our own self-sufficiency.

Remembering our mercies aids in forgetting our miseries.—Carl Yoder.

How seldom we weigh our neighbor in the same balance with ourselves.—Thomas à Kempis.

Jesus did not come to earth to eliminate those things which make men suffer. He didn't eliminate them, but He did illuminate them by His own Spirit. He didn't abolish sin, but He did send a shaft of light through the sin of the world, and that light is the forgiveness of God's love. Jesus didn't banish the darkness of the night, but He did pierce the darkness with His own steadfastness. Jesus didn't eliminate pain or disease or death, but He did show us the way to bear pain and sorrow and conquer the fear of death. Christ showed us the ugliness, the besetting sins of the world about us, but He also showed us the glory of things as they should be. The church proclaims Christ's teachings which can provide a yardstick by which we can measure our spiritual stature and growth.
What Brings Communism?

Communism grows these days only where people are so exploited and desperate for help that they will go anywhere help seems available. The cruelties and economic failures of communism are well known. Yet many persons are not ready to admit what really breeds communism. Atheistic communism is evil. But this evil comes when other evils pave the way.

Injustice brings communism. Whenever people are robbed of their just rights, whenever laws are on the side of injustice and favor the rich over the poor, whenever a land lets its rich become richer while its poor become poorer it prepares the ground for communism.

Racism brings communism. Putting white or black or brown on top or bottom plants the seeds for communism. Whenever people of different races are placed in different classes or because of race are condemned or condemned, communism has fertile soil.

Preachers and other persons who preach only “pie in the sky” really call for the coming of communism. To deny the social implications of the gospel and do nothing about the social ills of our age is creating the climate for communism to grow. To call farm and other “nice” forms of government subsidy “aid” and to call help for the poor and needy “welfare,” while demanding the former and denouncing the latter is planting the seeds for communism.

People who live in expensive homes, drive big cars, and live in luxury bring communism. These are the ones who are hit first when communism comes because such accumulate to themselves while those around find it nigh impossible to live.

People who run businesses, reaping large profits while keeping employees at the lowest possible standards and wages bring communism. This inequality begins to burn and rebellion rises within the heart. Only when people are exploited does communism have a chance.

Doctors, dentists, lawyers, and other professionals who charge exorbitant fees bring communism. It is when the poor feel caught by those who have the advantage to make unreasonable demands that communism crouches at the door.

Lawmakers who think more of the next election than of the next generation bring communism. A lack of concern for the common man and the putting of personal prestige and pursuits above people spells the death of democracy and opens the door to communism.

All such and others who put personal gain before concern for persons rightly need to fear communism the most and be warned that unless they change their course the curse of communism and revolution shall come and that right early.

The Monopoly of Smallness

The smaller a person is, the more room he needs for himself. This is not true by arithmetic but by fact. The smaller persons are as individuals, the less room there is for other people to work around them. Ten large men fill an elevator more than 12 small men, but three small persons in a church can crowd it more than 20 persons of more ample moral and social stature.

Small persons like to monopolize situations lest other people become competitors for their spot in the limelight. They hold other people at a distance lest some choice personal domain might be invaded.

Small persons feel insecure and afraid. They feel that every person of larger personality stature is a threat. They prefer to succeed alone rather than share success with others. To do this they must keep their projects small enough that they can encompass them entirely. Two small persons can find it utterly impossible to work together in a project which would provide good opportunity for 20 more ample persons.

The small person prefers to sing a solo rather than to be a member of the choir. Small persons quickly call attention to the mistakes made by others, especially if the other person is in some way a competitor. Small persons like to stand in the spotlight and dress themselves in any available glory. They like to be given something to do, and may work themselves nearly to death doing it themselves rather than organizing a crew which could do it more easily and more effectively.

Small persons like to be martyrs in order that people may see them being heroic. They work valiantly so long as they get credit for it. They often talk about how they are left alone to do the hard work. They find it difficult to make room for helpers. They are inwardly disappointed to see able people appear on the scene, and discourage allowing others to get experience in their positions. They are often highly efficient if they can work alone and in plain sight.

Small-souled persons are contentious, jealous, and defensive. They take up all the room they can get and continually irritate all who work in their environment.

A farmer found his cattle barn was too small for his multiplying herd of small, long-horned cattle. He disposed of them and bought a larger herd of larger cattle without horns. His barn was ample for them. Stunted people incline to grow long horns. Sometimes one gets in a church and keeps it pretty much to himself for years and years. — Milo L. Arnold. Adaptability and Salty Christianity

By Carl S. Keener

For the Christian, solutions to the deepest questions of existence are not found in human attempts of science or philosophy, however helpful our understanding of truth may be in these areas. Rather, a Christian finds ultimate meaning for his life in the resurrected Christ who calls us to follow Him and to serve our fellowman. Many years ago Peter confessed Christ as the Author of final truth when he burst out in his memorable confession, “Lord, to whom shall we go? thou hast the words of eternal life” (Jn. 6:68). This same Christ who calls us has not promised us an easy road, but He has promised us a meaningful one.

But having said this, one of our major questions is, How are we to operate within a brotherhood whose claim is a faith in Christ? The specific questions that I want to raise are related to the analysis and solution of the big questions of our time. They are thereby also related to the consequent relationships that emerge within the human community, and more specifically, the community of Christian believers.

Group Adaptability

At this point I want to illustrate the human problem of group adaptability with an analogy out of my experiences as a biologist. One of the facts of natural history is that some plant and animal populations survive environmental changes while other populations become extinct. In fact, a natural population of living organisms cannot survive in the face of new environmental stresses unless it in some way adaptively changes to meet these new stresses. Each population faces two main problems: (1) how to generate new variability, which in natural populations is accomplished mainly by new mutations, and (2) how to spread these new beneficial mutations throughout the population with maximum effectiveness.

Populations risk great danger of ultimate extinction if all organisms are essentially alike, especially if there is no mechanism for generating the spread of new and adaptively beneficial mutations throughout that population. Now one strategic effect of a new beneficial mutation in a given organism is to increase the flexibility of that population. Furthermore, unless a population has a mechanism for spreading favorable mutations, its genetic structure may not alter rapidly enough to cope with any new environmental stresses. For example, a good recent case is the houseflies which had the adaptability to resist DDT. Such flies survived spraying, reproduced, and now certain strains of flies can take the undiluted stuff! The point is simple: if a population cannot change, it will become extinct.

I contend that this analogy closely parallels church groups (or for that matter, any structured organization). One essential characteristic for group survival is adaptability and this adaptability is in some way correlated with new ideas that trickle into the thinking—the philosophy—of the group.

No one doubts that church groups face difficult and complex questions (e.g., big cities, the race question, war, poverty, disease, old age, hunger, pollution, technocracy and automation, the population explosion, adequate and relevant witness to Christ, witness and protest to the government, the generation gap, theological dogmatism, genetic control of living things, especially humans, God—His being and relationship to the world of nature, etc.). Our environment rapidly and often unpredictably changes at an increasing and frequently alarming rate. The question now is whether the group structure of the church can be such that its resident faith in Christ can absorb new ideas, incorporate these new ideas within the matrix of old ideas already operative within the group, and face these difficult questions honestly and without self-destruction.

Social analysts, especially those of the New Left, claim that the church is a monolithic, sprawling dinosaur so rigidly rooted to a belief system that it is essentially unadaptable. For many, the church, at least as a visible institution, is extinct. Only the fossilized bones (big church institutions) are around as a mute witness to a former life of engagement.

Ask Big Questions

I suggest that within the brotherhood, the followers of Christ must raise and seriously debate new ideas about the nature and function of the church and the mission of the Christian in society. Furthermore, we must at least try to offer tentative answers to the pressing questions of our time which I raised earlier in this discussion.

We must somehow generate the dynamics of a fluid, yet

Carl S. Keener is Assistant Professor of Botany, and Chairman of the University Mennonite Church at State College, State College, Pa.
deeply rooted brotherhood which regards its members as individuals—as THOU’S. I contend that if the Mennonite Church, or any church, is to survive the last third of the twentieth century, its members must willingly and honestly ask big questions and openly, without rancor, debate the answers. And then get swiftly to work. Moreover, the entire brotherhood must be engaged in this task.

There are those who fear new ideas because they wish to preserve a church life which attempts to keep our old ideas safe and uniform. But remember that if populations of plants or animals are too uniform, they may become extinct because they are unable to cope with the changes in the natural environment. We also have the problem of the wealth of the various ideas that come to us from other sources—both Christian and non-Christian.

When a person’s ideas seem to threaten our cherished beliefs, can we solve the problem by simply attaching the label “heretic” as some have done with Harvey Cox, author of the best-selling The Secular City? Furthermore, won’t our more intelligent and perceptive offspring rightfully demand an explanation for our judgments of orthodoxy and heresy?

In this connection I am reminded of a story Will Durant tells about Spinoza, the famous Jewish heretic. Spinoza had just been excommunicated and moreover, narrowly missed being murdered by some pious ruffian. Whereupon, as Durant tells it, Spinoza concluded, “... there are few places in this world where it is safe to be a philosopher, [and] he went to live in a quiet attic room on the Ouder-dek road outside Amsterdam. ... His host and hostess were Christians of the Mennonite sect, and could in some measure understand a heretic. They liked his sad kind face (those who have suffered much become very bitter or very gentle), and were delighted when, occasionally, he would come down of an evening, smoke his pipe with them, and tune his talk to their simple strain.”

Tentative Answers

In this article I shall not discuss possible mechanisms for generating new ideas that are preliminary answers to the big questions. The big questions of our time need to be asked. Beyond this, we need to give tentative answers. If an answer has a low adaptive value (i.e., it doesn’t help the church be salt and light), it should be dropped or altered. Furthermore, determining the adaptive value of suggested answers to big questions is a fascinating and necessary area for further analysis, but I shall say no more about this pressing problem here. Now given that we do get new ideas, we need to get at the question about the effective communication and dissemination of these new ideas.

First, we need more critical debate in our church periodicals. Too many articles are bland rearrangements of good ideas relevant a generation ago, but which have little adaptive worth for our time. At the present time, I seriously doubt whether Mennonite periodicals (and here I mean periodicals aimed at the broad spectrum of Mennonites, not the technical or specialized publications) could print analytical articles on biblical hermeneutics, new theological currents, situation ethics, the crisis of our population explosion, issues between science and religion, etc. (For example, there has been much recent literature about the reputed death of God, yet for some reason our papers have not come up with a serious analytical paper about this theological school.)

Stephen Toulmin once suggested that great intellectual advances take place not at the interface of great age and great mystery, but rather at that period of time when young men hammer out their own elements of a philosophy, one compounded with mixtures of transmitted insights, wisdom, and knowledge, plus that which is new and original insight.

If Toulmin is right, then we need to care for those who are young enough to have visions. Certainly young people tend to absorb many new (and current) ideas into their philosophical belief structure. Should the older (and wiser) brethren take no interest in the present-day intellectual currents which may become part of the fabric of the value system of the next generation, then we have ourselves to blame if the young people drift away.

We cannot prevent them from reading and believing what they want to, but we can have discussions with them on the big questions of our time. Yet how can we discuss if we are ignorant, or worse, don’t really care? This is one reason why our church periodicals need to keep analyzing the thought patterns of our time—to help all of us to wrestle realistically and effectively with the current issues in faith and conduct.

Small Congregations

Second, I suggest that revisions in the typical Sunday morning worship service be tried. The function of the sermon might have had great worth in a legalistic church structure in which congregational power was concentrated in the hands of a few usually ordained men. However, if the Mennonite Church takes seriously the concept of the priesthood of all believers, then no one man holds the locus of power. Certainly if the members of a church are to intimately know each other, the effective size of the congregation must be small.

In such a group the traditional sermon could well be a sermon-discussion in which the leader would address the group on a question and then have a follow-up period of congregational engagement in discussion. In this approach, ideas can be disseminated much more rapidly and effectively than if a group were to have only one speaker.

Moreover, we are facing the great embarrassment of a low salaried or non-salaried ministry in our brotherhood. It is grossly unfair to expect the ordained minister to be a pastor, counselor, theologian, and preacher, all wrapped up in one man, and then expect him to do his task well, especially if he has to work at some other occupation in addition to caring for his family of five. Or we pay him a poverty wage of $4,000 and then cannot understand why he doesn’t do more.

I say we are not fair to our Mennonite pastors when we expect them to earn their living in a factory or on a farm, nourish their congregation with carefully prepared sermons, visit their flock, and be family men besides. Consequently, nothing gets done right—the flock is seldom visited, the sermons are slapdash concoctions of anecdotes ("what happened to me last week"), rip-roaring admonitions to be good ("avoid mixed bathing"), etc.

As a church we're going to have to face the increasing difficulty to get dedicated men to be pastors. We can either evolve great big congregations of 2,000 members and pay the minister a good salary of $12,000 a year, or we could aim to form small groups and rework the functions of the ordained men. A pastor in such a setting could be the catalyst (i.e., a person who speeds up and enhances person-to-person interactions) in the local population of Christians. He could give counsel, chair the group meetings, etc. But the teaching, the sermon-discussion, could well be handled by dedicated laymen.

A congregation in which all earn a living at some occupation (including the pastor) would free the congregation of an embarrassing salary problem. Yet the pastor would have more time for his pastoral care if the congregation in a significant way would share the pastoral responsibilities. At any rate, all members of the congregation must be engaged in witness, in discipline, in the spiritual nurture and growth of the members.

Increasingly, the pastor will have to be the catalyst in the life of the congregation. He simply cannot be everything—preacher, teacher, confidant, pastor, leader, judge, family man, etc. We must find ways to more effectively and actively involve all members in the initiation and dissemination of new ideas, and in active witnessing, or many will silently drift away from us. One thing is clear to me: the Mennonite Church needs pastors, not more preachers.

Small Groups

A third way to effectively disseminate new ideas is through small discussion groups. While the traditional Sunday school discussion does this, too often the short period of time, the distractions of other classes, and the general scattered and flaky approach reduces its effectiveness. Core groups of a dozen or fewer individuals could meet in homes for prayer, fellowship, sharing mutual concerns, serious discussion of a topic or book, or even communion.

As I see it, three major operational problems confront us: (1) generating new ideas that are tentative answers to our problems, (2) determining the adaptive worth of these new ideas, and (3) effectively disseminating new ideas that help the church be salt and light. In brief, one of our major problems is to find ways to accept and activate a pluralistic brotherhood while being single-mindedly devoted to Christ. As John Krumm expressed it, "The orthodox Christian, confident that life is fundamentally an encounter with a personal God, is of all men the most flexible, the most resilient, least likely to be overwhelmed in despair or reduced to panic when favorite doctrines and ideas must be discarded or radically altered."

What really did Paul mean when he said, "I have become all things to all men..."?

A Hard Night's Day

By Ruth Kehr

It was a decisive moment! At 11:00 p.m., Wednesday, November 5, Bethel Mennonite Community Church agreed that its nursery school activities would close at the end of the following day. A community pressure group had threatened violence to life and property if we did not agree to cooperate with their proposed program. (See background in Gospel Herald, November 25, 1969, page 1035.)

To think of all the details in planning an abrupt final day was almost overwhelming. What could we say to parents? Though difficult, spoken communication seemed most helpful. Parents' questions could be discussed and on-the-spot reactions would be known. I would phone those who did not bring or call for their children. Just one more day would take us through the week, and parents would have the weekend to make other arrangements.

Up to this point our discussions with the Midwest Day Care Center Board were considered an internal problem to be handled by the church council, the nursery's governing body. Parents, with the exception of several who were either church or staff members, did not know about the conflict. Indeed, it was not until October 21 that the council was faced with threat tactics. Waverings confidence was beginning to topple. Could parent involvement help after this stalemate in relationships had been reached? It was not invited.

What could we say to the children? We all sensed a growing awareness that this could be our last day together! Will we tell the children that they won't be coming back tomorrow? They would be sure to ask why. How could they understand the feelings and dealings that unexpectedly invaded their world? Our closing inevitably brought some wonderings in the wilderness. One mother has had five different babysitters to care for her four- and five-year-olds. Several parents have their children in the third nursery school since November 6.

Several months have passed since November 6. Uncertainties still remain. But many of us have experienced a new awareness of our mission field around Bethel. The challenge of militant blacks has no easy answers.

Gratitude is expressed for the prayers of all our friends who shared in these trying weeks. Please continue!

What Did Jesus Say About Killing People?

By Don Blosser

Matthew 5:21-26

"It is flatly impossible to find any statement in the New Testament which forbids war. The attempts of some people to say that the Old Testament ethic permits war, but the New Testament does not is totally unfair to Scripture. We believe there can be only one point of view to Scripture and both the Old and the New Testament must agree on all points. If the Old Testament permitted God's people (Israel) to go to war in His name, then it must be quite obvious that the New Testament will also permit God's people (the church) to participate in war."

How does that sound to you? This is a direct quote taken from a church periodical of another denomination that was accidently put in my mailbox a number of years ago. It was a special article written by a teacher on the matter of "War & Killing From the Biblical Point of View." As Mennonites have understood the Word of God, these statements are completely off base, but I would like to use them to begin with a few questions.

Several Basic Questions

Does the Old Testament always agree with the New Testament on how the child of God should live? What do you do if they don't agree? Pick the one you like best?

Where does a person start in interpreting the Bible? This article assumes that you start on page one, which would of course be Genesis and simply proceed from there.

Is it really true that war in the Old Testament was God's will?

Is it really correct to say that there is no statement in the New Testament forbidding war for the Christian?

Old Testament Teaching

In one place the Old Testament prophets said a day will come when nations "shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more; but they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig tree, and none shall make them afraid . . ." (Mic. 4:3, 4).

Don Blosser, Akron, Pa., is pastor of the Akron Mennonite Church.

Jesus, several hundred years later said, "When you hear of wars and rumors of wars, do not be alarmed; this must take place, but the end is not yet. For nation will rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom. . . . this is but the beginning of the sufferings" (Mk. 13:7).

In John 16:2 He goes even further and says the day is going to come "when whoever kills you will think he is offering service to God." This happened during the Reformation, but you don't have to go nearly that far back in history for examples. Martin Luther King was killed by a man who was convinced he was serving God by getting rid of a terrible anti-Christian communist. Jesus is making it very clear that if you take the call to be Christian seriously, somebody may not like it and will try to kill you.

Throughout history, the attitude of the Christian church in general toward war has been one of the great hindrances to its world mission. Charles Wells, a Quaker theologian and writer, made the comment that the Christian church has always assumed that the angels who announced the birth to the shepherds on the hillside might have been good singers, but they were the worst theologians in history — imagine — talking about peace on earth. He goes on to say there is something very unusual about the Christians who keep trying to get people to follow the Prince of Peace while they themselves go about killing people. Wells suggests that if we gave medals for killing people throughout history the Christians would have 90 percent of the gold ones — and don't forget, we are supposed to be the good guys!

Christ's Statements

What is Christ all about when it comes to killing people? Look at some biblical passages: Luke 22:35-38: Jesus is nearing the end of His life, and they are on their way to the garden when we have this conversation: "Then Jesus said to them, 'When I sent you out that time without purse, bag, or shoes, did you lack anything?' 'Not a thing,' they answered. 'But now,' Jesus said, 'whoever has a purse or a bag must take it; and whoever does not have a sword must sell his coat and buy one. For I tell you this: the scripture that says, "He was included with the criminals," must come true about me..." The disciples said, 'Look! Here are two swords, Lord!' 'That is enough!' He answered."*

These people who do not accept the nonresistant position look on this passage and literally rub their hands with glee, saying this proves Jesus was not a pacifist; He was telling His followers to sell their coats and buy a sword to defend themselves.

What did Jesus mean? We do a great injustice to Jesus when we do not permit Him any sense of humor. He had just pointed out that when they went out at His command they got along quite well, and now He is pointing out the futility of armed resistance when He suddenly discovers that the disciples are not joking, they think He is dead serious and they immediately and rather proudly produce two swords. The words of Jesus "That is enough" could not possibly mean that these two swords are adequate, because they would be facing the temple guard, a rather good-sized regiment of armed men, so it would be like taking on the Philadelphia National Guard with single-shot pistols, it is rather ridiculous.

Then a few hours later when Peter draws one of the swords to defend Christ, Jesus tells him to put it away. The whole point of the passage is that even in difficult times when self-defense would seem permissible, Jesus says no. The way of Christian love for your enemies is not to be practiced only when your enemies are 2,000 miles away and the U.S. army stands between you and them. It is to be practiced even when they are in the process of knocking down your front door.

A second passage is found in John 2:14-16. In the temple one day He found men selling cattle, sheep, and pigeons and a number of racketeers in the banking business. "He made a whip from cords and drove all the animals out of the Temple, both the sheep and the cattle; he overturned the tables of the money-changers and scattered their coins; and he ordered the men who sold pigeons, 'Take them out of here! Do not make my Father's house a market place!' "

I would only like to point out several things from this passage, for it is often used as proof that Jesus did believe in violence, for He drove the money changers out etc., with a whip, so they say.

First of all, we should never confuse nonresistance or pacifism with passivism. A true nonresistant person is not one who simply withholds from life — he is one who is actively involved with the affairs of life, trying to bring peace to the warring factions of life as we find it. Jesus was anything but a quiet, mild, unemotional man, and the setting up of all these things in the temple was both a worship problem and a race problem. This marketplace was the area designated for Gentile worship and the Jews had simply forced them out, so they had no place to worship God, and since the Jews were also the law of the land there was no court of appeals.

Jesus came in, saw this terrible injustice, which was illegal according to both spiritual and governmental laws, and took definite action. He made a little braided whip and drove them out of the temple. The Greek sentence here obviously refers to the sheep and the cattle. In the process of this action, tables were upset and in general quite a mess was created in the temple courtyard.

Nonresistance Is Not Cheap

Now, what does that say to us? Nonresistance should never be used as an excuse to get out of something. Nonresistance should never be twisted around to mean I cannot get involved and work to correct the evils of society. For example, I believe it is genuinely Christian to boycott a store that sells liquor along with the groceries, or war toys along with basketballs and baseballs, even if it means paying a slightly higher price for your food products at another store. After all, Christian commitment does not start with what helps us get by the most cheaply. I believe also that noncooperation with the draft is a very valid Christian position to take, provided again that you are not using it to get out of something and that you are prepared to accept the consequences of that action.

You see, Jesus is telling us that not killing someone goes far beyond just not pulling the trigger when the gun is aimed at someone. It means being part of the whole system whose obvious and publicly expressed goal is the removal of people who are (for the present at least) designated the enemy.

This is one reason, for example, why Mennonites have traditionally refused the I-A-O classification which would make you part of the army, but would give you a noncombatant job such as driving an ambulance or working in an office. In doing this, you become part of the total war machine. This is also why a growing number of young men are taking the path of noncooperation, because they believe the Selective Service System is also part of the total American war machine.

Just one more passage — and that is from John 15:12, 13: "This is my commandment: love one another, just as I love you. The greatest love a man can have for his friends is to give his life for them."

Here again is a passage used to give honor and glory to our soldiers. Just this past summer President Nixon quoted this passage as he made a presentation to a widow of a soldier killed in Vietnam. The only problem is that it doesn't apply to that kind of situation. Any visit to any army base will quickly show you that men there are not being trained to die gracefully for their friends. They are being trained to kill effectively and quickly, before they themselves are killed.

Now, I would be the first to acknowledge the courage, fighting ability, and training of the United States Army. I believe they are probably among the best in the world. And I would also immediately recognize the tremendous sacrifice the American government demands from their servicemen. I believe this was pointed out again by these four American women who flew to Paris to ask the North Vietnamese to tell them if they were wives or widows. This is a kind of pressure and sacrifice very few of us are acquainted with. Is it right for any young man who says I cannot kill to make any less of a sacrifice? Can a Christian honestly look around him to find a I-W or VS job which will permit him to get home every three months, or to take his car and wife along to his place of employment?

I believe a proper interpretation of John 15 would have the nonresistant Christian say, "I will not go to Vietnam and kill," but then he should immediately add, "I will volunteer my services through MCC or other appropriate channels to go to Vietnam and risk my life for those who are suffering, or I will go to Biafra and help those who are starving."

I can get angry when an administrator in one of our church offices tells me of a mother who wrote him saying, "Please do not place my son in Cleveland or Chicago, but give him a job someplace where he will not get hurt." I can just see General Creighton Abrams in Vietnam reading a letter from a mother whose son has just been drafted — "Please don't send my son where he may get hurt!"

The nonresistant Christian position will mean that I may get killed for what I believe, but the Bible clearly teaches that there is something much worse than death.

Let's back up now and have a quick summary of what has been said in the form of some possible implications for our day. (1) The Christian ought to be willing to lead out in correcting the wrongs of society. Certainly there is much more to the gospel than just trying to stop wars; but Jesus Himself did much more than just say, "Please don't kill anybody." He was actively engaged in correcting the injustices put upon men here on earth.

(2) No nonresistant Christian could ask for the protection of the army for his own benefit. It would be quite un-Christlike for the nonresistant Christian to call for army helicopters and gunships to rescue him from danger during an attack by the enemy. It is also wrong for me to inwardly support the Vietnam war here at home, hoping the government can win a big victory there so my nonresistance will never be tested here.

(3) And admittedly this is a rough one. Even though the army pays a salary, I believe the only position for the nonresistant Christian would be one that involves some form of sacrifice, such as VS or Pax. It might even involve risk of personal safety. Since the risk of loss of life is very real in the American army, should not risk of loss of life in the army of Jesus Christ also be a reality? Personal safety or financial security should never be the guideline for Christian commitment. This would mean also that if the day should ever come when the U.S. government drops the draft, our youth service programs would continue. We serve not because the government says we must, but because Christ has called us and redeemed us for the ministry of reconciliation. It will be very interesting to see if we can hear the call of Christ as clearly as we hear the call of Uncle Sam.

Wherever in history there has been a genuine reformation that even for a little while lifted the church to be a cleansing and transforming agency in society, at its heart has lain one thing: the rediscovery of Jesus.

Men at Work

By Samuel R. Burgoyne

We shall miss Ben when he leaves us next week on the completion of a three-year period of service. His name could be Dick or Ed or Jim or a score of other names, for he is typical of the pleasant, hardworking youth whom we bunch together as Paxmen.

They come, usually a little shyly, into our language school in Katmandu, eager to study Nepali, to learn about the country and people from the orientation lectures and reading materials, and to prepare for work in close touch with the people of the Himalayan kingdom. In moments of leisure they cycle through the narrow streets of the capital. They are intrigued by the friendly people and the bewildering differences of types and dress. All these, against a background of tiered pagodas and gold-covered stupas, form an exotic and colorful picture.

Three months of concentration on Nepali soon pass, and Tom, Ken, or Stan moves out to the low-lying terai area or the mountains on his assignment. It may be backbreaking work in a rock tunnel, part of a power project for the growing town of Butwal. His duties may involve him in training nationals in automechanics. There is a hospital being built in a remote mountain area, a four-hour climb from a primitive airstrip; and our young man may be responsible for supplies, planning, training of local farmers as masons or carpenters, and the actual building work.

Yes, we shall miss Ben and all his tribe, for they have made a tremendous contribution to work for God in a challenging situation. Quiet, cheerful, and industrious, they have often lived hard under difficult conditions. Their dedicated service has been a true Christian testimony, and a demonstration of deep faith in Jesus Christ. The United Mission to Nepal shall welcome more such committed Christians to follow in their footsteps.

Peacemaker in Action

After being confronted anew with the criticalness of the present racial conflict, and with the Christian mandate to break down barriers, I prayed that God would show me ways in which I might witness to the oneness of all men under God. The next day I found it necessary to fill out a form. The question, "Race?" hit me! Should I bow down to this totally irrelevant, but racist-oriented question? I could not! I wrote in bold letters, Human, with the firm decision that if this answer was insufficient, I would stand ready to allow my application to be refused.—Albert Zehr.
The Grace of God

By Marcus Lind

Titus 2:11-14

The subject of this text is The Grace of God. For this occasion I shall define grace as "that quality in God that caused Him to come down and love the unlovable." The text divides into four parts: (1) The Salvation of Grace, (2) The Teaching of Grace, (3) The Hope of Grace, (4) The Discipline of Grace.

The Salvation of Grace

"The grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men" (verse 11). The salvation of grace as used here has three dimensions: from God to man, from man to God, and from man to man. From "God to man" it is a heartbroken Jesus pouring out His lifeblood for those who were yet in their sin and rebellion against God. His love was sufficient to make the supreme sacrifice that will penetrate man's rebelliousness and woo him unto Himself.

From "man to God" grace is the rebound of His love in us which causes a willing response to Him. "We love him, because he first loved us" (1 Jn. 4:19). There is no quality that will move men to action like the power of suffering love. God demonstrated that power by breaking through man's highest love expression, to lay down life for a friend, and initiate a greater dimension of love that will lay down life for an enemy—"in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us" (Jn. 15:13; Rom. 5:8). To withhold response to such a love is the worst sin of which man can be guilty.

From "man to man" is the only tangible means to reciprocate the grace of God, and in that vein I use this text to welcome this assembled conference. We are drawn together from east to west by ties of Christian brotherhood on the proposition that "if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another." His love found us, and because He so loved us, we also love. That will put a warmth and glow into our mutual give-and-take, a fellowship that is superior to all secular gatherings which are not founded on the love of God. We westerners are noted for our unpolished outspokenness. We say what we think, and act the way we feel; but you will note a quality of sincerity in our hospitality, although it is possibly less refined than the more sedate variety of our eastern brotherhood. We hope that you will like these qualities, and receive them as an informal gesture of the matchless grace of God.

The Teaching of Grace

"Teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world" (verse 12). Like every good teacher, grace has both a negative and a positive aspect. We are to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts. When Peter denied, he declared, "I know not the man," and vouched for his denial with all the vehemence of his very impetuous spirit, though for a wrong cause. How very pertinent that for a righteous cause, our lives should flatly deny that which we see and hear on every side in this contemporary world!

Such a denial leads to a positive approach: that we should live soberly—attitude toward self, righteously—attitude toward others, and godly—attitude toward God. If one were able to add these three words together and divide them by three, the net result would be a Christian humility like that defined in Rom. 12:3: "For I say, through the grace given unto me, to every man that is among you, not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think; but to think soberly, according as God hath dealt to every man the measure of faith." Soberity is used here as an antidote to thinking of one's self too highly. It is the basis for righteousness toward others that involves its subjects in open transparentness which breaks through every barrier to gracious communication with others. With that spirit we further extend our welcome to this conference.

The Hope of Grace

"Looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ" (verse 13). The word blessed as used in the King James Bible has no adequate synonym in the English language. Modern translators have hurt their versions by trying to improve its meaning. Here it gives an added touch to the most optimistic of the spiritual graces—the Christian's hope. And hope is directly related to that star in the future horizon which never diminishes in radiance, "the glorious appearing of . . . Jesus Christ." Against the dark background of this present world it shines the more brilliantly to open a vista into the eternities where Christ Himself is the light.

The Discipline of Grace

"Who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works" (verse 14). As long as we dwell in bodies of flesh and blood we need to be concerned about redemption. While it is quite normal to think of our beloved church as a body of redeemed people, do we take too much for granted in this? The Philippian believers, though in a high state of spirituality, were admonished to work out their own salvation with fear and trembling. As

Marcus Lind, Salem, Ore., presented this devotional service at the opening session of Mennonite General Conference, Turner, Ore., Aug. 15, 1969.
It Wonders Me

The Pennsylvania Dutch have an apt expression, used to indicate surprise or that they have difficulty understanding some act or situation. They say, "It wonders me that ..."

Standing at the beginning of a new year with all its challenge and uncertainty there is a natural inclination to both reflect and project. Out of my reveries come some puzzles, and, perchance, some personal exposures. Entering 1970 "it wonders me . . ."

— that God is so patient with His erring, bungling, arrogant children and that He continues to shower upon us the many blessings we enjoy.

— that the Christian community, Catholic and Protestant, has come so far in mutual acceptance in recent years.

— that the U.S. can spend over twenty-five billion dollars per annum in a questionable war while at the same time there are schools in our nation which may need to shut down, or shorten their courses, for the lack of a few millions of dollars.

— that church-related people have such largely increased incomes, yet giving to missionary causes is reduced.

— that the church speaks so softly about man's basic alienation from God and man—his sin.

— that persons who are innovative and progressive in their secular activities can be rigidly against change in the church.

— that frequently the little church, of less than 100 members, is more sure of denominational error than its larger counterparts.

— that pastoral leaders having the most limited theological training are the first to "detect" the theological and program fallacies of their church family.

— that churches must put up with stodgy, old-fashioned, and outdated leadership which would kill any business.

— that churches are so miserly in regard to pastors' compensations, forgetting the adage "you get what you pay for."

— that once having established an administrative or program function in our church family, local, state, or national, we find it almost impossible to scrap it for a greater priority in a changing world.

— that some who give little, or no financial support to our united work feel they have an a priori right to determine its policies.

— that people continue subscribing to newspapers or magazines whose reporting and editorials they often reject, but are insistent that a denominational publication be thrown out if it does not fully agree with their social or theological perspectives.

— that many who urge the church to be a "change agent" find their only comfortable place in a church which least needs their influence in order to change.

— that those who seemingly couldn't "make it" in local church leadership are occasionally selected to serve in positions of state or national leadership.

— that denominational leadership can be so frequently insensitive to "grass roots" feeling.

— that those who talk the most about sensitivity are often the most insensitive persons.

— that we make great pronouncements about the killing in Vietnam (and we should!), but are so silent about the liquor-induced highway deaths and cancer-producing cigarette smoking.

— that some can be so much for national and international peace and yet act so utterly inhumane in personal, office, or business relations.

— that parents demand that their children do not experiment with drugs while they themselves tip the glass or light up their Camel, Marboro, or Kent, they themselves being hooked on what were their most daring teenage experiments.

— that the church survives in spite of all its public and private criticism and our lack of concerned dedication.

Finally "It wonders me" that this should be written and what the response will be.

What Am I?

By Nina Walter

"What is this?" I asked the two-year-old who was just beginning to learn the names of things.

She took the watch I handed her and turned it over and over. "Shiny," she said.

"What is it?" I repeated.

She tried to bite it and said, "Hard." She held it to her ear and said, "Tick-tick." Finally I told her its name and smiled at the little song she made of it.

Her brother trying to confuse her, asked, "What is a watch?"

She answered instantly, "Shiny tick-tick."

After their play carried them somewhere else, I thought about the question, What is a watch? Is it the shiny case that holds the works? Is it the works inside the case? Is it the principle that makes the works work?

My musings led me to another question: What am I? Like the watch, I have a case. I have works inside the case. And there is a principle that makes the works work. Like the watch, I am more than a shiny tick-tick. Also, like the watch, I am not self-created. There is a principle that makes me function, and there is a Creator of that principle. In short, there is God, and I am His creation.

Just for today I will be happy. This assumes that what Abraham Lincoln said is true, that "most folks are about as happy as they make up their minds to be." Happiness is from within; it is not a matter of externals.

The Importance of Right Attitudes

By Christian E. Charles

An attitude may be defined as an emotionally charged response to a stimulus. It is the way a person looks at life. Our attitudes are our real person. It is the way you feel about anything. It is your emotional reaction to people and happenings around you. They reveal your beliefs. If your attitudes are right, your mind and heart will be open. If they are not, they will be closed and you cannot grow spiritually. It is a cause for much spiritual immaturity.

Right attitudes are necessary for balanced living. We largely make our own experience. It isn't so much what happens to you that is important as it is how you react to it. The same experience may cause one person only temporary difficulty; yet occasion a nervous breakdown in another. We establish either a positive or a negative attitude toward life and it is that which influences every thought and act.

There are three distinct attitudes in which the soul may be found in reference to the dealings of God, namely: subjection, consent, and rejoicing. When the will is broken, there is subjection. When the understanding is enlightened as to the divine object, there is consent. When the affections are engaged with God Himself, there is rejoicing.

This book contains miniature summaries of the history of each Ohio congregation. They are too brief to provide anything but a historical sketch. The author has done an excellent job with the scanty material he was provided with. He has captured well the general moods and movements of the conference. The book can serve as a kind of directory of churches and clergy of the Ohio and Eastern conference. If there is any criticism of this book, it is merely that the author was asked to cram far too much history into one volume. Because of this space factor important developments in mission, in evangelism and social concerns are missing. It should be in Mennonite church libraries. —Vern Miller.

Sleeper points out that black power is an attempt on the part of blacks to share some of the power that whites have possessed through the years. He attaches significance to the need for positive response on the part of white Christians. There is an examination of the background of Black Power, and further explanation as to how it can show the gospel of Christ in a new and meaningful way. His points are theologically based and do not leave room for excuses for those who profess Christianity.

This book is divided into three parts, in which the author examines concretely, objectively, theologically, and sociologically the concepts of Christian ethics, and Christian community as the basis for responsible Christian social action. This book is a must for all churches. —John Powell.

In American society extremism has always been provoked by times of crisis. Extremists are identified as “those who pursue their goals by unlawful, unjust, or extravagant means, whether against the power structure, in defense of the power structure, or against another group in society.” Commonly we label extremism either to the right or left.

Famous extremists in American history include Roger Williams, Samuel Adams, Tom Paine, Henry Lloyd Garrison, Horace Greeley, Carrie Nation, Eugene Debs, Joseph McCarthy, Carl McIntyre, H. Rap Brown, etc. Among the extremist movements are the Salem witch trials, the Molly Maguires, K.K.K., Know-Nothing Party, I.W.W., John Birch Society, S.D.S., and Black Muslims.

This historical treatment helps the reader understand the influence of these gadflies in American society. Extremists keep society from being too complacent; if they are sound, they spearhead reform and progress. It is important to be tolerant of extremism, either right or left, and to distinguish between goals and methods. —Harold D. Lehman.

This book gives a sometimes neglected picture of missionary living in a foreign country. It shows a lively, fun-loving family taking interest in all the unusual and usual happenings about them. The J. T. Seamands spent 20 years as missionaries in South India for the Methodist Church. Mrs. Seamands writes of their experiences, and those of their four daughters, with personal intimacy and enthusiasm as she would use with a close friend. The reader is shown the humor and pathos in the encounters between two cultures which are very different. The warm appreciation for other peoples and mutual inspiration through Christian faith and living which are found in this book make worthwhile, delightful reading. —Evelyn Bauer.

Still Hungry in America, by Robert Coles. Illustrated by Al Clayton. World Publishing Company. 1969. 115 pp. $6.95 (cloth), $2.95 (paper).

This book presents the cry of the hungry in affluent America. Pictures on nearly every page vividly present the story to the eyes of the reader. The quotes given by hungry persons touch the heart of the reader. The author and illustrator have done a tremendous job of presenting the heart cry of the poverty-stricken in this great nation. One quote:

“From day to day I think to myself that God will stop it. I think He’ll come down here and say something that will make a difference hereabouts. He’ll tell the people that they should stop doing like they do to one another, and they should hear His Word, and go do likewise. But until He comes, I’m afraid we’re going to die all the time, way before it’s time. I’ve lost three before they were born. I’ve lost two before they were a year. I’ve lost two old enough—I thought—to live, to be full grown, the same as me and their father did. Yes, I’ve got me the six here who are still living, but let me tell you, I can never wake up in the morning without wondering whether we’ll make it, one of us, or all of us, until sundown. And that’s the truth.”

Stories of mothers walking miles to the hospital for their baby to be delivered, to be simply told they can’t stay. If they try to stay, they are forcibly ejected. The pictures of empty refrigerators and attempts being made to prepare some food are most touching. The pictures of nice-looking little girls whose faces are covered with sores and scabs, the pictures of the little infants with the navel hernias, and the pictures of mothers with five little hungry children, some with no clothes except a diaper. The pictures of five children in a dingy bedroom with nothing but two beds, the pictures of children with sores all over their backs, the pictures of adults with teeth so badly formed and misplaced, and only a few left, the pictures of sad-looking children who seemingly cannot smile, and then to see in contrast the smile of the little child with the bowl and spoon at his mouth who has food to eat. The cry of the hungry is heart-rending!

Every affluent American home, especially those of affluent Mennonites, ought to have a copy of this book on their living room table. It ought to be read by all, and the guests who frequent the homes as well. One cannot but be deeply moved when he reads this. Should be available in church libraries. —John E. Lapp.

Hallelujah Chariot was the nickname by which the preacher’s new 1917 Model T touring car was christened. This story, however, is not about the automobile but about the preacher and his family. Written by a daughter, it is a lively, heartwarming and often exciting account of Andrew Hendricks’ life. It begins with his youth in Minnesota and his near fatal illness and miraculous recovery. Hendricks went to California for the sake of his health at age 17. How he became converted, his courtship and marriage to Fawn, and his call to ministry in the Nazarene church all set the stage for the remarkable story of Papa, Mamma, the five children and their frequent guests in the parsonage.

Although the setting of this account is Los Angeles in the early 1900’s the tensions involving this family sound strangely familiar. There were the same feelings about preachers’ kids; worldliness and dress were big issues. But most of all the Hendricks family relished life and enjoyed the Lord’s service. Highly recommended as an enriching reading experience. —Harold D. Lehman.

A tall, lanky Baptist preacher on Hollywood’s Sunset Strip began on Christmas morning a cross-country walk to Washington, D.C., carrying an 80-pound wooden cross.

The Rev. Arthur Blessitt, founder of "His Place" to minister to hippies, drug addicts, and other disadvantaged youth in Hollywood, said he made no announcement in advance of his departure because he didn’t want the complications of undue publicity.

The 3,000-mile hike will end July 18 in the capital where Blessitt expects 500,000 people to gather around the Washington Monument for a "Which Way America?" prayer rally. It will begin with a 24-hour period of silent prayer and fasting for a national turning to God. Each person attending is asked to bring "a Bible, a flower, love, and two gifts— one to give to someone needy in Washington and the other to place on the lawn of the U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare headquarters so the government agency can distribute it a poor family."

The 29-year-old Southern Baptist clergyman urged fellow ministers to keep their churches open July 18 and 19 for prayer services. He asked also that during the six weeks of the walk Christians everywhere pray one hour each day and make it their business to help needy families in their communities.

"Let’s give Jesus a chance!” Blessitt told the crowd gathered for the send-off. "We have walloped too long in negative analysis. Now it’s time for positive action!”

Forty-two percent of the U.S. adults in 1969 attended church in a typical week, 7 percent less than in 1958, the Gallup Poll reported.

Attendance at worship steadily declined over the 11-year period, the survey organization said. The 1969 percentage was down a point from 1968. A high of 49 percent came in 1955 and 1958.

Gallup reported that the falloff was twice as great among Roman Catholics as among Protestants. The Catholic decline was from 74 percent adult attendance in 1958 to 63 percent in 1969.

The Protestant drop was from 43 percent in 1958 to 37 percent in 1969.

Young people today studying for the Christian ministry have a wide divergence of opinion concerning the nature of God, according to Louis Garlinger who surveyed representative students in American theological seminaries for the Christian Science Monitor newspaper.

"I am more concerned with the purpose of God than with the nature of God,” a young woman from Harvard Divinity School asserted. For a student in Atlanta it was "hard to talk about God apart from His Son. God is a constant companion. I have a very personalistic concept of God. We have a little thing going, a very meaningful relationship.”

All in all, Garlinger discovered in his survey that the old anthropomorphic notion of Deity is "incredibly naive.”

Views of God ranged from "Father” to abstract "love.”

A black student said, "Only in the life of Jesus Christ do we really get to know who God is.” Said another, "I would view God through Christ.”

Not one of the students surveyed offered the opinion that God is dead.

Docking approved a restriction limiting all conscientious objectors working in state institutions to the minimum wage regardless of skills or positions held within the institution. This means $1.60 per hour or $282 per month for a full work schedule. The Governor reportedly said that if the conscientious objectors wanted pay commensurate with their skills that they should serve in the armed forces.

The November 12 vote of the council was 6-1 with Lt. Gov. James DeCoursey casting the one vote against the action. He was quoted in the Kansas City Times on November 13 as saying "it seems to me that we are saying nobody ought to be a conscientious objector as he is allowed under our legally constituted system.” But Governor Docking held to his argument that there should be some sort of penalty for refusing to serve in the armed forces. Some of the others voting with the Governor included the President Pro Tempore of the Kansas Senate, Glee Smith (R-Larned), and state Representative Bill Friebly (R-Abilene).

The action will have the effect of placing all conscientious objectors at Kansas State institutions under the title "conscientious objector” instead of the name of the position which they are in, thus automatically placing them at the bottom of the pay scale of that institution.

It is alleged by some that this is nothing less than economic discrimination on the basis of religious belief, and that it could have a chilling effect on the free expression of one’s religion.

A Catholic college has moved to quell student uncertainty about the Selective Service System by hiring a draft counselor.

Paul Frazier, a draft counselor for the New York Catholic Peace Fellowship, took his new post at Manhattan College in the Bronx, N.Y., on January 21. A graduate of Manhattan in 1967, he holds a master’s degree in social work from the University of Michigan.

Mr. Frazier, himself a conscientious objector, worked in Ann Arbor, Mich., both as a counselor and trainer of counselors. He is the coauthor of the Manual for Draft Training, a text used by counselors. Mr. Frazier is credited with training 150 counselors in the New York City area for the Catholic Peace Fellowship.

Brazil’s Protestant churches are increasing more than twice as fast as its population. According to figures recently released by the Missionary Information Bureau, the country has an annual population growth rate of 5 percent, while Protestant church membership is gaining at the rate of 6.7 percent each year.

After Indonesia, Brazil is said to have the fastest-growing church in the world; it now has 3,244,000 Protestants, more than double the number of Protestant church members in all other Latin American countries combined.

Two thirds of Brazil’s Protestants are Pentecostals from the fast-growing Assemblies of God, the Christian Congregation, the Brazil for Christ movement, and independent Pentecostal groups. Evangelistic emphasis is seen as the reason for the phenomenal rise of Pentecostal churches.

It is unlikely that the Japanese government will permit the Far East Broadcasting Company to continue operating when Okinawa is returned to Japan in 1972. FEBC said in its Communication Research Review in Hong Kong that existing Japanese broadcasting laws prohibit any religious stations on Japanese soil from transmitting religious programs to the China mainland.

Mennonite Central Committee
Looks at Its History and Role

"These past 50 years have been years of terrific upheaval worldwide, but they have also been years of forward movement on the part of Mennonite and Brethren in Christ churches," said William T. Snyder, executive secretary of the Mennonite Central Committee. "I am thankful to God for the good foundation which others laid during these 50 years, and for the continued vitality of our inter-Mennonite efforts through MCC.

The occasion for these remarks was the annual meeting of MCC in Chicago, Jan. 23, 24, during which the organization's 50th anniversary was commemorated.

Snyder noted that more than 4,500 persons have served under MCC during the past 50 years, and that the average age of MCC people in service has hung around 26 years.

"We within MCC are greatly challenged and stimulated as we attempt to administer a program in which the preponderant number of participants are young people," Snyder said. "While these young people are, on the whole, possessed with better training, broader knowledge, and a world view that is considerably above that of a generation ago, there is the same deep interest in the church.

"We have an assortment of idealistic, individualistic, and vocal young people who want to serve under the church but who also want the church to consider new approaches in blazing new trails with the old faith."

MCC service has been in areas of strife, rapid social change, and outright war, Snyder said. "I believe that MCC has maintained its servant stance during the past 50 years that have also seen growth in mission and service thrusts for the individual conference programs. "Our people have not been on the barricades in the political and social revolution, but there has been a quiet revolution in our churches with greater numbers of people getting involved in the acute problems of our times."

Noting some trends in recent years, Snyder lifted up sub-Saharan Africa as an example which best told the story of the shift in placing MCC personnel in less-developed countries. In 1960 there were 14 MCC volunteers below the Sahara; a decade later, the number stood at 222.

In his report to the committee, the executive secretary also observed that the formation of MCC (Canada) and the close working relationship between the Canadian and American churches is "one of the greatest causes for thanks within the last 50 years."

Nigeria Relief Plans
Linford Gehman MD, and Martha Bender, RN, two of the three-member Quaker-Mennonite Service team in the former Biafran territory, were freshly back in the States and attended the annual meeting. They left the Eastern territory for Sao Tome island only two weeks before.

Also with Gehman and Bender at the Chicago meeting was Roger Fredrickson of the American Friends Service Committee, the administrating partner of the Quaker-Mennonite Services. All three were given the opportunity to speak either about their experiences or future plans for rehabilitation and reconstruction in Federal Nigeria.

Fredrickson reminded the meeting that a new vocabulary is needed when referring to the present situation in Nigeria. "Biafra" is finished, he said, and the Ibos of that area are quite ready to move on into a new chapter.

"Throughout the past year, Quakers and Mennonites on both sides of the line in Nigeria have maintained what I call a low external visibility," Fredrickson said. "There have often been times when the press has approached us, wanting us to make statements with respect to the political situation. We have practiced restraint; we have tried to speak to the human condition and not to the political one.

"People like our QMS team developed a reputation for what I call high local reliability," the AFSC official continued. "And it is that which is going to point the way, for what we can do from this point on."

Fredrickson said that AFSC representatives have been in constant conversations with the Nigerian government in interpreting to them why Quakers and Mennonites felt that it was important for them to be working on both sides of the conflict.

"The evidence in thus far seems to be that this has been understood," he said.

Gehman gave a quick sketch of the QMS activities during its one year of operation. Miss Bender gave a brief testimony. "Some of you might say we had some hair-raising experiences. I don't feel it was all that bad. We got used to the war situation gradually. And all in all, we were very fortunate. We hope now to return as soon as possible," she said.

Meanwhile, MCC is strengthening its emergency relief team already operating in Nigeria. The annual meeting passed a budget which included a $150,000 figure for Nigeria, not including the Teachers Abroad Program financing.

MCC Projects into the '70s
"We should be able to continue the growth in number of persons serving in the Mennonite Central Committee as we move into the Seventies," said William T. Snyder. "We have moved from 368 persons in 1959 to 700 persons in 1969. The financial report would indicate that our income has grown in a commensurate manner," he said.

Plenary session of the MCC Annual Meeting, Jan. 23, 24, 1970

In light of such steady continuing expansion, the executive secretary and the various departmental directors submitted projections for 1970.

After reviewing all phases of MCC’s ministry, the committee approved the following program projections:

Overseas

- Two Paxmen to begin agriculture work in the Peloponnesus, Greece.
- To set up an Eastern Europe trainee program, especially for Polish and Yugoslavian young people, who would receive wages instead of pocket money, and receive orientation separate from other trainees.
- To enter into a new agreement with other agencies planning to continue in Algeria until 1975.
- To decrease substantially the distribution of material aid, especially used clothing in Jordan, East Bank.
- To explore the possibilities of cooperating with the Ecumenical Advisory Council for Church Services in Egypt.
- To increase TAP and FAX programs in the Oriental and Kivu provinces of the Congo, an area where the needs of the people have been more neglected than in other parts of the Congo.
- To recruit 150-200 families from the Altoplano (highlands) in Bolivia, and assist them in resettlement by providing technical services in health, agriculture, and education, in cooperation with the Bolivian government which provides the land.
- To enter Jamaica with a modest TAP program.
- To pursue efforts to provide more assistance to needy people in areas controlled by the National Liberation Front in South Vietnam and within the Democratic Republic of Vietnam.
- To phase out the Christian Child Care Training program in Korea and terminate the financial support of the Mennonite Vocational School.

Other Projections

The Voluntary Service department is planning a major expansion of program in urban areas of the U.S. It was observed that the continuing urban crises calls for equal priority attention by MCC comparable to other crisis areas in the world, such as the Middle East, Bolivia, Vietnam, and Nigeria. VS will also seek to establish a unit in another city where there are no Mennonite churches, such as Nashville, possibly.

A further major thrust for 1970 VS programming will be to inform, educate, and seek the active involvement of persons and the resources from MCC constituency congregations in a reasonable radius of urban areas to help minister to the hurts of minority groups imprisoned in the inner city. MCC will be working with Mennonite churches or conferences in the urban areas rather than pose separate MCC programs.

As in the past few years, the Mental Health Services will continue its search for greater clarity in defining what should be its precise role in the future, including relationship to church, to MCC, and for each psychiatric center to the community.

Peace Section will sponsor a second study tour in the Middle East, and a second fraternal visit to the Nazarene Christians in Eastern Europe and explore ways of supporting their nonresistant testimony. Also, among numerous other projections, the Peace Section plans to develop with Mennonite Broadcasts, Inc., television spots on peace, and radio spots on alternative service; begin a newsletter to alternate with the Washington Memo; and in conjunction with MCC (Canada) sponsor a special study of how the church can best minister to draft-age refugees in Canada.

More Mennonite Disaster Service units in 1970 will incorporate young people and women into their organization and planning. The trend is away from MDS as a function for men exclusively. Also, MDS will continue to increase its efforts to help urban congregations to assist in “disasters” of the ghetto.

“At the beginning of the Seventies there is a great need for an unselfish outpouring of concern in action,” Executive Secretary Snyder said. “One can only pray that we will be able to do our share as Mennonite and Brethren in Christ people.”

New Relationship Within VNCS

Vietnam Christian Service, the cooperative service and relief effort of Church World Service, Lutheran World Relief, and MCC, was reviewed after its fourth year of operation.

Paul Longacre, MCC director of Asia, presented to the annual committee the new “Memo of Understanding” drawn up by the three agencies. The major change affects the administration of VNCS. For the past four years, MCC administered the program for the three partner agencies. Beginning January 1, 1970, Church World Service will assume that role.

Longacre, in his presentation, noted that MCC felt the need to relate more closely to the national Vietnamese church and the Mennonite missionaries in Vietnam “MCC felt that it could do this better as a junior partner in VNCS than in the administrating capacity,” Longacre said.

Without embarrassing its other partners, the new arrangement allows MCC more freedom to pursue its interest in working with the people in the areas controlled by the National Liberation Front and North Vietnam should service opportunities open that would allow MCC’s normal administrative principles of seeing goods and services to their end use. It also allows CWS and LWR to pursue any special interests they may have as agencies.

No major shift of MCC personnel within VNCS is expected to occur, though MCC within the VNCS framework will work more closely now with the National Protestant Church in the administration of the hospitals at Nhatrang and Pleiku.

Robert Miller will continue to be the country director for VNCS.

Probe Rationale for Urban Program

One of the innovations at the annual meeting was discussion groups in which the committee members and guests divided into four groups to discuss areas of major concern to MCC.

The groups—overseas services, Voluntary Service, Mennonite Mental Health Service, and personnel services—were each given a pertinent issue to discuss and later reported to the assembly the ideas which had come from the discussions.

The Voluntary Service discussion group centered its thinking around the central idea of VS-ers in the cities and how they should relate to constituent conferences and the local congregations. Conference representatives were present for these discussions.

Paul Leatherman, director of VS, proposed the idea that the issue of working in the urban areas is just as important as working in the crisis areas around the world and should hold high priority with these troubled spots. One of the difficult tasks of inner city is programming. Should VS-ers be satisfied to serve as ambulance drivers and hospital workers? How can they communicate with the people and get to the root causes of existing problems in the city? How much should VS-ers be expected to identify with the city and its people?

VS-ers from inner-city units were present and shared their views as to how VS-ers can be of help in the city. Vernon King, director of the Fresno, Calif., unit, proposed that there should be two types of programs for the city. One such program would provide resources to help the community realize its own programs and learn to deal realistically with them. This is the type of program in which he and his wife are involved at present. They were invited by interested Mennonite churches of the Fresno area to help them realize the problems and begin working to find ways of solving them.

The VS director from the Atlanta unit, John D. Yoder, proposed that VS-ers work for enrichment of the cities through such programs as home management, education, job training, and general health. He also pointed out the fact that we should move into the cities to learn as well as to give. An important aspect brought out in the discussion was that the programming for the cities should be on a long-range basis similar to overseas projects. Mennonites don't fully realize the problems of the urban areas and must be realistic about what they should and can do for the people. They should not think of this as a short-term program.

The idea of MCC working with existing programs in the cities instead of beginning its own was also favored.

Educating the congregations on urban policies was considered a major task of inner-city VS-ers. While working in the cities, they should return to the white rural Mennonite churches so that something more can be done about the problems of the city. The home communities and churches should serve as support groups for the VS-ers and the only way this is possible is by telling them of the problems and needs as the VS-ers see them.

The group concluded with the idea that the ministry to the city is a massive task and challenge. How to reduce the opportunities to manageable proportions without being overwhelmed, however, will continue to be a major area of concern.

Trends Noted

Orie O. Miller, speaking on "The Meaning of the Past Fifty Years," reviewed some of the trends within the Mennonite Church and among the nations of the world which helped to pave the way for the beginning of MCC and the wider brotherhood relationships.

"MCC's accepted scriptural priority of prayed-out Christian-committed workers, and after this, then, contributed varied gifts and things 'In the Name of Christ' and the needed administration not only simplified the Treasurer-Controller function but prepared for the merging with mission and world brotherhood partnership in gospel outreach obedience," Brother Miller said.

Miller noted that MCC's slogan- "In the Name of Christ" - clarified worker standards and motivation. He also pointed out that the many programs - TAP, VS, Pax, MTS, MEDA, etc. - show MCC's concern that nothing be wasted in the brotherhood, as with Jesus' concern for the "crumbs" in His feeding miracle.

On Thursday afternoon and evening, prior to the annual meeting, an "MCC Background Day" was held for members, editors of Mennonite papers, pastors, and any other people who wished to attend. It provided an opportunity for such persons to speak to the Akron staff on specific areas of program, securing detailed information for which there is generally little time during the regular plenary sessions.

As an experiment, the Background Day was not highly successful, as only one third of the MCC members attended, and only four of the dozen editors invited. Thus, there were two Akron staff or staff-related persons on hand for every MCC member and constituent group member.

The evening's session of old photographs, color slides, and films depicting the past 50 years of MCC's ministries was only slightly better attended. Many agreed that the drama of MCC's early years - the Russian relief and resettlement assistance in Paraguay - needs somehow to be told again across the constituency; a younger generation has grown up in the church little aware of this aspect of inter-Mennonite program and witness.

The following evening, Myron Augsburger, Eastern Mennonite College president, centered the annual meeting's attention on current affairs within Christian circles with which MCC must be aware. He spoke on "The Renewal of Social Concern Among Evangelical Christians."

"In this country there are churches who have programs oriented around proclamation and they call themselves evangelicals; there are other programs oriented around service and they are embarrassed to call themselves evangelical. Then, there are also programs oriented around discipleship, which reaches into both of the first two areas. And that is the kind of programs in which we Mennonites stand," Augsburger said.

"As with other evangelical churches, the Mennonite Church too had to have a re-awakening. And the Mennonite Central Committee has been a vital part of this reawakening in terms of what social concerns really are as an extension of the proclamation."

Augsburger's full address will be made available later.

Soviet Visitors Attend

By coincidence, three Soviet Russia visitors were on hand for the occasion.

MCC members and visitors spent time reflecting on the organization's 50-year history and growth. It was most fitting to have three visitors from Russia, who since the collapse of the czarist government in Russia in 1917 played a significant role in the formation of the MCC.

As was portrayed during the Chicago meeting by a series of old photographs, a reign of terror which followed the overthrow of the Russian government led to great suffering for all Russians, including the Mennonites.

The call for help from Russia reached the North American Mennonites in 1919 and consequently led to the formation of an inter-Mennonite central committee in July 1920. Its sole task, as then envisioned, was to arrange for the collection and shipment of food and clothing, and the setting up of facilities for the distribution of materials within the Soviet Union.

The Russian visitors at the MCC annual meeting are officials of the Union of Evangelical Christian Baptists in the U.S.S.R. The three, each who had made earlier visits to the States and Canada, were Sergei Timchenko, the first vice-president of the Union; Ilia Orlov, deputy chairman of the Union's international department; and Mrs. Klaudia Pillipiuc, a secretary within the same department. They were accompanied in the U.S. by Adolfs Klaupiks, a Russian-born Baptist, and retired Relief Coordinator of the Baptist World Alliance.

Only 10 days before its annual meeting, MCC first learned in a cable from Moscow about the intended visit of the Russian Baptists.
During the Friday evening, Jan. 23, public inspirational meeting held in connection with the MCC annual meeting, all three Russian visitors gave greetings and testimonies. They praised MCC for its 50 years of worldwide relief "in the Name of Christ." Timchenko reported on the December triennial meeting of their Union in Moscow, at which "Unity in Christ" was the theme. He expressed sorrow over those people, whether in Russia or North America, who "sow discord among the brethren."

In conclusion, Timchenko, on behalf of his team and the Moscow Union, presented a copy of the Bible in the Russian language to H. Ernest Bennett, MCC chairman. Timchenko explained that it was a copy of a recent reprinting. "Around this Word," he said, "we are united."

Adopts Modest Budget Increase

Mennonite Central Committee approved a 1970 budget totaling $2,794,700, which represents a 12 percent increase over last year's budget.

However, only a 2 1/2 percent increase in constituency giving is reflected in the total budget figure. MCC entered the new year with sizable contributed funds designated for the emergency relief program in Nigeria and for the Mennonite Disaster Service operations. For 1970 MCC hopes to receive in contributions a total of $1,694,810.

The bulk of the budget — $1,713,100 — is designated for overseas programs. The rest covers Voluntary Service and peace ministry work in Canada and the U.S., disaster service and mental health services coordination and administration.

Reporting on MCC's financial matters for 1969, Paul E. Myers, assistant treasurer, told the MCC members that contributions were up 8.6 percent over 1968.

Myers also reported that 81.4 percent of total MCC funds for 1969 were spent overseas, which includes relief, trainee, and the Teachers Abroad Program; 9.9 percent in Voluntary Service programs; 3.8 percent in Peace Ministry affairs; 1.1 percent in Mennonite Mental Health Services administration; .6 percent on Mennonite Disaster Service; with a 3.2 percent of total funds for other expenses.

Machinery Meshes for Mission '70

Around 75 representatives of Franconia Mennonite Conference in eastern Pennsylvania gathered at the Quakertown (Pa.) Diner on the evening of Jan. 12, 1970, for an inspirational dinner meeting — preliminary planning session for Mission '70. The 64th annual meeting of Mennonite Board of Missions will be held on the campus of Christoper Dock High School near Lansdale, July 1 to 7, with Franconia Conference serving as host.

The first order of business was to enjoy the dinner together as a total group. Each person present has accepted some responsibility on a local arrangements committee.

Serving as chairman of the local arrangements steering committee is Henry P. Yoder of Lansdale. In his address following the meal, Yoder explained the organizational arrangement for Franconia Conference and outlined the responsibilities that each of the 17 subcommittees will have. Each subcommittee is responsible to the six-member local arrangements steering committee.

Persons directly involved in the program for Mission '70 were also present. Lewis Strite, Harrisonburg, Va., will serve as overall program coordinator while Jim Boyts will assist Strite and provide leadership for the small strategy groups. Samuel Janzen, also of Harrisonburg, is chairman of the program committee. Ivan Kauffman, secretary for Information Services at Mennonite Board of Missions, with assistance from Strite, Boyts, and Janzen, offered the assembly a sneak preview of program developments for Mission '70.

The public sessions of the Board, slated for July 2 to 4, will follow the theme, "The Spirit of the Lord upon Me," a phrase taken from Luke 4:18 and 19. In an innovative move this year, the Board business sessions will be held both preceding and following the public sessions.

Gunmen Hold Up Brunks

The Kenneth Brunk family and two guests went through the harrowing experience of a holdup. After a Sunday night service two brethren from the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions were guests at the Brunk home. The brethren Jay Garber and Wilbert Lind were on their way to Haiti in the interest of their Board.

It was late when the gunmen forced their way into the Brunk home. They demanded wallets and watches. They ransacked the bedrooms and finally asked for their gun. Twila, Mrs. Brunk, told them they did not believe in violence and did not own a gun. She offered them food, but they declined. They also asked for the car keys, but Kenneth told them he could not give them the keys.

After attempting to lock the men in the bathroom, and threatening Kenneth by putting a butcher knife to his throat, Mrs. Brunk was able to slip out the back door unnoticed. When the robbers became aware she made her getaway they fled. They first cut the telephone wires and slashed two tires on the car. They also took about $800 in money. Most of the money was from the pockets of the two visiting brethren.

The Board is aware that missionaries live dangerously and we should ever be fervent in prayer for their safety.

Associated Seminaries Cooperate in Urban Project

The Associated Mennonite Biblical Seminaries of Elkhart, Ind., are among six theological schools in Midwest America who are cooperating in the development of a pilot project, "Urban Ministries Program for Seminarians." This program will be related closely to churches and agencies of Chicago, according to an announcement from Gilbert James, director of the program. James is a member of the faculty of Asbury Theological Seminary, Wilmore, Ky., another of the cooperating institutions.

Dates of the project are June 15 to Aug. 21, 1970. The purpose is to train seminarians for ministry in the urban community under interchurch auspices. The program will combine action with theological reflection.

This experimental program is financed through a $50,000 grant from the Lilly Endowment, Inc., Indianapolis, Ind. It is being administered by a committee of deans of which Dean Ross T. Bender of the Associated Seminaries has been designated as chairman.

"Uyo Story" to Be Released

"Madam," said Effiong one day, "What will we be now — the Mennonite Church of Scotland?" A fitting question, since the development of Mennonite mission work in Nigeria fitted neither the old established mission nor splintered "independent" church patterns.

Mission work in Nigeria began in response to a call from independent Nigerian churches who had of their own accord adopted the name "Mennonite." In 1959 Edwin and Irene Weaver responded to this call to relocate from India to Nigeria.

Their newly published book, The Uyo Story, tells with charity and candor the early disillusionments and frustrations and the gradual developments of a new vision of opportunities in "supportive" and "cooperative" mission. The book will be available from Mennonite Board of Missions, Box 370, Elkhart, Ind. 46514 as of Feb. 13.

Schwartzentrubers on Brief Furlough

An active lay leadership in the Bragado, Argentina, Mennonite Church is carrying on the church program in the absence of the pastor, Earl Schwartzentruber. Earl, originally from Tavistock, Ont., and Genevieve, from Goshen, Ind., have been missionaries in Argentina with Mennonite Board of Missions since 1960. The family is currently on a three-month furlough in North America.

In addition to pastoring the 90-member church in Bragado, Earl participates in English instruction classes by teaching six hours weekly in the Bragado church facility. English students range from youth and adults to students and teachers.

The Argentina Mennonite Conference, of which Earl is the retiring treasurer, is comprised of seven members — four nationals and three missionaries.

Genevieve is involved in women's work. Cadena, meaning "chain," is the national counterpart of WMSA. Activities include visitation in pairs to people not in the church, promotion and discussion of the Spanish Heart to Heart radio talks by Marta Alvarez, mending and distributing clothing to needy community people and to a school for retarded children. From 20 to 35 women also attend Sunday afternoon women's meetings at the Bragado church.

Cadena publishes a magazine called Colemenar, meaning "beehive." Argentine women are not as culturally free to travel as their North American counterparts. Colemenar helps to introduce and acquaint the women from the various regions with one another, thus aiding unity and mutual support in local projects.

The Schwartzentrubers will return to Argentina on Feb. 26.

International Agricultural Seminar to Be Held

The Youth Service Committee is sponsoring an International Agricultural Seminar, June 12 to 27, 1970. These are the correct dates, rather than the dates listed on the brochure. The seminar will be composed of a group of six to ten college students who have interest in agriculture. The purpose is to stimulate interest in them toward a long-term permanent agricultural missions location.

Ken Martin, Agricultural Economic student at Penn State University, will be serving as leader of the seminar. Martin served for three years in Honduras in agricultural development work. He is former president of Pennsylvania State Future Farmers of America.

The seminar will be spending two days in Guatemala, four days in Honduras, four days in Haiti, and four to five days in the southern part of the United States. They will be observing church and agricultural development projects. They will be listening to lectures and having various exposure experiences to stimulate them in the needs of agricultural development and they will attempt to relate this to their own agriculture tradition.

Scholarships valued at $500 will be available for each person to cover travel, lodging, and food. The Youth Service Committee is soliciting funds from interested agricultural businessmen and agricultural industries for the support of the seminar. Contributions are tax deductible.

Application blanks are available from Youth Ministries Office, Salunga, Pa., 17538. Applications must be returned to the office by Mar. 15, 1970. Selections will be announced Apr. 1, 1970.

Tam Elected Leader in Saigon

Mr. Trung and Miss Nguyet were re-elected to the Gia Dinh congregational church council on Dec. 28.

Arlin Yoder writes from Sao Carlos, Brazil: “Pray for a new couple, Manuel and Maria. They are a lovely pair. Pray that God might help us in a special way to see these new couples find their way within our small core group, finding fulfillment of their needs in Christ. To see a policeman, a tractor dealer, a school principal, a bricklayer, an electrician coming together to form a new Christian community is a real blessing. But it isn’t easy when they come from so many regional backgrounds and different class levels to develop those ties that truly bind. We need your prayers.”

James and Beth Styer, appointed to Woodstock School in India, are scheduled to fly from Philadelphia on Feb. 22. James is currently serving in the Physical Education Department at Goshen College and will teach this subject at Woodstock. The Styers both come from eastern Pennsylvania.

Kenneth G. Bauman, principal, Union Biblical Seminary, Yeotmal, India, writes: “The seminary has started a Hindi radio program which is to be sponsored jointly by the Mennonites. The student who has been doing the Marathi program is now taking over the Hindi also. He has recorded 15 programs and will complete a total of 30, which will be broadcast starting May 1970. The program is called ‘The Call of the Cross.’”

Ralph Buckwalter, Obihiro, Japan, reports: “Personal witnessing and radio evangelism follow-up are bringing fruit. The Narawas are both blind but Mrs. Narawa is seeing the light! She and their only daughter are regular participants in Sunday worship services. Ogasawara-san, a clean-cut chap of 22 who works at a veneer plant in Makubletsu, started taking the radio Bible correspondence course early this year and is now sharing in the believers’ fellowship. Sato-san is a second-year student at Obihiro Agriculture College, an only son who has come to firm, simple faith in Christ. He requested baptism several days ago after witnessing the baptism of Mrs. Takeuchi and Mrs. Kimura on Christmas evening.”

February speaking engagements for David Angsburger, Mennonite Hour speaker, are as follows: Fort Wayne (Ind.) Bible College, Feb. 3-6; Cubo Mennonite Church, Feb. 6-8; Milan Center Mennonite Church, New Haven, Ind., also on Feb. 8 at 9:30 a.m.; and First Mennonite Church of Ft. Wayne at 11:00 a.m. On Feb. 22-25 he will be at Whitestone Mennonite Church, Hesston, Kan.; and Feb. 26 to Mar. 1 at Wellman, Iowa, Mennonite Church.

Readers Say

Thanks so much for publishing Lee J. Miller’s very worthy and objective response to sensitivity training entitled, “Reversing the Order” in the Jan. 13 issue of Gospel Herald. I appreciate the authority and expertise he was writing with. — Harold L. Mast, Kokomo, Ind.

I have read the last issue (Jan. 20) of Gospel Herald now the following three articles took my attention in particular: Tongues — Sign of the Spirit? — “ Peace — the Vine or the Grapes,” by Warren M. Wenger, and “No Vision — Perish” by Earl B. Ebely. Each contained timely advice pertaining to issues of our day. — Reuben O. Hornig, Lititz, Pa.

I am writing to express my appreciation for Robert Baker’s wise and sensitive letter to his son Doug. The son’s vision and conscience are undoubtedly due in some part to the beliefs and teachings of his father; and even though his son has ventured into new and more radical discipleship, I should think Mr. Baker would be (and likely is) grateful that his son has grown up to be a compassionate and courageous human being. Some parents are not so fortunate.

A response from Mr. Baker’s son would be interesting to read.

A word of appreciation is also in order for the timely, thought-provoking editorials which appear so constructively in the Gospel Herald, I always look forward to reading them. — Marlene Y. Kropf, Portland, Ore.

Why I Don't Eat Grapes

By Paul Landes

In California and Arizona a growing number of farm workers, primarily Mexican-American, are in the midst of a struggle for self-determination and recognition. Their leader, Cesar Chavez, is a devout Roman Catholic layman committed to the principles of nonviolence. He heads the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee (UFWOC). The center of their struggle is the grape growers of California and Arizona.

Because the farm workers are practically powerless in resources, they depend upon their ability to rally the masses of farm workers behind their ideal and to gain support from other concerned people. The grape growers have banded together in opposition to the farm workers struggle and have avoided being singled out as a boycott target by trading labels among each other. As a result of this power display, Cesar Chavez has called for a nationwide boycott of all California and Arizona table grapes. UFWOC is appealing to consumers across the nation through various religious organizations and civic groups to refrain from buying any California or Arizona table grapes. The purpose of all this is to gain recognition for the UFWOC as a legitimate bargaining entity which would give the farm workers the right of negotiating the cost of their labor rather than being at the mercy of the grower.

Mennonites find themselves in a dilemma. On one hand we are involved with these deprived peoples through programs of Mennonite Board of Missions, especially in South Texas and Arizona. On the other hand we have not supported tactics which usually are affiliated with the labor union movement.

We presently have Voluntary Service units relating to farm workers and their families in Caldwell, Idaho; Nyssa, Oregon; Surprise and Buckeye, Arizona; Robstown and Alice, Texas; and several Florida locations. We have this kind of involvement, yet we are not certain what our role, as God's people, should be in the struggle with the grape growers.

My own pilgrimage has brought me to the following point: I do not eat grapes, nor does my family. I am not particularly vocal about my position, but I have been quite faithful in abstaining from grapes. I greatly admire the dedication and determination of Cesar Chavez. Cesar has unselfish motivation and is displaying tremendous self-sacrifice for the sake of others. Further, my own experiences over the past nine years have brought me to a personal identification with the farm worker.

I recall the Apostle Paul's reaction when confronted with a similar question. Certain persons became offended because a few Christians openly ate meat that was considered by some to be unclean. Paul had no particular conviction against eating this meat. Yet he was sensitive enough to the feelings of others that he vowed never to eat meat the rest of his life if it offended his brother. I feel like I have identified myself with the farm worker. I could easily offend many of my friends by eating grapes.

One cannot remain neutral on certain issues. Jesus said at one point, "You are either for me or against me." In many ways the same is true of the grape dispute. By eating grapes a person either unwittingly or intentionally is supporting the grape owner. By refusing to eat grapes a person demonstrates support for the farm worker. I don't eat grapes because I have chosen to cast my lot with the "have-nots."

There is a danger of causing polarization of the two groups and alienating either one or the other. I believe Jesus was concerned about all stratas of society and did not pit one against the other. Therefore, rather than allowing feelings of hostility to arise toward either the growers or the farm workers, we must remain redemptive in all our attitudes.

To put dollars, personnel, and other resources into programs ministering to farm workers and then ignoring concerns that are vitaliy important to them seems like a contradiction. This is what happens if we belittle or ridicule this present effort for self-determination by the farm workers of our land. I urge every responsible person to learn all he can about the grape strike and join me in refusing to eat grapes.

All in the Family

By Jim Bishop

It didn’t take long to sense that the November 10-20 Voluntary Service orientation school at Mennonite Board of Missions was going to be a bit different. The first evening of orientation during a sing-along, one participant volunteered to share via original songs his pilgrimage as a successful but bewildered performer with a California rock group to a consciousness of a Power beyond himself. Others spontaneously shared personal testimonies as well as their anticipations for orientation.

VS administrators also began talking. Something was happening in their daily S-groups (small group sharing sessions) too. One evening the group went on a fast as a symbolic act of concern for the suffering people of Biafra and gathered for Bible reading, prayer, and discussion.

For the November 20 commissioning service, the chapel was suddenly darkened but for one lone candle. By pairs the VS-ers walked forward, carrying candles, and gave personal testimonies to the Mission Board staff. Yes, what is happening to our young people today?

Not the least of the unique features of the November orientation was the presence of a brother-sister combination. Ken and Connie Sommer, from Orrville, Ohio, claim it just happened that way, although it took awhile to convince fellow VS-ers that they weren’t husband and wife.

Ken, who will turn 21 in December, spent two years at Goshen College and was in the first Study-Service Team (SST) sent by the college to French Guadeloupe. Here as part of his experience he gave six weeks of voluntary service teaching missionary children, which, he stated, had a direct bearing on his deciding to enter VS upon returning stateside.

“I think one of the flaws in Christian thinking today is that we need to go overseas somewhere to get involved in mission work,” Ken said. “I feel now that some of the most crucial spiritual and physical needs lie right at our North American doorsteps. This is where God wants me to get to work at the present time.

“I’ve also been asking myself some basic questions about life as a Christian, and since college wasn’t helping me find the answer, perhaps VS will.”

Both Ken and Connie credited their home congregation, Orrville Mennonite, as an added incentive to consider VS. The pastor, J. Lester Graybill, promotes the service concept and has a way with young people, they said.

For the next two years, Ken will serve with the new VS unit opened in Pass Christian, Miss. He will assist with rehabilitation and construction of homes damaged or destroyed by Hurricane Camille and relate on an individual basis to persons being served.

Connie, 20, spoke matter-of-factly concerning her reasons for entering VS. “I attended Goshen College one year,” she said, “but still remained undecided about my future. I also lacked the financial means for returning this fall.

“Having worked with inner-city children at Camp Luz near Orrville and participated in a one-week Out-Spokin’ bicycle trip in August helped develop my interest in social work. The camp nurse had just returned from a VS stint in Haiti and suggested I consider a similar experience.”

Connie has now begun a one-year assignment working with young people in the area surrounding the Detroit, Mich., VS unit.

Many of Ken and Connie’s statements during the course of the interview alluded to their coming from a closely knit family. They were asked what adjustments needed to be made during their time of separation.

“It hasn’t been too difficult thus far,” Ken replied. “Connie’s twin brother, Ron, is currently involved in Goshen’s SST program, so all of us children are presently away from home and have been before while in college.

“It will take us awhile, however, to get over the fact that for the first time in our lives we won’t be home for Christmas.”

Mr. and Mrs. Norman W. Sommer of Orrville, Ohio, will be keenly aware of the absence of their children during the next year or two. But for Ken and Connie, it’s all in the family.
Gathered with Purpose

This is the year for congregations to take a careful look at themselves. Mennonite General Conference has chosen "Gathered with Purpose" as the biennial focus. The staff persons and the various committees will help to pour meaning into these simple yet powerful words.

It is a bit premature but you can be told that the Mennonite Commission for Christian Education and the Worship Committee are working hard at a plan to personalize the "Gathered with Purpose" theme for dozens of congregations. The plan will bring a team of resource persons to clusters of congregations for long weekend events. While the interpretation and use of the new Mennonite Hymnal will be a part of the content, it will by no means be all of it.

The whole range of thought about why God's people gather in congregations at regular and irregular times will be reviewed. There will be opportunity to use all sorts of flexible programs and methods for discovering together why God's people gather and what they should do at those times. All sorts of approaches can be used, small group, large group, song, liturgy, printed materials, talks, Bible study, group discussions, instruments, new media, team preaching, and many others. As this program develops you will be informed. Perhaps your congregation may want to be among the first to get into the schedule which will be arranged by the Mennonite Commission for Christian Education, Mennonite Building, Scottsdale, Pa.

Aside from the particular program sketched above your congregation could get on board the "Gathered with Purpose" theme in a number of ways. Has your congregation carved out a statement of purpose that is uniquely yours? Some congregations are doing this by taking their leaders to church camp settings for entire weekends where the hard work of developing a statement of purpose is done.

It would be exciting to use this year as the occasion to try those things your church has talked about but which nobody really has had the nerve to try. What are those untried things? Ask the creative people in your congregation what they'd like to see done. Ask young people.

Don't be satisfied though just to do new things. Discover what the right things are. Relate the things that are tried to the big question, What does God intend for this congregation? This means, of course, that there must be considerable searching on the part of some people for the clear leading of God for your particular situation.

So it should be a very exhilarating year, one which can be looked back on later as a significant congregational milestone.

Praying is Receiving

By Elma Smuland

"Ask, and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full" (John 16:24).

Asking is receiving. This thought was brought home to me with such force that it put new meaning into my prayer time. Often we pray,—perhaps for things, or something to happen, a change of circumstance,—nothing happens. Is this what you have thought? And then, you stopped praying?

Yet if you were to keep a memo of your prayer requests, you would learn some startling things. A day by day revelation would bring you to the awareness—asking is receiving!

The Book of the Acts of the Apostles in Chapter 10 gives an illuminating account of two men praying and receiving as they prayed. One was a follower of God, the other a pagan. Both prayed. Cornelius a Roman centurion, was to find that the cross was the center of forgiveness, and Peter an apostle of the Lord Jesus Christ was to learn for the Jewish world that the circle of forgiveness was to include the entire globe. And it was in the act of prayer that God touched Cornelius to get, and Peter to receive.

When upon rereading this story, you become aware of the fact that neither Cornelius nor Peter, at the first, recognized the receiving when it came, you may be awakened to your own blindness of not recognizing that you were on the receiving line. But, you stopped praying. Not so Peter or Cornelius, they continued to pray. And while they prayed they were prodded into the awareness that the answer had been given for them to receive.

Have you neglected prayer time? Thought God didn't answer? Peter was also perplexed. For we see not things as God sees them. Is. 55:9. To the first command to "rise, Peter; kill and eat," he said, "Not so, Lord; for I have never . . . " Could it be you don't want to change either, so you are in fact, by not continuing in prayer, saying, "Not so, Lord; for I have never . . . " But Peter continued in prayer. Prayer is for receiving.

A Short, Short, Short Story

One day a young man found a $5.00 bill between the ties of a railroad. From that time on he never lifted his eyes from the ground while walking. In 30 years he accumulated 25,916 buttons, 62,172 pins, seven pennies, a bent back, and a sour, miserly disposition. In "finding" all this, he lost the smiles of his friends, the songs of the birds, the beauties of nature, and the opportunity to serve his fellow man and spread happiness. — From Kitchener's Shepherd's Staff.
Affirmations of Conviction

Michael Sattler was savagely executed by Austrian authorities with full collaboration of the "official" church of his country which regarded him as a dangerous heretic.

Remember, he was sentenced to have his tongue cut out in full view of the populace in the public square, then to have his body pinched again and again by red-hot tongs, and finally while alive and still conscious to be burned at the stake until nothing was left of him but ashes. Nice people, these Christian (?) Austrians.

There is value in noting some of the convictions that brought about this futile attempt to destroy all who believed and lived by similar convictions. Here is a sample from his writings: "A great mass of men is without God's word and command in today's world [1527] with its infant baptism — a trickery to the simple and an insidious shame to all Christianity, a brassy pretense of all godless . . . " Admittedly not calculated to win friends, but that's the nature of reformers, to be blunt, say what they believe, and take the consequences.

Well, it seems that in February of 1527 a seven-point "confession of faith" for Anabaptist peoples was drawn up (these Anabaptists or "re-baptizers" could not in good conscience go along with any of the Lutheran or Reformed wings of Protestantism because they believed that Luther, Calvin, Zwingli, and other Protestant reformers had retained too many "Romish" customs and teachings).

It appears that Michael Sattler was the chief author of this 1527 "articles of faith" document. He would, of course, have stoutly maintained that these affirmations of conviction were in no sense a "creed" which was usually stated with precise doctrinal formulations. Rather, these confessions or articles were generally statements of basic principles, sometimes negative in character (refusals to accept some aspects of official "creeds" in use at the time).

Here is a sort of summarization of the seven principles enunciated by Michael Sattler and for which he gave his life:

1. Baptism is only for those who have been converted, whose lives have been changed, and who believe that their sins have been taken away by Christ and who are willing to be "buried" with Him as a witness to their newfound faith (which position, of course, constituted a renouncing of their "infant" baptism as either ineffectual or not really baptism at all).

2. The second article described procedures for disciplining and if necessary excommunicating members of Anabaptist congregations who had fallen into open sin and whose lives had become a reproach upon their profession of being Christians. This was a three-step process which began with efforts to bring the sinning member to repentance and restoral. But these failing, he was no longer to be regarded as a member of the church. (This was an effort to get away from the predicament of having those who lived scandalous lives still being regarded as "good church members."

3. Article three had to do with the Lord's Supper which was described as a memorial, a remembrance of the sacrificial death of Christ on the cross. It was to be open only to those who upon profession of faith and testimony to salvation had been publicly baptized.

4. The fourth article called for separation both from the world and from the external church system which to these men represented apostasy from true Christian principles. "The genuine believer should get out of Babylon and worldly Egypt."

5. The fifth article concerned itself with the nature of the church which was to have a spiritual shepherd called by and supported by the congregation. The pastor is to be responsible to that congregation (rather than to a higher ecclesiastical authority).

6. The sixth article describes acceptable relationships of a Christian to the state. It accepts the "sword" of the state for the punishment of those who do evil and the protection of the state for those who do good. But it rejects interference from the state with the congregation's right to govern its own affairs and discipline its members "armed with truth, righteousness, peace, faith, and salvation."

7. The last article forbids the taking of oaths. A Christian's word is to be taken as truth, his "yes" and "no" are sufficient in and of themselves.*

Now you just might find echoes in those articles of principles you have heard elsewhere. They are part of the general heritage of all those who across the last few centuries have sought in one way or another to reconstitute New Testament Christianity in a time when the popular or dominant churches seem to have strayed far from New Testament ideals.

This is a worthy heritage, is it not? Even if we cannot agree with it in every minute detail, should we not be re-examining such a heritage in order to discover and reaffirm foundational principles without which the church in any age will decline in vitality? — Harold L. Phillips in Vital Christianity.

Something to Do About Drugs

"I knew that for every hour of comparative ease and comfort its treacherous alliance might confer upon me now, I must endure days of bodily suffering; but I did not, could not, conceive the mental hell into whose fierce corroding fires I was about to plunge."

A modern addict? Hardly. These words were written in 1842 by a young English immigrant, William Blair, to describe his experience with drugs.

Language has changed since Blair's day; the effect of drugs has not.

John and Karen live in New York City. They are "hooked." Both have been in jail (John, ten times; Karen, twice) and to hospitals (he, four times; she, twice) — and have emerged each time to start their habits again. They are not married. Karen's earnings as a prostitute support them both. John occasionally steals to support their habit. Four times a day they squeeze heroin through a needle into their bloodstream. The drug brings peace — temporarily. This is all they live for. In a reflective moment Karen says:

"We are animals. We are all animals in a world no one knows. . . . I imagine that I've been sorry every day that I've had the habit. . . . I'll probably die — early. . . . I don't care anymore. I really don't. Because there's nothing for me. I don't have any reason to quit using." ¹

Not all suffering is individual. Society suffers too — in wasted lives, in lost talent, and in huge costs for law enforcement and efforts to rehabilitate addicts.

The Issue:

Eleven billion doses of stimulant, depressant, and hallucinogenic drugs are produced annually in this country. Illegal manufacture and sale of drugs is widespread.

Over 3,000 deaths annually are attributed to barbiturates alone.

Of 2,000 criminal investigations conducted by the Federal Bureau of Drug Abuse Control, one third involved LSD and marihuana. Seventy-five percent of those arrested were under 25 years of age.

Over 60,000 addicts steal millions and contribute $350 million to organized crime for illicit drugs.²

The problem is serious enough to warrant a federal agency to deal with it. Under President Lyndon B. Johnson, the Federal Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs was established to control the manufacture and sale of dangerous drugs.

Types of Drugs

The bewildering array of drug types adds to the complexity of the problem.

Narcotics: the term "narcotics" principally denotes opium derivatives, morphine and heroin. Morphine is a pain killer used to produce sleep or stupor. Heroin has no medical function; it is the chief drug of addiction in the United States. When taken by swallowing, sniffing, or injection, heroin brings drowsiness, apathy, and impaired mental and physical performance. Repeated usage will lead to physical dependence.

Marihuana, a derivative of a plant in the hemp family, is classified by law as a narcotic because of its dangerous potential and illegal associations. It is cut, dried, pulverized, and converted into cigarettes called "links," "joints," "pot," "weed," "grass," or "Mary Jane." Effects vary with the user: some users experience exaltation or quietude; others, panic and hallucinations; many suffer a confused sense of time and impaired mental and motor functions. Marihuana has no accepted medical use. It produces no physical dependence and only slight tolerance.³

Cocaine is regulated by narcotic law though it is a powerful stimulant that builds up no tolerance or physical dependence. It is produced from the leaves of the coca plant. Cocaine creates excitation, talkativeness, euphoria, and hallucinations followed by depression. Users sniff, inject, or mix cocaine with other drugs. Though it has no withdrawal symptoms, cocaine does bring strong psychic dependence.

Depressants: The most commonly abused depressants are the barbiturates, nicknamed "goofballs." Every year in the United States nearly 48 million barbiturate prescriptions are filled to relieve anxiety and bring sleep. Taken orally, rectally, or intravenously, barbiturates can produce a condition resembling the intoxication of alcohol. Shurred speech, staggering, erratic behavior, hallucinations, and impaired judgment are symptoms of misuse. The drug can cause a fatal depression or convulsions. Chronic misuse leads to psychological and physical dependence. Users often lose count of the number of pills taken; the result may be coma or death. Seventy-five percent of drug suicides are attributed to barbiturates.

Stimulants: Amphetamines are the major stimulants; they have been given such colorful names as "pep pills," "bennies," "dexies," "ups," "rockets." Doctors prescribe them for fatigue, drowsiness, overweight, and mental disorders; they create a feeling of well-being by stimulating the nervous system. Taken orally in tablets or capsules, amphetamines can produce bizarre mental effects and hallucinations. Symptoms include hyperactivity, hallucinations, a persecution complex, nervousness, insomnia, and talkativeness. Perhaps the fastest growing drug abuse is the intravenous injection of "speed" (methamphetamine).

Hallucinogens: This category includes lysergic acid diethylamide (LSD), psilocybin, dimethyltryptamine (DMT), peyote, and mescaline. Some of these drugs occur naturally (in mushrooms, cactus, tree bark, flower seeds); others are manufactured synthetically.

LSD, the "in" drug, is a colorless, tasteless, and odorless hallucinogen capable of producing extreme effects. Even tiny amounts deposited on a sugar cube can produce a wild "trip" (hallucination) lasting four to twelve hours. Anything may result: laughter, sheer terror, acute sensory experiences, transcended time and space.

The possibility of "bad trips" — prolonged psychosis, suicidal inclinations, and damaged chromosomes — must be reckoned with by potential users. Also, the drug can remain dormant in the body and then suddenly, unexpectedly, trigger a "trip."

Mescaline and peyote come from cactus plants and are available in liquid, capsule, or vial forms. Their bitter taste causes users to mix them with tea, coffee, milk, or orange juice. Both are 7,000 times less potent than LSD.

Psilocybin and DMT. Psilocybin is derived from mushrooms grown in Mexico. Taken in liquid, capsule, or powder forms, the drug produces hallucinogenic effects similar to LSD but with a potency 100 times less. DMT is a recent addition to the list and is a synthetic of LSD. Other synthetic drugs, some possibly more powerful and dangerous than LSD, have been used experimentally but the effects are basically similar.

Addicts of these hallucinogens develop different degrees of tolerance without physical dependence. No hallucinogens are used medically except in closely supervised research projects.

The Drug Abusers

Who uses these drugs? Why do they use them? No simple answers exist for these questions. Broadly stated, persons from all walks of life use the drugs. And they use them for many different reasons.

Specific Users: Students use amphetamines to keep awake at exam time; housewives take them for energy; truckers use them to drive long hours. Such individuals may or may not exhibit psychological and/or physical dependence.

Spree Users: These are generally college or high school age groups looking for new "kicks." The degree of psychological and physical dependence varies with the type of drugs chosen and the frequency of use.

Dependent Users: These are addicts who are so drug-dependent that they live to have a "fix." Psychologically and physically they are dependent on the drug. Withdrawal of the drug brings terrible physical and mental suffering.

The largest number of known drug abusers still comes from city slums. But frustration, immaturity, and emotional problems — common factors among addicts — are not peculiar to depressed areas; the misuse of drugs by middle and upper economic groups has become increasingly apparent. Drug dependency is not discriminating; all that is needed is a drug, a person, an adverse environment, and a personality deficiency.

Some Answers:

An effective response to drug abuse calls for at least two basic approaches: (1) Prevent the abusive use of drugs and (2) Rehabilitate persons suffering from drug addiction.

Prevention

Preventive measures should be directed toward eliminating both the availability of dangerous drugs and the desire of people to use them. Legislation, education, and effective law enforcement are necessary if drug abuse is to be prevented. Several specific steps are important.

- Develop an effective program of education to teach people about the nature of drugs, their dangers, the psychology and sociology of addiction, the rationale for rehabilitation, and the purpose of drug laws. Such a program should utilize schools, churches, and mass media.

- Encourage the study of current literature on drug abuse and distribute it to potential drug abusers. Churches can use such material in discussion groups and special studies.

Order these materials from:

- Foster efforts to eliminate the frustration and boredom of ghetto areas, organizations supported by the United Fund, and programs by private businesses. Churches can recruit Christians to donate time for community help programs, recreational activities, and job training.

- Urge your congressman and senators to enable the Federal government to employ a larger enforcement staff at the borders and ports to prevent illegal drug entry.

- Call for state legislators to adopt effective drug abuse control laws. Such laws should provide for appropriate enforcement and should place drug offenders and offenses in categories according to their situation and seriousness.

- Support local law enforcement officers by reporting any drug abuse which comes to your attention and by urging... that more men be assigned to deal with the problem. Also, support public officials who fight the flow of drug traffic rather than content themselves with the occasional arrest of a few addicts.

- Demand adequate counseling programs in public schools to spot and help correct personality defects which might lead to drug abuse.

Rehabilitation

If prevention efforts were to cut off the supply of drugs and no more persons became involved in drug abuse, a huge problem would still remain: the hundreds of thousands of persons already “hooked.” Dealing with drug abuse requires an effective approach to helping the addict get free from dependence on drugs. Rehabilitation of addicts can be encouraged in several ways.

- Be aware of rehabilitation programs. Treatment for addicts is available. Christians should know about the various programs of treatment so that they can guide addicts needing help.

1 Federal Program: The Narcotic Addict Rehabilitation Act of November, 1966, expanded the program of the federal hospital at Lexington, Kentucky. Federal funds were provided to encourage community-based treatment programs.

2 State Programs: California and New York lead the way in group therapy, remedial education, vocational training, counseling, and halfway houses. For information concerning the programs in these states, write:

New York State Division of Parole, 320 Broadway, New York, New York 10007.

New York City Parole Commission, 100 Centre St., New York, New York 10013.

California Rehabilitation Center, Box 841, Corona, California 91720.

Other states should develop similar programs.

(3) Private Programs:

Narcotics Anonymous operating like Alcoholics Anonymous, has chapters in major cities. They rely on mutual inspiration, discussion, and the therapeutic value of confession. Synanon is operated by ex-addicts and a volunteer medical staff on the West Coast. Membership is voluntary but selective. Treatment includes a “cold turkey” approach (no helping drugs) to withdrawal, group pressure, and support.

Daytop Lodge was developed by the National Institute of Mental Health on Staten Island, New York, for the treatment of addict probationers; very similar to Synanon in structure and program.

A Methadone program is being used at the Manhattan General Hospital in New York. Methadone is a synthetic narcotic which helps a patient ease off heroin.

(4) Church Programs: The East Harlem Protestant Parish’s storefront clinic in New York furnishes free psychiatric, medical, legal, and recreational services for addicts. David Wilkerson’s Teen Challenge organization in New York reaches out through prayer and work to youth in drug trouble. The Catholic Church has retreat centers for help.

Alternate approaches to the problem such as legalization, ambulatory clinics, and the “British System” do not seem to be the answer to the drug problem.

- Develop a proper attitude toward the drug abuser. Christians must understand drug abuse before they can do anything else. But how shall Christians look at the drug-dependent person?

Is he a criminal to be placed in jail or is he a sick person needing hospital treatment? He may be both.

He probably chose to take drugs, break the law, and cooperate with organized crime. His criminal acts cost millions of dollars in stolen goods and law enforcement costs.

He may be a criminal, but he is also a person with defective personality, defeated (or defiant), and lacking in self-discipline. His troubles are too critical for home remedy.

Christians should view the drug abuser as a morally responsible individual, yet a sick man who needs help. He is a brother (Gen. 4:9) in psychological and physical need (Mt. 25:35-45) whose desires have enslaved him (Rom. 7:23, 24; Jas. 1:14, 15). This is the time to help, not judge (Mt. 7:1-5; Gal. 6:1, 2).

- Minister to the drug abuser and his family. This should involve education, reassurance, acceptance, forgiveness, financial aid, and support.

- Provide spiritual guidance. Accept the drug abuser as a child of God, believing that God’s power can transform lives (Rom. 8:1, 2, 26). Remember the key to Christian ministry is the proclamation of meaning for life through Christ. Communicate this to the drug abuser in forgiving and compassionate love (Lk. 7:37-50).

In 1842 there was no one to keep William Blair from falling into the “fires of bodily suffering” from drug abuse. But what about John and Karen? Will we do anything for them today?

Andrew Johnson was the only President of the United States who had no formal schooling whatsoever. It is said that his wife taught him to read and write. Two thirds of the Presidents have been college graduates.

Abraham Lincoln once said, "If I tried to read, much less answer, all the criticisms made of me, and all the attacks leveled against me, this office would have to be closed for all other business. I do the best I know how, the very best I can. And I mean to keep on doing this, down to the very end. If the end brings me out all wrong, ten angels swearing I had been right would make no difference. If the end brings me out all right, then what is said against me now will not amount to anything."
The Moratorium and Priorities

By Galen Yoder

Those of us supporting the Vietnam Moratorium run the risk of hypocrisy. The Moratorium has tended to obliterate the total range of priorities that need to be dealt with in this nation. Basically, it has been a low-risk endeavor, requiring only a narrow commitment. The potential hypocrisy of the Moratorium lies in its single-issue orientation.

In this society there are serious dichotomies based on socioeconomic differences. For the last twenty years, the rich have been getting richer in this society, and the poor have been becoming relatively poorer. During the years from 1929 to 1949 — the depression and war years — this was not the case. But today, the gap in both wealth and income distribution between the rich and the poor is not decreasing. According to Federal Reserve figures in 1962, the elite one percent of the nation had 33 percent of this nation’s wealth and the elite 5 percent had 52 percent.

Considering these facts, the seemingly irrational rantings of some youth about capitalism, the ruling class, and the redistribution of wealth, begin to reflect on a more rational analysis of inequities in this society than is at first apparent. The same might be said about the Black Manifesto. Yet the church has balked in making reparations as such, claiming that they belong to outdated Old Testament principles. One wonders why these same ecclesiastics do not take seriously the implication that holy wars are an Old Testament oddity. Mr. Nixon and Mr. Johnson, sitting at the right hand of institutional religion, have, in effect, rationalized the Vietnam War as a holy war. Yet the demand by the poor for a right to an adequate basic income is regarded as some kind of a psychic aberration.

The administration’s new welfare proposal is grossly inadequate and is based on pragmatic, political concerns. Under this proposal, welfare families in only eight states will be assured an amount of assistance which is greater than that currently being provided them by joint Federal-state welfare assistance expenditures. These eight states tend to be southern and rural. The President, true to pattern, is catering to his constituency. And he would have us fear communism because of its narrowness.

Although the President will not develop adequate programs for the poor, his current fiscal policy for fighting inflation demands that a minimum level of 4 percent unemployment be maintained. Yet he refuses demands from the unemployed for adequate assistance. In the context of his constituency and the values of this society, primary adjustments in the level of inflation will continue to be made through fiscal policy. To get in the way of profit-control is considered a violation of sacred grounds in this society. This would diminish the profit motive. It would also narrow the gap between the rich and the poor significantly.

There is a serious imbalance in this nation between public assistance expenditures and military expenditures. According to the current fiscal policy, terminating the war would not allow much money to be put into the cities. However, an overall change in national priorities away from military spending at large would make this possible. In 1968, the Federal government’s portion of the Gross National Product was $101 billion. The portion of this encompassed by military expenditures was $79 billion. This is almost 80 percent. Yet the ABM promises to become the nation’s new idol, and the Pentagon continues to sap the nation’s wealth as cities deteriorate and the masses of the world go to bed cold and hungry at night. Due to the seniority system and other factors, Congress is not likely to respond adequately for years unless massive public pressure is brought to bear on them.

Unfortunately, it’s easy for most of us to be “liberal.” It’s easy to be liberal when you’re sitting fat and on top. It’s easy to accuse George Wallace of racism when you live in all-white suburbia. It’s easy to accuse the Birchers of being fascists when you’re the one who’s really calling the shots. It’s easy to believe in the Protestant Ethic when you have a monopoly on the capital. It’s easy to be objective about law and order when you’re not poor and white. It’s easy to view the Progressive Labor Party as distorted when you’re rich and work in an office.

It’s easy to be liberal when you know that Mayor Daley, Judge Hoffman, and Spiro T. Agnew are going to do the dirty work. It’s easy to be liberal when you live in Princeton, and your property tax rate is one half of what it is for ghetto residents in neighboring Trenton. It’s easy to be liberal and wishy-washy when you’re not about to be drafted. This is all possible when you’re rich and white, and a disproportionately high number of Blacks are on the front lines in Vietnam fighting your war for you.

Perhaps we talk too much about all the problems “out there.” That is the potential hypocrisy of the Moratorium. In some way, we are all involved in the military-industrial-
Commercials for Christ

By Kenneth J. Weaver

To proclaim the gospel "that men might know Him" is our Christian responsibility.

On radio and television, that means more than simply tapping an evangelistic message or a church service. A stirring religious program on radio may encourage Christians, but what will it do for non-Christians? Who but a Christian will listen to a lengthy sermon and church music while driving a car?

Traditional religious broadcasting has been assigned by the broadcasting industry in recent years to special time blocks—primarily Sunday mornings. In many areas of the country, traditional religious broadcasting is concentrated on specific radio stations which have a Christian emphasis—and a largely Christian audience.

Just as non-Christians are not coming to the church today, neither are they tuning to the "Christian" time blocks and stations. In fact most individuals today "bypass" those programs which sound "religious" and appear to be irrelevant to their current thinking and needs. Thus, many people never hear the message of the traditional religious radio program.

The staff of Mennonite Broadcasts, the mass communications division of Mennonite Board of Missions, is convinced that the gospel must be shared through mass media at times when "secular man" is listening and viewing.

New methods of broadcasting are being explored by Mennonite Broadcasts in an effort to meet these requirements. One effective new approach is Choice, a new 3 1/2-minute radio program designed for weekday release. Its target is the American man age twenty to forty. It begins by picturing a situation common to the average man in which he faces a decision with moral or ethical implications. Several alternatives are then discussed, concluding with the suggestion of a Christian principle or truth which should be considered when making a decision.

Family Life TV spots dealing with family relationships and Family Service one-minute radio spots are other examples of programs designed to reach the viewer in the midst of his everyday living. They attempt to transmit a simple, single Christian truth applied in solving ordinary human problems.

Communication techniques in the mass media are constantly changing. For the church to use these methods of reaching men today, we are finding it necessary to adapt our programs to fit the media. Our message does not change, but the way in which it is presented changes, since we are not concerned primarily with proclamation but with the result of men hearing and knowing Christ.

Kenneth J. Weaver is secretary for mass communications with Mennonite Board of Missions. Mennonite Broadcasts, Inc., is located in Harrisonburg, Va.

The same day that Wm. Martin deplored the American race problem he told a French Canadian that he should either learn to speak better English, or go back to Quebec. I suddenly saw that my own attitude toward the French of my own country was not unlike the problem of race. I determined to, and am now learning conversational French. Since my commitment to break down barriers is serious, I feel I can do no less than to close the gap from my side!

The Great Commission Today

By James R. Hess

It is said that during Civil War times eleven-year-old John H. Mellinger heard a German sermon in the Strasburg, Pa., congregation on Mt. 28:19, 20. The emphasis of the sermon was upon the “all things” of the text. Afterward, Mellinger’s father was unable to answer the boy’s question as to why the minister did not mention the “going into all the world” part of the text. It was this experience, Mellinger later said, that prodded him to action in the mission movement of the Mennonite Church. Later he became the “father of the Lancaster Conference Mission movement.”

A century has passed since young Mellinger heard that sermon. Seventy years ago Mennonites began work in India. More than 50 years ago we entered Argentina and 35 years ago, Tanzania. Since then we have entered more than a score of countries, with hundreds of congregations and worship centers now established in the “mission fields” of the world. The questionings of a young boy in the mid-nineteenth century have been answered in worldwide outreach in this fast-moving and radically changing century that is the twentieth.

We have believed that the message of the Word of God is for all people and cultures. This message went out at the end of the last century and the beginning of this century when many cultures were either quiescent under colonial domination, or newly finding their way among their neighbors. The presentation of the gospel overcame original suspicion by its hearers and was finally received as a new way of life, perhaps often as a religious expression of Western civilization to be accepted with the prestige brought by Western advance. I believe our missionaries carried the gospel to these people with the conviction that this was not merely a Western way of life, but rather that since the West had been blessed with a knowledge of the true God and the true gospel, it was the church’s duty to take this knowledge to those who were not thus blessed. The emphasis to the “home church” was the “go ye” of Matthew 28. The message to the hearers was the “all things.”

Today, in a radically different age than that in which mission work began, when strife among nations, universal social upheaval, and general rebellion, licentiousness, and unbelief are hurting the world toward sure apocalyptic judgment and destruction, we do well to consider if we are truly fulfilling the commission of our Lord.

As we review our church’s outreach in general, our question may well be the inverse of the lad’s in Strasburg a century ago. There is no question about our emphasis on the “go ye.” But are we teaching the “all things” of the gospel? I do not propose to consider what the “all things” are, except to accept them in the context of Anabaptist/Mennonite tradition, which is really biblical tradition. If, for example, the practices Paul gave to the Corinthian church he also insisted upon for the universal church (1 Cor. 4:17; 7:17), dare we do any less? If our aim is to “spread the gospel,” we must be careful lest we spread it too thin.

The observance of the “all things” indicates that our aim is to establish New Testament congregations. If we accept the challenge to go, we must also accept the commission to teach. Cultural barriers dare not deaden our enthusiasm for the truth of the Word, for fear that it is too difficult for others to accept. The Word of God is for the whole world. The teachings of peace are for the militant Latin American, and baptism is for all who believe, even though persecution may result.

There is no compromise in teaching the universal truths and practices of the Word of God. Our concern is not for the propagation of a particular pattern, but for the teaching of the principle itself. All the ordinances of the church can be used in any local culture. To work out the adaptations for the cultures is to understand that culture in which the gospel is bearing fruit. It may be tropical fruit, or Oriental fruit, or European fruit—even with its distinct flavor—but fruit it is, the Lord’s fruit borne in obedience to His Word.

In all phases of church building we need to seek the Lord’s guidance. The following aspects are pertinent for us as a denomination as we build Mennonite churches in the world.

International Brotherhood

We could call this section “home-church foreign-church relationships.” But when there is fellowship we don’t emphasize “home” and “foreign.”

As a reaction to complete patronage of the foreign church by the mission, we used to hear much about the three-self plan of church growth: self-governing, self-financing, and self-propagating. In this pattern a mission would send workers to plant the seed, and as the seed began to grow would withdraw its support so that the national church could develop along its own lines.

A pastor in a large Protestant denomination told me a story that illustrates two extremes. From the United States his denomination has been pouring a “river of gold” to use his words, into a national church in South America for over 50 years. Only a few thousand members comprise that church. Ten years ago a division occurred in the South...
American section, and the group that left the denomination and became completely independent now has from 30 to 50 thousand members. This group in turn has divided and subdivided. The original denomination body was perhaps too much concerned with program and machinery to move out into evangelism, while the divisive groups were so taken up with personalities and pet interpretations that they lost the unity there is in Christ.

Rather than either patronage or independence, does not the Scripture teach us mutual dependence? Missionaries become "fraternal workers" under the orders of the local church. The native genius of dealing with its own people is put to good use as nationals carry the gospel to their fellows. The mission continues a supportive relationship to the national church as long as needed. The Apostle Paul frequently wrote to the churches he had established and visited them when he could. The Jerusalem council sent Paul, Barnabas, Judas, and Silas to Antioch, Syria, and Silicia to establish the Christians in the faith and practice of the Lord. Acts 15. Although there was local autonomy, there was continual fraternal interchange.

_Fidelity to the Word of God_

Paul praised the Thessalonians that they "received the word of God . . . not as the word of men, but as it is in truth, the word of God" (1 Thess. 2:13). This is the Word with the power to transform men. It is ennobling, enriching, and enlightening. It will lift men from the depths of sin and make them new creatures different from the general society about them. Its aim is not to be accommodated to present society, but to transform men out of present society into the kingdom of Christ.

The Word is not lowered to men's level; it lifts men to its level. The identification is upward, not downward. In building churches, we should be as ready to teach the first 16 verses of 1 Corinthians 11 as we are the remainder of the chapter. If we love the Word, we will find joy in teaching it to others so that they may obey it.

This year a Nazarene pastor from Costa Rica was present at our North Coast Easter Week conference. He participated in the communion and feet-washing services. Afterward he wrote me from Costa Rica, saying: "For the first time I was present in a feet-washing service. How interesting! The Bible teaches it! To Him be the glory!"

_Devotion to the Cause_

Perhaps this attitude is best expressed by what one of our Honduran pastors recently wrote. The church council had asked him to transfer to another area to fill a vacancy there. He dragged his feet on this, and no definite conclusion was reached. A few weeks later he wrote me saying that he feared his attitude was wrong, and he wanted to be at the church's disposal. "After all," he said, "the work is the Lord's and not just mine."

Here again I remember an illustration of extremes that I heard in 1956. Two single missionaries arrived in the Philippines for their first terms of service. One carried exactly one suitcase; one half of it was filled with personal effects and the other half with gospel tracts. The other missionary had nearly 100 pieces of baggage, including a grand piano! Which was the more devoted to the cause? The first, at least, was less devoted to the things of this life, and no doubt was more able to break ties with the comforts of the homeland.

Richard C. Halverson has written: "The great mass of New Testament teaching is not how to go out and evangelize, but how to behave toward one another. Fellowship is the matrix of mission. To neglect the fellowship is to sabotage the divine strategy."

I believe that the Spirit working through the church would emphasize quality more than quantity. Each year we open the new Yearbook to see where we stand numerically. Someday will be opened the Eternal Book where the point of interest will be facts and not figures. Our hope in that day, through Christ, will be to hear those words: "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world: . . . ye gave me meat; . . . ye gave me drink; . . . ye clothed me; . . . ye visited me; . . . ye came unto me."

_The Great Exchange_

The Chicago Daily News recently reported an astonishing incident. It began in the comfortable first-class compartment of a crowded London-bound train, when a tall youth rose from his seat and pushed his way into the corridor. There he spoke kindly to a work-weary woman whom he saw standing and swaying to the motion of the rolling car.

"Take my seat," he said.

"I'm not allowed in there," she replied, "I've only a third-class ticket."

But he insisted: "You take my first-class ticket and I'll take yours and find a seat in the carriage beyond."

Tickets were swapped and the young man disappeared down the passageway. He was Prince Charles of England, 19-year-old heir to the British throne!

There is a story of still another exchange even more astounding, however. The One who existed in the form of God "emptied himself" and came into our world as our minister. Mark 10:45.

But lest you get the wrong impression, let me point out that behind our idea of "minister" is the Greek verb, _diakoneo_, meaning "to serve, to care for, to help, to wait on someone else." It depicts a warm heart, soiled hands, rolled-up sleeves, wrinkled trousers, weariness.

And the Son of God gladly played this part. So wholly did He put His life at our disposal, that ultimately He exchanged His for ours. Deity went third-class, so to speak, that we might go first-class. He died that we might live not only a future life of bliss but a present existence of unselfish service to others. Mark 10:42-44. — Gerald Hawthorne.

An Open Letter

Howard J. Zehr
Executive Secretary,
Mennonite General Conference
Scottsdale, Pa. 15683.

Dear Howard:

Sometimes I wonder if the Mennonite Church might be bankrupt financially and not even know it. I wonder further if the time has come for a top level meeting of representatives from conferences and churchwide boards and agencies to bring into focus the total financial picture of our church — our total indebtedness, our resources, and future directions.

I am increasingly uneasy about what I hear and see. A Gospel Herald “Field Note” indicates that giving to General Conference is 26 percent behind in receipts for its budget. A note in my congregation’s bulletin tells of the Mission Board’s financial squeeze and requests prayer for administrators to discern where to cut back in the program.

It’s not hard to perceive how our brotherhood could become bankrupt and we would not know it! Each conference is autonomous with its own mission program and many with educational programs. Each of our Boards is independent and each feels a mandate to move ahead vigorously in its area of responsibility. Plans are developed and commitments made without reference to other Board programs. The only assumption common to each Board is that the constituency will support the effort — the money is there! It’s a matter of going after it and of making the story clear.

I would like to propose that as Executive Secretary of General Conference you convene a high level meeting of representatives from each conference district, each churchwide board and agency, along with dedicated lay brethren competent in financial matters to determine:

a. The indebtedness and future plan for each district conference mission board.

b. The indebtedness and future plan for each of our conference-related high schools.

c. The indebtedness and future plan for each of our colleges and seminaries.

d. The indebtedness and future plan for our Publishing House.

e. The indebtedness and future plan for General Conference and its agencies.

f. The indebtedness and future plan for the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities and the institutions under its control.

g. The indebtedness of individual congregations, if this could somehow be made available, along with the indebtedness of other organizations such as church camps.

Such a meeting may indeed be sobering. It should not provide an occasion for recrimination, rather it should provide an occasion for assessing priorities and discovering where we need to expand and to retract.

Unless there is some sort of high level agreement, there is the possibility that the constituency will be confronted with high pressure appeals from all agencies as they seek to survive in the midst of overwhelming debt and shrinking contributions. (Shrinking contributions to churchwide boards is a common experience in Protestantism. Money seems to be available for local rather than general projects.)

I doubt if each congregation wants to be confronted with a crash program from each college for building projects, or for operating expenses; from General Conference to meet payrolls; from the mission boards to maintain their present programs, and in turn to be questioned about its loyalty, or commitment, or stewardship if funds are not forthcoming.

Personally, I feel it’s time for our church boards and agencies to get their houses in order, and to present to the constituency clear, well thought through, realistic, and integrated requests that reflect a sense of priority.

The high level meeting should take into account what is realistic for a constituency of nearly 100,000 people. What funds are actually available and how should they be secured? Can a constituency of our size support three colleges, ten high schools, and two seminaries? How large an overseas endeavor is our group capable of? Can a constituency this size provide a market to maintain one publishing interest, let alone two or three? How large a staff can such a constituency maintain to assist it in matters such as youth work, stewardship, and Christian education? To what extent is any interest group free to set up programs or institutions with license to secure funds anywhere in the church?

And coupled with all of this are the increased expenses of local congregations, and the tragically underpaid men who serve as pastors. Something drastic must be done to upgrade the income of most of these men. What other calling demands so much and in return receives so little in this world’s goods? Because their reward is great in heaven provides no excuse for our requiring of these men such extreme sacrifice.

It seems to me, Howard, that we are at a point in history where we can no longer proceed with a business-as-usual stance with each Board going ahead as heretofore only with more powerful and more sophisticated drives to secure funds. Sooner rather than later we must know as a brotherhood where we really are financially. As a responsible brotherhood we must be ready to take those steps to curtail in some places and to expand in others so that we may indeed carry out His commission in today’s world.

Sincerely,

Paul M. Lederach

KAMA—On No Map But God’s

by Bob Harms, TAP, Congo

Today is Christmas. The sun is shining and the trees and grass are bright green. The women are wearing colorful new pagnes; the church is decorated with flowers in every window and woven palm branches across the doors. There were 1,700 people in church last Sunday for the school Christmas program. Each class recited some verses and sang a song. This morning it was the adult’s turn. Each neighborhood presented a special number.

The village of Kama is only three degrees south of the equator, yet the weather is not unbearably hot, and the nights are usually cool. It rains almost every day of the year except during the two dry seasons, one in August and the other in January.

Kama is not really a village, which explains why we were never able to find it on the map. It is a mission, which means there is a mission, which means there is a church, two schools, a medical dispensary, a print shop, an airstrip, houses for the two missionary families, the two Paxmen, Nancy and me, and the homes of the African pastors, teachers, medical assistants and other workers.

To get here one takes a plane to Goma, a beautiful city located among the volcanoes on the northern shore of Lake Kivu, right on the eastern border of the Congo. Then one takes the twice weekly boat across the lake to Bukavu. From Bukavu one heads west over the mountains and down down down into the tropical rain forest. It is a 200 mile trip over a road about as smooth as a dry creek bed. The Landrover makes it in a minimum of 14 hours, a truck takes about five days. But this road is our lifeline, and the trucks that come down once a month are our only source of supplies and mail.

This is the territory of the powerful Warega tribe. Being isolated in the forest, the Warega did not develop great kingdoms as one finds in other regions of the Congo, yet their civilization was far more advanced than the majority of forest people. They have made tools and arms from iron for hundreds of years. Their oral literature includes well over a thousand proverbs, an infinite number of folk tales, and a body of laws that could have come straight out of the Old Testament.

The mission was started by Sam Vinton, one of the most incredible men you could ever hope to meet. He came here over 40 years ago with the intention of building, not tearing down what the people had, a philosophy that seemed quite radical at the time. The results are evident today. When he celebrated the 40th anniversary of his arrival, over 250 village and sector chiefs came to wish him well. Some walked for five days to get here. Typically, he gave each one two gifts—a Bible and a machete—and told them to preach the Gospel and to get to work developing their villages.

It is difficult to overestimate the importance of the mission to this area. Almost everything the people have over and above the level of a subsistence economy is due to the mission. It is responsible for over 40 primary schools, numerous dispensaries, carpenter shops, palm tree nurseries, palm oil presses, goat herds, and other community development projects. Mr. Vinton introduced such foods as sweet manioc, pineapples, bananas and grapefruit to the area.

During the past decade the region has been ravaged by three rebellions which destroyed much of what has been built up over the years. Each time, when the danger subsided, the people came back out of the forest and worked together to rebuild their communities. At the present time we are in the process of rebuilding from the 1987 mercenary-led rebellion. The community pitched in to help build a 12-room elementary school. The secondary school was built of mud bricks pressed by the students themselves; each one made 250 bricks. With brick presses supplied by the U. S. government, grade schools are going up all over the area.

Nancy teaches 20 hours a week of French, plus algebra and chemistry in the secondary school. In addition to the regular grammar units, her French classes are now working on poetry and plays. Some of the students had never heard of a poem before this year, but their response is encouraging. Last week after one of her classes finished a poem that describes the life of an African woman, she heard one of the students remark, "My mother is just like that." The plays are a real success because the students seem to be natural actors.

Her chemistry lab consists of a Gilbert chemistry set which our director has bought for his children. We are grateful for it. Some schools function with less. The totally new concept of atoms and molecules really has the students wiped out. They find it easy to memorize the facts and repeat them on a test, but I doubt if many of them really believe it; they are constantly looking for a substance that isn’t made of molecules. Since there are no books, she prepares stenciled sheets, which adds to the work for both teacher and students.
When I was in Belgium for French language study, I used to joke, “Give me a good textbook and I can teach anything.” I eat those words six days a week. I teach physics, geometry, history, geography, English, African Sociology, and all the Bible courses in the school. Textbooks? The students have them for geography—that’s all. Since science equipment is nonexistent, I make spring scales out of rubber bands and slide rules out of plywood. The print shop is now printing a small English-French dictionary for use in English classes.

Of course I don’t know anything about African Sociology, and there is something-absurd about Americans trying to teach Africans how Africans live. So the class didn’t meet for three months. In the meantime I read everything I could find about Africa, the best source on this area being a book published in Belgium in 1909. Now the class has already collected over 700 Warega proverbs, over 50 folk tales, charted the structure and migrations of the major clans in the area, and described the hunting and fishing methods of the Warega. We have invited the chief of a neighboring village to explain the traditional forms of political organization.

Although we feel hopelessly inadequate for our task, it is encouraging to know that our work is necessary. Our secondary school is the only one for 150 miles in any direction. The situation here reminds one of the medieval university. Students come from great distances and live in poverty in order to go to school. This fall two students were turned away for each one who was admitted to the school. The result is a bunch of students eager to learn, which makes teaching most enjoyable.

They work under great handicaps. Since they are not used to having books, their early education consisted of memorizing little rules and summaries put up on the blackboard by the teacher. This is inadequate for secondary school, which demands the absorption of large quantities of material. We leave our personal books in the school for students to read, but in reply, they quote a proverb, “A book without a teacher is nothing.” If we could change this idea we would accomplish a great deal.

The second handicap is the French language, which is native to neither the students nor the teachers. Also, the courses here are harder than their equivalents in American high schools, and few of the teachers are specialists in what they’re teaching. I sometimes teach things that I’ve never heard of before preparing the lesson. In spite of it all, they’re learning and so are we.
Jesus and Your Niece Church, by Ed Richter. Eerdmans Publishing House. 1969. 88 pp. $1.65 (paper).

The author of this book, a veteran newspaperman and a churchman with experience in church bureaucracy, presents a very incisive evaluation of much of church work, including work of committee and church executives. He not only points out the failure of the church in many areas but provides a chapter on "Some Ways Out," and one on "Well, What Do You Suggest?"

The writing style is fresh, crisp, and penetrating. In his first chapter, "It's a Different World, Jesus," he writes a dialogue with Jesus, to explain things so that He will be sure to understand our present situation. In another chapter he discusses "A Disease Called Verbitis" in which he satirizes much of our committee work which results in reams of pronouncements, analyses, and suggestions which mean little. He tells how many church bureaucrats waste money from pennies given by poor people, and these officers often do not know really what they are doing or why.

He suggests that "committees kill more ideas than they generate." We certainly can learn a lot and become aware of our organizational dangers by reading this small book. It's easy, fascinating reading with a real punch line. — Nelson E. Kauffman.

Fish for My People, by Robert L. Howell. Morehouse-Barlow, publishers. 1968. 94 pp. $2.50 (paper).

In this small volume the author tells the simple but fascinating story of how a congregation took some very simple steps to make Christianity relevant in terms of service to those in need and so developed what today is known as "FISH," a program for giving help to people in time of emergency. The pastor on Mar. 8, 1964, preached a sermon on the human need in the area of his church building and how the lay members might meet those needs in the name and spirit of Christ. As a result, by the time training for the program was scheduled, 58 persons were ready to share, mostly women. A telephone number was established, available 24 hours a day. Services given in emergency situations are babysitting, providing a meal, housework for the sick, transportation, and locating needed articles. Other services are reading for the blind, companionship for elderly, rides for shut-ins, teenage-adult companionship, etc.

The author in one chapter tells how the program demonstrates God’s love for people through His church. This service is guided by ten principles which keep the service from being abused. This book should be read by our WMSA’s and by all who want to have a meaningful service relationship in the community. This type of program is best done interdenominationally and could be a real complement to our Mennonite Disaster Service. With our practical genius we could be leaders in developing a "fish" program in our communities. The author gives many stories of the kind of help given and how the program has been started in other communities. Excellent for church libraries. — Nelson E. Kauffman.

Whitney Young has been Executive Director of the National Urban League since 1961, and makes a most excellent presentation on the issue of racism under five chapter topics: The Open Society; Black America; White America; Building an Open Society; and Responsibility for Change. In these well-written pages the author presents a very fair, honest, and realistic picture of the problems of race in our nation. He does not defend the black man just because he is black. He is not an Uncle Tom. He gives many most sensible and practical suggestions for action to solve race problems. At the same time he does not minimize the seriousness of the issues and the urgency of action.

This is a fine resource book to aid discussion and efforts to overcome racism. The author does see a bit of progress in understanding between the races but describes the long distance the Whites have yet to go in granting equal rights. It seems to this reviewer that this book is one of the best on the market to help Whites to see the real issues. It is my hope that it will receive a wide reading. Excellent for church libraries. — Nelson Kauffman.

Build, Brother, Build, by Leon H. Sullivan. Macrae Smith Co. 1969. 191 pp. $4.95

This is Rev. Sullivan’s own story of how some can now be assisted from poverty to economic power. Beginning in his own parish in Philadelphia, Pastor Sullivan developed the kind of grass-roots training and placement centers needed to help people become job ready.

The Opportunities Industrialization Centers movement which began in Philadelphia has now spread to many other cities large and small. Many of the government programs are patterned to a large extent after this modest beginning.

The book reveals the making of a minister, for in addition to reporting on the project, Mr. Sullivan tells his life story. It is the usual difficult struggle of a black leader in a biased America. The obstacles often seemed insurmountable and the opposition was sometimes violent. However, Sullivan is no ordinary man. He has the Christian faith to see him through and to ward off discouragement. The difficult years give way to success. Now many have come to his assistance and for his advice.

At all times Rev. Sullivan’s church gave him the best of support. Members of Zion Baptist Church were always most sympathetic even with the necessary buying boycotts of biased firms. The officers of the church not only shared their minister but many volunteered to work free of charge in the program.

This book is a must for the noninvolved preacher and congregation. It demonstrates what can be done if a church will only stand behind its leader. Fine for church libraries. — Vern Miller.

The author is a pastor and has had twenty-five years of experience in counseling and lecturing on marriage problems. He also wrote an earlier book, the excellent Design for Christian Marriage.

Here the author zeros in on communication as the key to success in marriage. The reader becomes convinced that all other problems find their solutions if a married couple know how to communicate, and are willing to practice what they know. Small is well read in the whole field of communications and he draws on the principles of semantics and the proved methods of dialogue, with many quotes from the leading authorities, to point the way to openness of mind and heart among the married.

The author says many things that would apply to any other human relationship, but he never forgets for long that he is talking on marriage problems, and draws his illustrations from the home. At times he falls into the jargon of the communications expert, but he is always clear and easy to read. Anecdotes and a little humor brighten his writing style.

The viewpoint is frankly Christian, and the theological assumptions are evangelical. I heartily recommend this book to all married people. I know none who do not need its counsels. Pastors and counselors will find it useful. An excellent book in every way. Should be available in church libraries. — Paul Erb.

First Mennonite CO in Switzerland

Mennonites in Switzerland are peaceful people but they are also obedient citizens. Peace with God and peace with one's neighbor is much emphasized, but when the Swiss government distributes the military uniforms, as it does to all men at age 20, the Mennonites put them on without question or murmur. Some serve with the gun, others without it, but all serve.

All, except Michael Gerber, son of Samuel Gerber, director of the Bienenberg Bible School. He refuses to put on the uniform, and refuses to serve in the army medical corps. He is the first Mennonite in Switzerland to take this position in a very long time, perhaps in centuries. Others who have had conscientious scruples against military service have emigrated, but Michael is staying.

January 26 was his trial in Solothurn. There is no provision in Swiss law for conscientious objectors and they traditionally find themselves on a one-way street leading straight to jail. They serve for periods up to three years. Since there is no provision for trial by civilian court, as there is in America and a number of European countries, he will need to face the military court.

The War Resisters League of Switzerland sent out invitations asking that people attend Michael Gerber’s trial and come to a public discussion afterward in a hotel. “We believe the problem of conscientious objection urgently needs to be solved,” they say. Pointing out that Michael is refusing military service on ethical and political grounds, they go on to say, “With this refusal he wants to:

— register opposition against war and even more than that, actively demonstrate for peace.
— take the first step necessary in order to prevent the total annihilation of mankind, — draw the attention of the public to the seriousness of the problem CO’s face,
— help in the struggle against reactionary right-wing forces which are determined to prevent the recognition of CO’s in Switzerland,
— try to prevent Switzerland from becoming a totalitarian state.”

Many North American Mennonites know Michael Gerber, the redheaded young man who accompanied the 1968 tour of the Bienenberg Choir. Few in his native Switzerland and not all in his Anabaptist-Mennonite Church will understand him. Anyone wishing to write Michael in English, German, or French should simply address it to Michael Gerber, c/o Samuel Gerber, Bienenberg, 4410 Liestal, Switzerland.

Mission Work Grows in Araguacema

Araguaçema (pop. 3,000) is a town in northern Brazil, located midway between Brasilia, the capital city, and Belem, on the northern coast. The area is isolated, accessible only by air. The economy centers around ranching, fishing, and truck farming. Once a year the cattle are driven by horseback to markets 100-300 miles away.

In 1955 Mennonite Board of Missions began a witness in Araguacema. The work today includes a medical clinic with midwifery program, education, and agricultural assistance. Two nurses run the clinic; the closest medical doctor is 100 miles by air.

Five Brazilian Mennonites teach at the local school. The government pays the salary of one teacher, with additional financial resources covered by tuition and Mission Board subsidy. Three self-supporting Overseas Missions Associate families aid and supervise an agricultural improvement program. Robert Gerber coordinates the mission program in the Araguacema area.

Teo Penner, originally from Curitiba, Brazil, and a graduate of Montevideo Mennonite Seminary, pastors the Mennonite church in Araguacema. The church has requested Voluntary Service workers from the church in São Paulo State, southern Brazil, to teach in Araguacema and outlying areas. South Brazilian Mennonites are considering establishing such a VS program.

In nearby Dois Irmaos, the Brazilians recently planned and constructed a church building. Young men from Araguacema helped with the building on two occasions. “We cut and hauled wood for the timbers, clay for the bricks, stones for the foundation, and sand for cement and plaster,” Gerber wrote recently. “Upon completion, we held public meetings and many people attended. Enthusiasm in Dois Irmaos is very high. One church in Curitiba gave $120 toward construction.”

Fishing, farming, ranching, teaching, healing, preaching — God is alive in Araguacema, providing His people with increasing opportunities to meet the whole needs of their fellowmen.
President Nixon Praises Mennonites

Mennonite Disaster Service volunteers will feel unusually warmed to learn that President Richard M. Nixon recently commended them for their "magnificent service rendered."

While the letter refers only to the MDS operation in Virginia, the Mennonite Central Committee accepted it on behalf of all the MDS volunteers, including those who worked in Mississippi.

William T. Snyder, who replied to the Chief Executive of the White House, reported to the MCC Akron staff that as far as he could recall this was the first letter MCC received from a President commenting on some phase of MCC's ministry. There have been other letters from other Presidents, of course, but those were in reply to MCC's initiative.

Canadian Mennonites, unsuccessful in their attempts to attract the attention of their Prime Minister, will be interested in noting that the Nixon letter refers to the good work of Canadian Mennonites, also.

Seeks New Dean

The Eastern Mennonite College Board of Trustees has named a Dean Selection Committee to fill the position of dean currently held by Ira E. Miller who has announced his intentions to resign within the next two years.

Dewitt Heatwole, Chairman of the Board, said that Bro. Miller has expressed a desire not to serve as dean beyond the age of 60, a precedent established by his predecessor.

Mr. Heatwole said that the committee consists of representatives from these groups: administration, alumni, faculty, students, and trustees. The Board of Trustees will make the final selection based on the findings of the committee.

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

January 21, 1970

Dear Mr. Bennett:

Since I have long known of and admired the outstanding work of our country's Mennonites, I was not surprised to learn of the magnificent service rendered by the Mennonite Disaster Service in Virginia in the aftermath of Hurricane Camille. I understand that Mennonite volunteers from many states and Canada came to the areas worst hit by the storm and took part in searches, cleared away debris, repaired many homes and businesses -- and even constructed several new houses.

Several months after the storm had passed, I am told, there were still scores of Mennonite volunteers at work in Virginia.

Words cannot adequately express the value of the contribution these gallant volunteers have made. Their greatest satisfaction will, I know, lie in the knowledge that they have given of themselves selflessly and well, and that they have the gratitude of the nation they have served. I am pleased to commend them for their excellent work and for the example they set for all their fellow citizens.

With best wishes,

Sincerely,

Richard Nixon

What Have You to Do with Peace?

How can the church really be a minister of reconciliation? What is the church’s relationship to the state? In the face of inevitable “wars and rumors of war” is working for peace realistic?

The study of such relevant questions is dealt with in a recently released booklet written by Walter Klaassen, professor of church history at Conrad Grebel College, Waterloo, Ontario. The booklet is entitled “What Have You to Do with Peace?”

Staying close to Scripture and theology in its discussion, the 11-chapter study focuses on what it means to be a Christian disciple and the problems connected with active peacemaking.

“The study booklet would be useful in Mennonite and Brethren in Christ congregations,” John A. Lapp, executive secretary of the MCC Peace Section, says. “It is relevant to the gospel, our historical tradition, and the problems of our age. Its value is not diminished by saying that this is the only recent study that serves this purpose.”

The booklet is available from MCC (Ont.), 50 Kent Ave., Kitchener, and the MCC Peace Section, 21 S, 12th St., Akron, Pa. 17501, at 35c per copy.

700 Volunteers in Service for ‘70

A record number of 700 persons are currently serving under the Mennonite Central Committee in projects located in 29 different countries, the United States, and Canada. This figure represents a 90.2 percent increase of MCC personnel in one decade.

Two hundred and seventy-four persons entered service during 1969 which was an increase of 26 from 1968.

Expanding the Teachers Abroad Program (TAP) to Bolivia and Algeria brought the number of TAP-ers up to 209 this past year.

The Voluntary Service program opened new units in Canada and the U.S. during 1969 and had an increase in workers.

Personnel Services has predicted that the greatest need for 1970 will be for teachers. At least 150 will be needed to fill the demands for TAP programs in Africa, Newfoundland, and Jamaica, as well as the Urban Teacher Corps (UTC), a teaching program for the inner city.

Lavon Welty, associate secretary of per-personnel services, emphasized the need for overseas agriculturists, as well as the need for volunteers with general skills who would be willing to serve where they can be used best. Administrative personnel will also be needed within the next year.

Due to the expanding VS programs in the cities and Appalachia, sociology majors and those interested in social welfare are also in demand.

Welty expressed disappointment in the reaction to the draft lottery system by a few prospective volunteers who have withdrawn their applications for service because their birthdays fall in the low priority group and chances are slim that their numbers will be called this year. He said that the church must continue to maintain its service emphasis and encourage it more than ever at this time. Persons interested in service opportunities should write to the Mennonite Central Committee, Akron, Pa. 17501.

Eastern Board Adopts Budget for 1970

The final contribution received at Salunga on Dec. 31, 1969, was in the amount of $6,000, the gift of a brother and sister. This contribution covered the remaining deficit in 1969 mission accounts, and added $3,000 to mission balances in hand to begin the new year.

"I almost cried for joy," said a sister in a letter to Treasurer Ira Buckwalter, "when I heard you tell of the brother and sister whose gift covered the remaining deficit and added to the balances in hand. I had prayed you would receive enough, but my faith was faltering." This letter symbolizes the prayers of gratitude of many in the Eastern Board constituency. In the Jan. 14 budget session of the Eastern Board, Raymond Charles read Psalm 126 as a testimony of gratitude, and of fresh commitment to sowing the gospel seed. The new budget calls for $1,500,042.

This is the fourth consecutive year that total receipts increased by $100,000. During the year contributions from outside Lancaster Conference came to 8 percent of the total (cf. 10 percent in previous years). The total increase in balances in all accounts was $37,779. It has been agreed to discontinue the practice of reporting forwarding accounts as part of Eastern Board budget. The new budget, an increase of 6 percent, provides for inflation and modest expansion.

A major factor in bringing together the funds for the missions portion of the budget, as distinguished from the relief and Voluntary Service accounts, was the annual December appeal for General Mission Fund. The congregations responded well — of 150 responding only 8 gave less per member than a year ago. Responses to Dec. 31 totaled $301,542.22. Additional contributions have been received since that date; the goal of an average of $20 per member has been slightly exceeded.

Japanese Missionary Serves in South America

Hiroshi Kaneko, the first missionary radio worker sent from the Japan Mennonite Church to serve in another country, is in fact the first radio worker to be sent to any overseas location from a foreign church established by Mennonite Board of Missions. Kaneko-san was former director of follow-up for the "Japanese Mennonite Hour." When Mennonite Broadcasts discontinued its program and joined forces with Horemcio, a religious broadcasting organization, the Japan church enthusiastically agreed to support Kaneko-san as a missionary in Ecuador. He is now at radio station HCJB working in production and follow-up for the Japanese broadcast there.

There are Japanese living in many parts of South America and much of the mail response to the broadcast comes from Latin-American countries. For many people the program is much-needed communication with someone who thinks and speaks their language.

In a recent report to Mennonite Broadcasts Kaneko-san quoted a listener who wrote from Chile: "It was early in August while turning the dial that I heard the old cherry blossom song, followed by the Japanese program. I was really surprised and overjoyed at the good program."

Another person wrote, "We are very thankful for the gospel broadcasts which come to us every evening, because we found no church here since we moved from Sao Paulo, Brazil."

Kaneko-san reports that they received correspondence from more than 3,000 Japanese listeners in 1969. This is small compared to the 29,000 responses to Spanish programs, but nevertheless indicates a significant audience.

Hiroshi Kaneko, with his wife and two children, moved to Ecuador in August 1969.

Mennonites Locate in Durham

"You are the first live Mennonite preacher I ever met," a Baptist minister commented upon meeting Frank Nice, pastor of a newly formed congregation in Durham, N.C. What other type of Mennonite minister exists is still a mystery with Frank.

In August of 1969, Frank Nice and his family moved to 1114 East Geer Street in Durham. It took a few weeks to settle, but by September his children were in school and Frank was soon teaching carpentry full time at a vocational industrial school.

Durham, a city of 110,000 people, is the home of Duke University with 8,000 students. Twenty percent of all cigarettes manufactured in the United States are made in Durham. Frank would like to see some aggressive farmer move into the community to demonstrate how other things can be raised besides tobacco. Other crops like soybeans are possible in this area. Few dairy farms are located in Durham County, and Frank does not know why.

Durham with its diversified industries offers plenty of opportunity for persons seeking a new location to live. Living costs are high, but vocations are limitless in industrial, educational, and professional areas.

The Mennonite Church is new in Durham. Some 15 to 20 people gather at Frank's home each Sunday morning for worship and Sunday school. The few Mennonite families living and working in Durham are looking forward to a more appropriate place of worship.

Pastor Nice envisions many witness opportunities in Durham. He already sees the need for a VS unit and a day care center. He is also exploring Project 2 Plan, the city's urban renewal project. Around 400 persons would be relocated, according to the city planning commission's report.

Durham is the second city in North Carolina where the Virginia Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities has personnel. A VS unit and a small congregation of believers have begun in Winston-Salem.

"Durham is only one example of what can and should be done in more cities of the South," said Moses Slabaugh, secretary for the Virginia Board. "This is a day of opportunity to proclaim the unsearchable riches of Christ and to build His church."
MCC Ships Nearly 3 Million Pounds for Relief

Recently compiled figures indicate that the Mennonite Central Committee shipped 2,927,151 pounds of relief supplies overseas in 1969. A breakdown of the shipments reveals that Asia received 50 percent of the relief supplies; Africa, 20 percent; the Middle East, 17 percent; and Latin America, 13 percent. Over 916,000 pounds of clothing and bedding were shipped in 1969. Jordan's East Bank received 411,000 pounds, Tanzania received nearly 111,000 pounds, and Algeria, 68,000 pounds. During the past year, more clothing has been sent to tropical countries. Food shipments totaling 1,500,000 pounds were increased from 1968. India received 472,000 pounds of foodstuffs. Other countries which received large shipments were Korea, Vietnam, Tanzania, and Hong Kong. Shipments of soap and medical supplies were down in 1969 with 394,500 pounds sent as compared to 436,500 pounds in 1968. One main reason for the cut in shipping medicines was their availability within the countries of Vietnam, Tanzania, and Congo through governmental sources. India received the most aid in this area totaling 140,000 pounds. Korea, Taiwan, and Paraguay also received substantial aid.

During 1969, MCC was able to resume shipments to Algeria. Much of the goods sent was used to pay national workers for projects in which they are involved. Also, shipments to Honduras were increased from 25,000 pounds in 1968 to 165,000 pounds for aid to refugees after the war with El Salvador.

Projecting for 1970, John Hostetler, MCC director of material aid, said that more emphasis will be given to solicit contributions for self-help projects and educational programs in developing countries.

Readers Say

Submissions to Readers Say column should comment on printed articles.

Correction: The letter in the Jan. 20 issue was written by Elam W. Stauffer and not Elma W. Stauffer as given.

I want to express my appreciation for two editorials — the one in the Jan. 13 issue, "Atrocities on Trial," and the other in the Jan. 20 issue, "Tongues — Sing of the Spirit!" I praise God so much for this article. So does my husband and others I have talked with. It is so true that we have been ignorant of the work of the Holy Spirit. But, God is moving by His Spirit, and we are learning and beginning to be moved by His Spirit. — Mrs. Earl Moyer, Sellersville, Pa.

I want to commend you on your many outstanding articles and editorials in the Gospel Herald. I appreciated the one on the other week comparing some of our religious leaders to Saul later called Paul. I can tell God is very real and precious to you. Thank you so much for being faithful to God and writing as He directs. I know God has blessed you for your faithfulness and will continue to bless you.

Now I want to commend you for the editorial in the Jan. 20 issue — Tongues — Sing of the Spirit! — I praise God so much for this article. So does my husband and others I have talked with. It is so true that we have been ignorant of the work of the Holy Spirit. But, God is moving by His Spirit, and we are learning and beginning to be moved by His Spirit. — Mrs. Earl Moyer, Sellersville, Pa.

I just finished reading the January 20 issue of the Gospel Herald, and would like to express my appreciation for printing two very good articles, "Peace — The Vine or the Grape?" by Warren M. Wenger and "No Vision — Perish!" by Earl B. Eberly. The Mennonites for many years have been known as the "Quiet of the Land" and we feel now is the time to reach out beyond our own group in order to reach more souls for Christ. This is good. However, we often become so involved in social problems and in peace demonstrations, thereby thinking we are producing more "fruit" by becoming thus involved; without first completely surrendering ourselves to the True Vine which is Christ.

Both of these articles testify to the fact that we need to "die with Christ" before He grants us the fruit of the Spirit. Until we are willing to "die with Christ," or until we see ourselves a complete failure without Christ, we'll never be where God wants us to be.

I would encourage readers to read these articles if they haven't done so. Let's have more articles like these in our Gospel Herald. — Mrs. Morris Hershberger, Harrisonville, Mo.

I want to tell you how much I enjoyed the articles in the Gospel Herald. I think the "new look" it has had for some time now makes it more interesting to everyone, but especially to the youth of the Mennonite Church. It no longer looks dull and uninteresting, and the articles are more vital and alive. I very much appreciated the "Prayers of Luke Warm." I think they "hit us where it hurts."

I always appreciate Robert Baker's writing and hope that his article, "A Few Words from the

Thank you for helping one in my Christian experience.—Mrs. Alvin Detweiler, Doylestown, Pa.

I greatly appreciated your editorial “Tongues—Sign of the Spirit?” in the Jan. 20 issue. For several years I too have heard statements...made which build a basis for reproach for a movement which has much to offer the church.

It may be that only one of my acquaintances is acquainted with the Holy Spirit and function in several of the ministering gifts without the discovery of an unknown language. My own experience before and after bears witness to that. However, it will have to be admitted that there is a dimension of communication with God, and personal edification, that can only be found through the personal exercise of an unknown language.

I noticed in your references to 1 Corinthians 12 and 14 you failed to take into consideration two distinct functions of an unknown language. The one being for private use, for one’s personal edification (1 Cor. 14:2-4), is to be incorporated into one’s prayer life, but which does not necessarily edify others around you (1 Cor. 14:14-17). The other is for corporate use, one of the ministry gifts, referred to in 1 Corinthians 12:10 as “divisions of tongues.” The usage of this ministering gift Paul declares must be accompanied by its companion gift, “the interpretation of tongues” (1 Cor. 12:10), in order for corporate edification to take place (1 Cor. 14:4.5, 13, 18, 19, 26-28). The former is a dimension in prayer that is available for every Christian, even as salvation is to “whosoever” will believe. The latter is a ministry gift that the Holy Spirit divides so every man shall receive as he will (1 Cor. 12:11), even as the gifts of preaching and teaching.

Since it is evident that one who knows from experience edification from both of these usages of an unknown language is liable to interpret differently 1 Corinthians 12 and 14, as well as the Acts 2 account, etc., than someone who has not known. It behooves each of us to continually check our personal validity by the fruit of the Spirit which you so aptly pointed out as “the test of the possession of the Holy Spirit.”

May God bless you for sharing with us so freely on this subject. May our editorial ministry continue to enhance communication and mutual understanding in our brotherhood. I’m sure it will.—Harold L. Mast, Kokomo, Ind.

In your Jan. 29 issue, a man made reference to Hubert Brown as a militant because of the article he had written. I must admit it isn’t very often that I thoroughly read your magazine, but when I do read it I notice that much cannot be said in something I shouldn’t have missed. The first thing I did was to hunt up the Nov. 4 issue and read it.

When I finished, I came to the conclusion that Mr. Kanagy must have made a misinterpretation of the article. What Mr. Brown was saying is very true. Although you are not directly involved in something wrong you’re just as bad as the person who is, when you act like he has your approval.

When someone is closed mouthed about something, people can apply this silence to whichever side they find convenient. In the case of the Blacks, the Mennonites are the “silent majority,” and the world is conveniently applying this status quo where they choose. As Hubert said: “Together we are all guilty, and together we must do something to stop this present system of racism!”

Thank you for allowing me to express my opinion on this subject also.—Peggy Jones, Phoenixville, Pa.

Greetings, the latest Jan. 20 Gospel Herald is loaded with some real jewels in the “Readers Say” section. May I lay up a few treasures also?

I was happy to see a statement in the Jan. 20 Gospel Herald urging the use of Mennonite curricula against Christian education products from independent religious publishers and/or fringe groups within the Mennonite Church—“Comparing Curricula” by Paul Leidener. I admit I’ve preached it and if I’m not careful I find myself launching out in defense of Herald Press and the Publishing House with harangue as vicious and distorted as that summary never appearing in some of these competitive publications.

To me, the decline in use of Herald Press curriculum and advocating the use of other publications wending their way through the church have always struck me as a poor testimony demonstrating lack of faith in those persons who have been appointed to produce biblical, quality materials for our churches. This is our Publishing House who has written it and the materials it produces as a total body? Why must we constantly let in these competitive forces constantly pounding on our church doors?

Isn’t there some way of providing windows of cooperation for theological viewpoints through our official church and Sunday school publications? Let’s have more dialogue on this issue. As the A.T. & T. ad says, “Reach out for one another.” To communicate is the beginning of understanding.”—Jim Bishop, Elkhart, Ind.

I have been shocked by the criticism that you have received concerning the Dec. 9 article “Conversation with Erm.” I felt that the author gave a well-balanced presentation of the dangers on both sides, the left-wing and the right-wing influences. If one doubts the tactics of the far-right movement, I recommend highly the reading of the book, “The American Far Right,” by John Redekop which is a case study of Billy James Hargis and Christian Crusade.

Senator Hatfield writes the introduction to this book. Several of his comments are to the point of my concern: “The Far Right has been successfully united by a well-designed, well-financed, and well-supported plan of action. The far-left communism is both the fire and the fuel of the Far Right movement. Far Rightists often equate communism with the devil and America with God, and to the Far Righters, is a personification of a white, Protestant, anticommunist American. They have turned the scriptural tables and created God in their image. This unholy marriage of religion and politics has produced a perverted Christianity based not on love but hate, not on charity but persecution. The Far Righters are definitely not practicing religious fundamentalism, as they claim, but are actually practicing a form of paganism. They worship at the idol of ‘country’ and have substituted the gospel of anti-communism for the gospel of Christ.”

How relevant the words of the Apostle Paul in Galatians 1:6, 7: “I am astonished to find you... following a different gospel... there are persons trying to distort the gospel of Christ (NEB).” I commend you as editor for publishing this article and calling the church to be on guard against a “perverted Christianity” and a “form of paganism” and substituting another gospel for the gospel of Christ. We are either accepting the true gospel or a caricature of the true! This kind of article should not appear on the page “For Discussion,” as was recommended. Or certainly not, left completely out of the Gospel Herald.—Norman Derstine, Harrisonburg, Va.

TIMOTHY
The Young Elder
by Mary Helm Clarke

Here is a novel that was prepared as the result of a Presbyterian Sunday school class asking, "Why?" Why was Timothy put in prison? Why did Paul choose Timothy, a young man of sixteen, to take the place of Mark? Where was Timothy when Paul was stoned at Lystra? What did he do? Why was Timothy chosen to head the church at Ephesus instead of the great orator, Apollos?

In the story you meet many other characters who lived in Timothy's day. You'll find the story exciting. Details of Timothy's life will appear that are normally overlooked when reading the Scripture.

The Image of the Church

By Wesley Hartzell

Not long ago one of the television stations in Chicago decided to produce a documentary program showing some of the innovations in religion. It showed nuns participating in a Catholic mass by playing guitars. It showed an inner-city minister directing a job training program for Negroes. It showed a so-called night club priest whose parish was Chicago’s garish cabaret-lined Rush Street and who kept hours from 7 p.m. to 4 a.m. to be available to his “parishioners.”

The TV producers wished to obtain a viewpoint (to be shown on the same documentary) which ran counter to these innovations, i.e., a minister who would see nothing good in them. They chose an evangelical pastor. And not just any evangelical pastor, either, but one who had come to public attention—and no doubt to theirs—by virtue of his having previously led a “march of ministers” to the state capital at Springfield to object to open housing laws, i.e., laws that would provide qualified Negroes the right to purchase homes, on an equal basis with white buyers, in all-white communities.

This was their “typical” evangelical and/or fundamentalist viewpoint.

The same minister had achieved other notoriety by campaigning in his own suburb against the establishment of a human relations commission. At a town meeting, which it was my privilege to attend, he arose to make his pitch against the ordinance to establish the commission. At the same time he seized the opportunity to “give his testimony for Christ.” I wished he had shut up. To hear an otherwise fine testimony come from the mouth of a bigot was dismaying. I knew the image of the evangelical church—that great instrument ordained by God to deliver the everlasting gospel to the world in our time—was being demeaned and besmirched once again.

Sure enough, after he spoke, a woman—tears streaming down her face—got up. “How,” she sobbed, “can a man who says he is a minister of the gospel, be so bigoted?”

This then was the man the TV producers thought was representative of the rest of us evangelicals.

Fixed Negative Image

Take another case. Last week a young reporter came to me asking for names of ministers she could interview in connection with a story she was preparing.

“I want to get some opinions against the kids who are rebelling on the campuses and protesting the Vietnam war. I know you’re close to the evangelicals and fundamentalists, and they seem to be the most alarmed over the modern generation, so maybe you could tell me who to get these opinions from.”

“It so happens that I can,” I said. “I know a lot of evangelicals who will find little good to say about our young people. But more and more of us are less hidebound than we used to be. Maybe you’d better talk to some of those, too.”

This reporter hadn’t realized that there are divisions among evangelicals on this question. She had a fixed, negative image of evangelicals. By and large this is the situation generally among the communications media. Because our bigots and most narrow-minded elements do the loudest hollering against social change they become by default the image of our entire church in the minds of media and public as well. It is an image of an institution opposed to change, opposed to activism in support of civil rights, opposed to welfare for the poor—isolated, indifferent, even hostile to our neighbors.

This article is not concerned with whether the image is true or fair, though some of us might agree that it has elements of truth. (An official of one of the biggest evangelical organizations recently confided in me: “We have a social concerns committee. It used to be called the social action committee, but there was never any social action so we changed the name.”)

Nor is it concerned with the argument over how much, if any, social concern or action the church should encompass.

Some, like a Waukegan, Illinois, pastor quoted recently in a Chicago daily (again, as a spokesman for evangelicals) apparently regard even a little social action as too much. He described social activist pastors as “loud-speaking militants.”

In the hands of these clergymen, he said, social activity “is being substituted for the saving act in Christ. They have lost sight of the purpose of the church community. Christ is central to a Christian community. A Christian minister should either act as though he believes that or should get out of the church and do something else. . . . An activist religion is a type of humanism. . . . People who feel committed to Jesus Christ automatically have compassion for other people.”

From this the reporter concluded that “Ironically, the activists and the conservatives quote the same Scripture to defend their viewpoint. Both groups believe in ‘Love thy God’ and in ‘Love thy neighbor.’” The reporter added that “neighbor looms a little larger for the activists than for the conservatives.”

The Issues in Black and White

The National Observer of last September 15, reporting on a Minneapolis conference of some 4,500 evangelists and evangelical leaders, was so shocked to hear some rather radical departures from the traditional image of them that it devoted a half page to the phenomenon.

The headline on its story read: “Controversy on the Sawdust Trail — Call to ‘Revolutionary Evangelism’ Shakes a Traditional Ministry.”

The article outlined the traditional public image as follows: “Evangelists are used to being separated. They are accused of being closed-minded and bumptious, of seeing issues only in black and white, and regarding the world as being divided between good Christians and heathen.

“Many evangelists contend that the only true Christian is the one who proclaims his faith, and they sometimes seem to set themselves apart from the less articulate, the less confident, and the less energetic. . . .

“Beyond those questions, though, lies the rarely spoken worry that evangelists have become isolated and polarized from a number of their fellow churchmen, particularly social-action advocates and theologians who in recent years have set major courses for most denominations and who often write off evangelists as too rigidly conservative.”

No, I’m not confusing “evangelist” with “evangelical.” Most of the evangelists at the Minneapolis meeting qualified as evangelicals and/or fundamentalists.

The happening that inspired the headline was the sermon of Mr. Leighton Ford, vice president of the Billy Graham Evangelistic Association. Among other things, Mr. Ford said: “It is the shame of the Christian church that we have been so slow to face the demands of the gospel in the racial revolution of our time. . . . We cannot be worthy of our high calling if we try to keep God in some private, undisturbed corner of our lives, and ignore the strong driving winds of change. We must echo Amos as well as Paul, Micah as well as Peter. Our message has got to combine the prophets, who called for repentance and justice, with the apostles, who called for repentance and faith in Jesus Christ.”

The image, however, resumed its erstwhile shape quickly, after black evangelist Tom Skinner made some revolutionary proposals. Norman Vernon, pastor of a Baptist church in Benton Harbor, Mich., was quoted by The National Observer as saying:

“I differ with Mr. Skinner’s approach.” Mr. Vernon added that the racial issue “is a problem that will not be resolved until the coming of the Lord. I love them in the Lord and I don’t mind having them live next door to me, but I don’t want my children marrying into their race, and I don’t think they want to marry into mine.”

Indeed, it could be safe to assume, at this point in time, that the public image is so strong and unshakable that even if evangelicals do opt for social action they don’t get the credit for it from the public. The public, along with fellow churchmen, merely deem them to have departed from evangelicalism to become liberals. By definition, you see, evangelicals do not participate in social action. If they do they are something else, but not evangelicals.

The Past Is Prologue

Where did this image come from?

It can be traced as far back as the years before and including the Civil War when the Southern fundamentalist churches were the spiritual support of the Confederacy and the institution of slavery. Abraham Lincoln himself fulminated against the smug assumptions of fundamentalist ministers that the Negro was ordained by God to be forever in the servant class.

The image has been reinforced since then by whole generations of Bible-thumping Southern preachers of the gospel, some of them even professing themselves as proud to take their places as “chaplains” on the platforms of cross-burning Ku Klux Klan Klaverns.

The image is being reinforced almost daily by extreme right-wing organizations, both here and abroad, who regularly like to attach the name “Christian” to their titles. Such is Billy Hargis’ Christian Crusade here at home. Such also is the Christian National party of South Africa organized recently by whites who think their nation’s policy of “apartheid” is deplorably lax in keeping the Negroes in their places.

Here’s a typical reinforcement of our image. Let me quote from the New York Times of October 5:

“Belfast, Northern Ireland, Oct. 4 — 71-year-old Miss Doris Spiers wore her best flowered hat and her badge that says, “Jesus Saves,” for the opening today of a new and controversial Belfast church. . . . Six thousand people attended the first service at 3 p.m. of the Martyrs Memorial Free Presbyterian Church, which was opened by the Rev. Ian Paisley.

“Often considered one of the cleverest showmen in the confused chaotic world of Ulster politics and Ireland’s best loved demagogue, Mr. Paisley says the church is the biggest Protestant church opened in the United Kingdom since the turn of the century.

“Miss Spiers believes this. She believes everything Mr. Paisley, who has not been ordained, has said in the last 13 years. . . .

“I wear this “Jesus Saves” button to show everyone that I am against them. ’Them’ means the Roman Catholics.

“Although he denies it, Mr. Paisley, who says that he has more than 100,000 followers in Northern Ireland, has often been accused of inciting violence between Protestants and Catholics.”

The same article noted that the guest sermon in Mr. Paisley’s church was delivered by “The American Fundamentalist, Bob Jones, who is president of the Bob Jones University in Greenville, S.C.”

Gospel Herald, February 24, 1970
Dr. Jones, who in his own right has contributed to the public image of the evangelical, awarded Mr. Paisley his first degree, an honorary doctorate of divinity, in 1966.

The article also noted that Mr. Paisley was an “anti-communist crusader of the John Birch school. But here at home he is most noted for his campaign to keep Catholics a repressed minority and to prevent any of the promised reforms ending discrimination against Catholics from being passed in the Ulster parliament.”

Roll Call of Amos’ Kin

It is idle to debate whether or not these images formed by the media are true of the whole evangelical-fundamentalist church. Of course they are not. On the other hand it cannot be said that they are a complete figment of the imagination. There is enough truth in these straw men to lend some validity to the public feeling that our church has become crabbed, reactionary, unkind, uncaring, and not interested at all in the improvement of the lives of the poor, the sick, the imprisoned, the deprived. That it is interested in law and order perhaps, but not necessarily in justice.

The image persists despite the fact that a number of evangelicals are busy at work in charitable endeavors: the Salvation Army, the Evangelical Child Welfare agency (starving for a lack of funds, by the way), Young Life’s inner-city work, Jim Vauss’ Hell’s Gatework among New York City youth gangs, and many others.

Should we care especially for a good image? This is a fair question in light of the fact that the early church certainly won no popularity contests but still managed to do a job and Jesus had predicted that His disciples would be hated and persecuted by the rulers of their times. The unpopular image our church has today, however, is far different in quality than the one it had in the church’s early days.

In early times Christians were hated and held in contempt by the establishment, which was a repressive state and religious organization. But it was beloved by the common people because it aroused and cared for the poor, the sick, and the needy.

Today the image is at the other pole — just the opposite. The church is held in contempt by the poor, the laborers, the disadvantaged and, regretfully, the young people. They hold it to be the lackey of the establishment, the high priest of twin gods who bear the names of Vested Interest and Status Quo.

It is because of this image that the rebellious students at Berkeley campus not long ago raised high a banner at a rally of evangelicals which read in 6-foot-high letters: “Jesus, Yes! Christianity, No!”

Can we do anything about it?

We can, with God’s help, if we admit to our image and declare our intention to do something about it.

We cannot if we try to justify it and make excuses for it, or worse still, act as if we’re proud of it.

How to Do Less, Better

I am encouraged to hear that many congregations are serious about the question, “What is our congregational purpose?” Instead of assuming that the unstated objectives of everyone are identical, these congregations are determined to articulate a simple statement that all in that community of Christians can call their own. There is a great deal of value in this.

It is first of all a call to unity, verbalized unity. When a congregation has said, this is the reason we are here, this is what God is calling us to accomplish, then they have taken a long step forward. They have made a concerted effort to focus their discipleship. They will no longer walk off in all directions responding to Jesus with that snobbish, self-reliant individualism that makes some congregations a mere gathering place for people who regardless of their brethren are determined to do their own thing. A congregation that has taken its corporate purpose seriously has worked at unity.

Next, a purpose helps tremendously to reduce the frustration of trying to do everything. When a congregation says, “This we are able to do together,” they can be relaxed about the many things they are unable to do. Closely related is the matter of setting a few simple goals which can be accomplished realistically this year and next or in the next five. Surely there were a thousand things that Jesus and His disciples could have done but when He said, “I am going to Jerusalem,” they followed and that meant they would now do less for the moment in Galilee. I am sure some congregations would be better advised to do a few things well than to keep their members fighting with frustration and fatigue on so many fronts. Maybe Jesus is laughing just a little at the sower who scatters seed all over the place when it is obvious that only what is sown in the right place will grow.

A congregational purpose makes it easier to select the right kind of Christian educational options. Once youth and adults know what they are equipping for, then it is so much less difficult to choose the right courses of study from all that are available because now the choices are limited to those which will truly undergird for mission.

It may take real effort to get a statement of purpose written but it is worth all the energy it takes. If you have not done so, make it your purpose this year to get a purpose.

Expect God to Act!

To be sure, there are real limitations to being a child, and experiencing life as a child: limited in vision, untrained, gullible, naive, with short-ranged goals. We expect adults to be mature, experienced, trained, conditioned, refined, well-behaved, responsible. But in growing from childhood to adulthood we sometimes lose something very unique, very precious, which does not belong only to children. Somehow we shuck off something valuable in the growth process. This special quality is the fresh, creative expectancy of childhood.

Have you ever shared the surprise of a child’s view of the world? Have you known the unabashed excitement which he knows, but which has long since been forgotten by many grown-ups? Children live on tiptoes. They know an element of excitement, of suspense, a thrill of the unknown. They evidence an exciting sense of expectancy. Fear is not natural for children; it is later learned from living. Perhaps for some adults, the child in them is not gone, but just silent and forgotten.

The child in me:
—wonders at the untried and unknown
—marvels at the simplicity of the complex
—fears only those known hurts
—wanders over unjudged ideas
—excitedly unwraps the surprise package
—loves for the simple reward of giving
—enthuses at small signs of response in troubled areas —creates a new thing for sheer joy
—hesitates not at the risks involved —desires to share the warmth of an experience

The adult in me:
—rationalizes
—sorts the factors involved —makes judgments
—seeks to veto the child

But Jesus said, “Unless you turn to God from your sins and become as little children, you will never get into the kingdom of heaven.” Is it possible not to lose this childlike expectation? The most exciting people I have ever known are those who expect to enjoy living, expect others to respond to Christian love, expect to see God at work.

On their exodus from Egypt, the Israelites sent twelve men ahead to investigate the country which was their destination. The findings were that it was a rich, fertile land, but the people were large and strong and the cities were well protected. Two of the men said, “Let’s go ahead; the dangers are not that great.” Ten said, “No, it’s too risky.” The people wept and complained, “Why did God bring us here? To have us killed? Let’s return to Egypt.” Only with difficulty were the people persuaded to continue on. It was clear that they did not expect God to act in any special way.

The most exciting time to be alive and awake is when one has the expectation that God is going to act. What’s the key? Why do some people expect the best? And others expect the worst? Age is not the key, nor is experience, or position. One key is the power of choice. We say by our choices what we expect to receive. We consciously make choices that determine how we are going to experience life. To expect the worst is to have a negative attitude toward God. This attitude is learned as we grow up. It can be unlearned. We need to recognize the sin of not expecting God to act. Sin needs to be confessed. We need to allow God to change our hearts, our attitudes, to open our eyes and ears.

If we do not expect God to act, then we will not pray to Him in any meaningful way. If we expect Him to act, He will open our eyes to the possibilities in our own lives, first of all. The result? He will stretch our horizons, and lead us in unexpected ways, meeting new people, and experiences. He will also show us surprises in our world. Expect God to act!—Millard Osborne, editor of Missionary Evangel.

Seek First — What?

On a pedestal beneath a bronze statue of the president of one of Africa’s young republics are chiseled the leader’s own words—a distortion of Jesus’ saying: “Seek ye first the political kingdom and everything else shall be added unto you.”

We can, of course, catch something of the meaning of this when we try to understand what it must be like to be liberated from cruel despots and colonial powers which pressed people down for decades. But we know also how wrong it is to think that political power is the path to the things man needs most.

However, we believe basically the same thing as this leader when we place patriotism as a primary loyalty and justify wrong behavior and acts because of national interests.

We are saying basically the same thing when we distort Jesus’ words by placing our hope in political power to gain God’s end. When we seek political strategy above spiritual renewal which brings persons under Christ’s rule, we are practicing belief in political kingdoms.

So it is good for all of us to recall again and again that it is only in seeking first the rule of Christ in the lives of all persons that all the things man needs and desires most can and will be added. — D.
The primary, basic objective for all our Mennonite Board of Missions program is to witness to the love of Jesus Christ and His salvation, proclaiming salvation, hope, and peace in Him; relating Christ's love to men's needs everywhere; and drawing believers together in fellowship, nurture and witness through His church.
The Church Encounters Change
By Earl Schwartzentruber

While various revolutions have been occurring in Latin America for a good many years, the revolution within the Catholic Church perhaps heads the list. Papal infallibility is being challenged; church government is being revamped; many saints are being debunked; Scripture has been given a new place of importance; and new interest is shown in social, economic, and political problems of the masses. This in a nutshell characterizes the revolution within the Catholic Church. And this is something which we can see and feel firsthand in our city of Bragado, Argentina.

Ever since the arrival of the conquistadores from Spain to Latin America, that continent was considered Catholic. The presence of any other church group was considered an intolerable invasion. A nonecumcnical mood characterized both the Catholic and the first European Protestant groups.

Some of the early Protestant missionary energy was spent in polemics and anti-Catholic propaganda, which only served to further exasperate the already not-too-friendly opponents. Referring to this relationship in 1910, John Mackay said: "The missionaries of that day were considered fanatical, illiterate people whose work should really be repudiated." This statement comes from a Protestant, not a Catholic.

Dialogue Begins

Fifty years later Joseph Miller said that Protestant-Catholic dialogue is still not present on the Latin American scene. Then three years ago Jose Miguez Bonino, head of the Union Seminary in Buenos Aires, said that a new day has dawned. On the one hand there is the reformation in the Catholic Church; on the other the more mature objective Protestant Church. Instead of isolation and polemics, encounter and dialogue now characterize the relationships. Three recent happenings document this statement.

In 1968 in Medellin, Colombia, the Catholic Eucharist Congress was held. Protestant observers actively participated in their study groups as they examined the social, political, and economic problems in Latin America, especially emphasizing the rich resources of their faith which they held in common.

In July 1969 at the Third Evangelical Latin American Congress held in Buenos Aires, 300 delegates representing 40 different churches in Latin America studied the new changes in the Catholic Church and considered what their attitude should be toward it. Their conclusion literally sided with Acts 5:38 where it says if "this work be of men, it will come to nought: but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it."

The third meeting which illustrates a major change in Protestant-Catholic relationships was held only recently in Bogota—the first evangelism congress sponsored by Billy Graham Association. Twenty years ago it would have been impossible to do this because Colombia had been considered the country most closed to evangelism. Even in the late forties there was much persecution, church burning, and martyrdom.

Now the delegates to this conference along with the church people of Bogota gathered in the central plaza for a worship service. A certain suspicion, however, was expressed toward this new attitude and reform on the part of the Catholics. Frankly, I am not suspicious of it. I think it is something to rejoice about. I think the change is a result of an honest attempt to find a religion which speaks to the needs of the masses today.

Latinas Seek New Identity

Also at the Third Latin American Congress in Buenos Aires a feeling was expressed that a certain pluralism exists within the evangelical community which is unnecessary to maintain any longer. Recognition of this pluralism leads the national to reexamine how the gospel came to Latin America and what its real essence is today.

On the one hand the nationals express appreciation for all the mission boards who have sent personnel there with the gospel. Yet their new self-awareness leads them to believe they need to shake off the foreign dress the missionaries have given their religion, thus allowing them freedom to express and to grow according to their Latin ideologies which corresponds more to their destiny. If this is not done, their church will be hindered in really expressing or identifying itself with the needs of the new Latin. By keeping this foreign baggage, they say, we are handicapped.

I am not sure how we Mennonites fit into this picture. The same speaker in that conference said that we need unity within our evangelical community if we want to grow and be the people of God in Latin America. The mission boards responsible for sending new personnel should send those who are better prepared academically and who are able to better adapt to the present situation.

gentina, said that we need people who are willing to come to live and to die here, who really identify without reservation with us and our needs. Also we need people who realize that if they cannot adapt, they will honestly face up to themselves and go home.

What are the young people saying? Perhaps not overtly but by their thinking and discussions one can sense that they want more freedom in relating to people and in making the church more relevant. This does not need to threaten us. It may make our future a little insecure, perhaps. But we cannot bury our head in the sand and become indifferent to the shifting sands blowing across the Latin American scene.

We need to recognize and rejoice over the fact that the Spirit of God who led us into Latin America 50 years ago is the same Spirit willing and ready to guide us now as we reexamine our whole strategy. I am certain there will be changes in this decade. Mission Boards will have to evaluate the situation realistically; personnel will need to anticipate change and be open to the leading of the Spirit of God.

I don’t think I am cynical. I want to be realistic. I am happy to be a part of the Mennonite Church and of the Mennonite Board of Missions. I have felt a real fulfillment in these years in South America along with my wife Genny. We look forward to continue serving the church in this way.

Experimenting in a Newfoundland Classroom

By Delvin King

Just over two years ago, I had only a faint idea where Newfoundland was, less of an idea how to correctly pronounce it, and knew still less about its style of life. My adolescent ambition of eking an existence from the frozen Northland may have inched me toward this lonely province. Then too, the visions of Labrador ducks, puffins, and penguins flooded my bird-loving mind.

Some last-minute reading revealed that Newfoundland was a land of folklore, that Marconi had transmitted from Newfoundland soil, that possibly the Vikings were No. 1 after all, and that Joseph P. Smallwood was still the first premier after 20 years of Confederation.

A few months of Newfoundland life reinforced the notion that rich folklore abounded. The kind and intensity, however, came as a captivating surprise. Tales of the fishermen and whalers, the fight against Confederation, and the immigrations from Ireland have been preserved in song. An old button accordion is ample excuse for a songfest, if the mood is right.

Waver between heritage and the uncertain future, most of the local people stand as Newfoundlanders first, Canadians second. They have their reasons; 20 years of neglect and isolation, not entirely geographic, have fostered a measure of distrust for “mainlanders.” Descriptions of the Canadian scene frequently bypass the friendly island, in that “all across Canada” means from Vancouver, B.C., to Halifax, Nova Scotia. Like the morons, beatniks, elephants, and Poles, the “Newfies” have borne the brunt of many cultural jokes. In my letters to friends, I’ve had to explain, somewhat jokingly, that we do use eating utensils and do live in houses, not igloos. Yet the stereotype remains. If only Newfoundlanders could erase the tags of being isolated, dogsledding, blubber-sucking Eskimos, more cultural understanding and exchange would occur.

In the secondary schools, a teacher enjoys a marked degree of prestige and influence. Special classroom developments are digested at the supper table along with the turnip, carrot, potato, cabbage, and salt meat. With the pedestal comes the responsibility and blame for poor results. A low pass/fail percentage in June is evaluated as teacher inability; the lack of student responsiveness lingers in the background.

The educational system has little applause for the experimenter. Magazine clippings and other updated materials designed for enrichment seldom receive a second glance. Even the university trained teachers seem convinced that they must stand before a group of silenced pupils, give 40-minute speeches, and thus perpetuate the nineteenth-century image of teachers as walking encyclopedic dictionaries.

Problem-solving sessions rarely evoke satisfactory results. Science labs must be adapted to a mentality that says “It’s not in our textbook; therefore it isn’t important.” Not until I overheard a student remark “Oh well, that won’t be on the June exam” did I know the case for required outside reading was sealed. When prompted, students, teachers, and administrators voice their dislike for the external exams; yet nothing tangible has been done about it.

Finally, the use of these exams is under review by the Department of Education. In the past, it has been argued that close adherence to the textbook and the use of external exams is necessary to offset the large number of unqualified teachers.

The students’ approach to learning is baffling. In my

Annual Report 1969

Annual Report 1969 attempts to picture the world-wide ministry of the Mennonite Central Committee. But many more than sixteen pages are needed to tell the whole story – the compassionate service and witness of Christian volunteers in the midst of unspeakable poverty, disease and ignorance in North America and in more than thirty overseas countries. There are 700 people in the program, for which reason all could not be listed, are mentioned in this report. But these are only a few examples from the great company of witnesses. Most of those writing are young volunteers, which also reflect the character of MCC. Though on the eve of observing its 50th anniversary, MCC is still peopled in the majority by the mid-twenty-year-olds. • This report is dedicated to all the men and women now serving with MCC who, from day to day, in the name of Christ, carry the witness of the church in relief, rehabilitation, service, peace and mental health. • With this report MCC expresses its gratitude to the constituent churches which supported the program so generously in 1969.

My Teacher Was...

Raised in Cincinnati, black, came to Atlanta when she got married, divorced and first grade teacher for ten years at Franklin, an all-black school in the northeast ghetto. When she first came South, she told me her harsh accent made her stand out like a sore thumb, but she said now, thank goodness, you couldn’t tell her from one of them. She majored in education in a "mixed" school up North, and so when she came down South she said everyone was afraid of her because she was so educated.

When I’d bring ideas to her from books I had read she’d tell me how she used to get everything out of books but how now she’d had the experience of the classroom and knew more about how not to get so discouraged the way she had done during the first two years she taught. After almost every day she had been ready to cry — and then she had about forty kids — eighty altogether in a morning and an afternoon class. Really, it’s true, she went on, that even coming to school and sitting in your classroom all day is helpful to these people. They are so far behind.

While she talked, I’d remember back to the night before when I couldn’t get to sleep because thoughts of what I wanted to happen in the classroom the next day kept me nervous. One day I had planned to do phonetics with the group of slow readers I worked with. I thought maybe we could combine beginning consonants and our work on rhyming to build enough vocabulary to read a simple story. My teacher was only Luke warm on the idea of studying phonetics. She said they didn’t spend much time on phonetics during the regular school year, since now educators have this idea that it isn’t good for children to waste time learning the names and sounds of individual letters. It’s better they get a feeling for the entire word. So, she had the children copy a “weather story” from the board every day. The story almost never varied in form — just like the weather. But all the same, most of the children only guessed wildly when I asked them to read me what they were writing. I objected to the method, and she concurred with me that she felt the “old-fashioned way” was perhaps better but that unfortunately, you can’t stop progress.

I thought about those masks I was hoping to do and then about the work in phonetics. There wasn’t time for both now; it was too late. Too bad they couldn’t have started when they wanted to. The weather story was a must, so also was the need for working in well-defined periods. Curtis had already sat at the work table for fifteen minutes with his weather story finished, and construction paper, crayons and scissors waiting in front of him. He was doubly confused that he couldn’t start. I had told him that he could, before his teacher noticed him and asked him above the confusion to take his seat.

You have to be real dedicated to teach, she told me many times. So much pandemonium — I’ll be an old lady before my time! And the pay, what it is — I wonder sometimes we have teachers at all. My failing is that I like children. Most people aren’t in that trap.

I know I should, but I can’t stay for those long teachers’ meetings a lot of times. I figure they have us here ‘til closing time. Then our conscience can be our guide. She wrote out her report cards sitting there and chatting in that air-conditioned room before twelve-thirty. She did them in two days. She whipped right through them, because, as she said, she didn’t have much time to spend — didn’t I know they were due Thursday? Still, she gave every single kid a good comment. She wanted to do the parents a good turn — and the kids, too; they were so used to failing.

That day I started whining and jumping up and down when she announced we would be going outdoors, right in the middle of our precious remaining hour. The way she turned and looked at me I felt like an irresponsible child. I was too impatient and I had let it get away from me. I should learn that things can’t exactly follow a schedule in a first grade classroom.

I was getting angry about a haphazardness that was much too general — too much of expecting the pandemonium and getting it while at the same time not condoning initiation of creative projects by the children. Of course the kids were getting restless being forced to spend a good hour fiddling around with a two-sentence handwriting exercise! Sure, now they were so restless it was a lot easier to keep track of them running around the playground than to maintain a good learning atmosphere inside our 100-degree classroom. So, we parade outdoors with them, like Pied Pipers, and turn them loose on the playground.

Hurricane Camille, Mennonite Disaster Service.
Like People on Noah’s Ark

Cursed Camille arrived, bent on the obliteration of Pass Christian. She would have been more successful had all the residents been home. Luckily half the Mississippian town had been evacuated.

Those who stayed endured a nightmare they would like to forget. The awesomeness of man pitting his weakness against one of the most violent storms in recent history is too shocking to forget.

Among those who stayed, there is now a special bond. They command a certain reverence in the ability to say, “I was here.” When they say it, they laugh, now. But they laugh with tears in their eyes. And the laugh is generally a coverup for a sentence choked off by emotion.

Theresa Atkinson was there. She lived directly across the street from a public school that was being used by Red Cross as their disaster headquarters. Several miles north a coastal inlet extended partially around the town, shaping the land mass into a broad peninsula. South of the Atkinson residence was an elevated railroad tract, and over that, the center of town and the Gulf of Mexico. West along the coast lay Gulfport.

She sat recalling the past events.

“We was in a church across the railroad tracks from here,” she said, “At about nine o’clock that night they said the hurricane was 35 miles from Gulfport. I was in the church with eleven others. We all thought this safer than our homes.

“We started out in the sanctuary. But the wind got so hard that the deacon decided we better go to the front of the church to the elevated area behind the pulpit. The wind became so strong that the church looked like it was rocking. It just seemed that it was coming apart.

“We decided that the children better get on the floor under the seats in case the building would cave in. But then the deacon decided it would be best if we would stand in the halls in case the church would cave in. We went to the hall, and I decided to sit on the floor. But then the water started a comin’ in. So we went upstairs again and put the children in a little closet and the grown-ups stayed and watched the water coming up the steps.

“The water was five steps from getting to us when we decided to look out the window. When we opened it, we could see the water from the Gulf meeting with the water from the bayou. It looked like if a whale had made a big vomit. It just spittied up. And we could see the houses floating.

“Then we went back and stood by the stairs and watched the water coming up. Well, I’m Catholic and I had holy water. So I decided I would throw my holy water down the steps because if the water could have got to us, the only place we had to go was up in an attic. Three of us would have had to drown to get the other nine into the attic. Then the water finally started going back down and it got pitch dark and started raining.”

The wind increased, blowing the roof off and the windows out of the church. With that, the rain fell on the little group clustered against a wall.

“The children finally went to sleep about two o’clock,” Theresa Atkinson continued. “They all slept on the floor in this little room. The grown-ups got on the benches. The benches was wet, but we just set there. And it looked like it would never get daybreak.

“At daybreak we went to the windows again. We was just like people on Noah’s ark. It must have been an hour before we saw anybody, and by that time we came to the conclusion that there must be an awful lot of people dead. When we could see people, the only place they could walk was on the railroad track because the water was still up as high as the top of the church steps. The water was about six feet deep.

“I think it was did for a purpose, but we don’t understand what it was did for, and I don’t think the majority of us will ever understand. And I hope it never happens again. To me I think it was worse than the Judgment Day. It was a horrible ordeal, but it’s something we have to live with.”

As she sat on the front steps of a simple frame building that had been her home, the roof gone, six inches of slimy, stenching mud covering floors, the walls, and everything within, many of her possessions partially buried in her yard, she vowed to come back.

“The majority of us plan to come back and start all over. Some have homes, some have nothing.”

From "A Message"

In this first annual Peace Assembly (November 22-24, 1969) called by the newly-structured Peace Section of the Mennonite Central Committee, we have struggled together with the issues of Christian conscience and conscription. Gathered as a consultative body, we unite in addressing the following concerns to the Mennonite and Brethren in Christ churches in the United States and Canada, as well as to other groups and persons.

1. We reaffirm our commitment to the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ as revealed in the Scriptures. It is our primary allegiance to Christ and His kingdom from which we develop our witness to the love of God, neighbor and enemy throughout the world as the essence of Christian living. We affirm our Anabaptist view of the church and of Christian discipleship. This view emphasizes a continuing testimony of word and deed joined in a life style of Christian brotherhood, as a witness to the redeeming love of Christ and against all militarism and war.

II. We affirm that war is sin. It is contrary to God's will for all men. Yet militarism is rampant in our society, permeating the social and economic systems. While some among us have accepted service within the armed forces, such service seems clearly unacceptable as a Christian response. We are nevertheless ready to continue ministering to such persons in their situation.

III. We affirm that conscription, as an integral part of the military system, violates the essential freedom of each person. This evil should be abolished along with the military system which it supports. . . . Objecting to all war, we cannot identify with those who call for a voluntary of mercenary army as an acceptable alternative to military conscription.

IV. Conscientious objection to military service represents the clearest continuation of our tradition and the majority belief of our brotherhood today about radical discipleship to Christ in relating to war . . .

A. As Christians we acknowledge a calling that transcends the demands of government. Out of such a sense of Christian vocation, the young people of our churches should voluntarily offer service as an expression of discipleship. When the government recognizes it, such services may be offered to meet draft requirements . . .

B. Though for some, conscripted civilian service in earning positions is a proper expression of Christian vocation, for many others it has become so routine as no longer to call for a serious moral decision of discipleship and also so routine as to have largely lost its symbolic value in witnessing against war. We question such routine and easy response as an acceptable form of Christian service.

C. We recognize noncooperation with military conscription as a valid expression of nonconformity and peacemaking. For many the confrontation with the moral decision has given new vitality to their commitment to radical discipleship and to their witness against war. The church should help them in making their decisions; nourish them in their faith; minister to them with literature, counsel and encouragement; and provide financial assistance where needed in event of prosecution, imprisonment, and other costs of discipleship.

D. Others find neither prison nor alternative service according to God's will for them. As evidence of their conscientious objection to military service they choose to migrate to a place where they can worship and serve in freedom from the system of military conscription. The Canadian and United States churches should join these persons in brotherly support and help them to determine where God calls them to establish new communities and how best to maintain their faith and witness in the new location.

E. Should the government continue to conscript, we would urge that exemption from military service be extended both to those whose conscientious objection to war is not on religious grounds and to those whose conscientious objection is only to particular wars. We extend our facilities to help such persons, who call on us, find meaningful alternative service assignments.

V. Since the burden of objection to war and militarism is the responsibility of the entire brotherhood and not only of the young who face the possibility of conscription, we appeal to every member in our congregations to join in witness against these evils and in witness to the redeeming love of Christ, through prayerful selection of occupation, the sacrificial use of money, the rejection of high standards of living made possible by a warfare economy, rejection of the modern idolatry of nationalism, participation in some form of voluntary service, and the use of appropriate means to change the systems which support the continuation of militarism and nationalism . . .

Confessing our weakness and ineffectiveness and moved by the danger of our time to humanity itself, we ought to be gripped by a new sense of urgency to work for peace. We send this message in the name of the Prince of Peace and the hope to which all Christians are called. — A full copy of "The Message" and other peace materials can be secured from the Peace Section.
Four-Hundred-Year-Old Walls

Since arriving in Brazil, we are reminded of the words of José Bonafacio de Andrade de Silva who is revered as the father of the nation’s independence. He saw clearly the economic absurdity of slavery and its social corrosiveness when he wrote in 1819:

“Twenty slaves require twenty hoes, all of which could be done by one plow. He who lives on the earnings of his slaves lives in indolence, and indolence brings vice in its wake.”

When we observe the agricultural methods and the social structure in existence in Brazil today, one is painfully aware that the great nation’s leaders have not really comprehended the wisdom and the significance of these words.

Human need in Northeast Brazil is an oppressive, omnipresent force threatening to engulf the individual who permits himself to be sensitive to it. The need, whether it takes the form of nutritional or economic deficiencies or agrarian backwardness seems inescapable. It hounds one from the metropolitan state capital of Recife to the small rural towns, from the sugar plantations along the coast to the remote interior farmlands. And the Brazilian churches are deeply concerned about the problem.

It is obvious that wealth and poverty have learned to live in proximity without one affecting the other. Common sense on which one has learned to rely begins to rebel and convulse here. As I sit in the unit house and look to the north, I see an eight-foot brick wall. If you would take a ladder and look over the top you would see the “favelas.” There are shacks in clusters, chickens, children, dogs, filth, no running water, and you can just imagine what the washroom facilities are like. If you would then take the ladder and look over the eight-foot wall to the south, you would find the following:

A large white brick house, large shiny terraces, two cars, wall-to-wall rugs, floor length curtains and three full-time maids. Here I sit between the two extremes trying to find meaning and purpose for being here. This is where common sense fails me and begins to rebel.

Both families over the walls are pleasant, friendly and bear no outward malice towards one another nor to the foreigner between them. The one has learned to exist, the other has learned to “live,” and I am trying to find purpose in their existence and meaning in living, and thus trying to establish a position for myself.

On pondering these two extremes, I suddenly come to the realization that this is the place for MCC. Yes, this situation fits the philosophy of MCC as I understand it. We are not here to fill the country with material aids to meet the physical needs. We are here with human resources to inject the spirit of human self-respect and dignity. Our purpose goes deeper than that which can be cured by a shot of penicillin or material aids, which can never fill the bottomless pit of poverty. We need the human resources to teach the man to the north a better way of living, and to teach the man to the south that he also has a responsibility towards his neighbors.

I am reminded once more of the story of Lazarus and the rich man. I have never seen it portrayed more vividly, granted my experiences even yet are limited. Let me give you a case in point.

While going down to the corner bakery, one such a Lazarus confronted me. There he sat on the side of the sidewalk with his bearded, scrawny face, devouring a hard crust which had fallen from the rich man’s table. He attacked the piece of bread in an animal fashion. As I approached him, my gaze met his begging eyes. Eyes like that of a dog who tries to befriend you, waiting for that piece of bread. Here was a man who had degenerated to animal level, one who had lost all his self-respect and human dignity.

Here lies the problem, as it meets the naked eye. The root, however, extends deep into the history. This problem cannot be solved by tossing a crust of bread to fill the stomach. This problem cannot be solved by a shot of penicillin. This approach would serve only in an emergency measure. We realize that when we get down to the roots we are knocking at the social structure. The big question which then confronts us is, how are we ever going to penetrate those 500 year-old, eight-foot walls?

This is the problem which faces our MCC unit of human resources. We have a unit which has tremendous potential. Among the members we have a vast backlog of knowledge and experience. With these resources and the guiding hand of the Creator we hope to inject into the people with whom we work the self-respect and human dignity which is the inherent right of all God’s creations. We probably will not see the day in which these walls will be penetrated, but we can leave behind our little indentations. — By Abram Dyck, director, MCC, Brazil.
No Gift Without the Giver

From the moment we climbed the ladder into their second-story cubicle, we knew an exciting evening lay ahead. As we squatted around a raincoat spread on the floor as a tablecloth, his wife was setting the dinner before us—traditional North Vietnamese rice meat roll with fish sauce, and beside each place, Coca-Cola. While Pat Hostetter asked the blessing on the food we felt a spirit that superseded national and cultural differences.

Perhaps Quang and his wife could live more extravagantly than they do. But then, Quang's life is centered around people more than things. The simplicity of the one room which was home to them reflected their general attitudes toward life. We knew that the tasty meal Mrs. Quang had prepared for her four guests was quite special. And we were reminded again that many of our friends in this country eat more modestly than we.

An evening breeze flickered the candlelight as Quang cleared his throat to speak: "Our people appreciate when you come to our country to help... But I want to ask you one question. In what way will you help us?" The query came simply and sincerely. Yet it uncovered a world of feeling and understanding—both in ourselves and in the people we had come to serve.

"Many of your people come to our country with the honest intention of helping us, but many times they do not help us but hurt us." I thought at once of the mistaken bombing of innocent villages or the fact that American soldiers had obliterated all that there had once been of his rice farm, his fruit orchard and his old farmhouse. But he brought me back to earth with "I don't mean the war people, although that is bad, very bad. I am thinking of the people who come in peace to help us; instead we are hurt."

Quang's question to us was pertinent. Our group has been involved in distributing food, clothing and other commodities to our Vietnamese neighbors. Now he was asking us, "How can you give?"

As a Paxman, I wondered. Our lives had never been blessed with physical need. We had known only the unhappy fortune of possessing. Now we had come to a land which had learned the hard lessons of suffering and deprivation and desperate need.

Why had we come? What did we have to give? Had we come to serve our brother? Or were we here to give rest to our consciences—our wealth-laden consciences? Never was our giving out of painful sacrifice; rather, out of unending supply.

"Your giving of things without the giving of yourselves is making people dependent on the rich foreigner. Many of our people are becoming lazy."

Quang didn't say so but we could not miss the further application. What he said about things could also apply to the giving of our advice, our culture, our religion. In this country already plagued with literally thousands of advisers, how could we further insult the self-confidence of the people by passing on a 'better way of life' or a 'superior religion'?

We climbed down the ladder out of Quang's room realizing we could not teach until we had learned; we could never advise until we had listened; we could not really give until we had first known the blessing of great need. And perhaps it was in listening and learning that we truly gave.

I could not help but think of the way of Jesus who spent His life in giving Himself—very seldom things—rather Himself.

Perhaps this was a lesson Paxmen would still have to learn. That the building of houses and barns, the gift of cows and chickens, the distribution of food and clothing, the proud turning over to national agencies of facilities and extension programs had missed the point of the lesson Jesus came to teach. The real gift, if it was given at all, lay in the way the Paxman gave of himself to people. And the only lasting monument of his effort is found in those who have learned from him to give of themselves to each other.

Always learning, I feel guilty, having come to give, and instead receiving so much. So many have been my gracious teachers. The workman who came this morning to beg help to acquire tin roofing, the little guy I sat beside in church who didn't seem to know any of the hymns because of their Western tunes, the exuberant province chief congratulating the Quaker couple upon their dedication of a child day care center, the uncommonly rotund proprietress of the little side restaurant where we are—all contribute to the day.

The memorable part, the really exciting part of Pax service is people. —By Earl Martin, condensed from a chapter in the book, Soldiers of Compassion, by Urie A. Bender, Herald Press.

Service at Debili Rtic

Never was it questioned in his mind that a logical dialogue could contain the foul names of communist leaders. Mao, the Russian controllers of Stalinism, and the mild advocates like Yugoslavia's President Tito were devils produced from the same hell. We don't talk with the slime of the world behind the protective socialist barrier that holds out a driving, conquering American economy. People live there? Don't give him that line. Only things can exist under communist conditions.

He knew for a fact that people are free when they own a large house, several cars and a large bottle of aspirins used for the occasional depression. This guy was not naive. His learning process had moved through great experiences, including blessed anti-communist books such as None Dare Call It Treason and patriotic speeches by men inspired to root out traitors.

Then it happened. This ideal American kid, except for a nonviolent background, was called by MCC to carry out a two-year Pax assignment in Slovenia, the northern most province of Yugoslavia, one of the most advanced in technological knowledge plus personal freedoms of any area under the hammer and sickle.

The very first day he arrived on his project at Debili Rtic he observed the assailing actions of this state against his homeland. Yugoslavians and Italians had gathered to donate blood for an ally, North Vietnam, at the hospital-camp where he had been asked to maintain the grounds. This was the bottom. What if his family and friends knew he was in such a situation?

Several months passed and thoughts of the heroic battles he was going to wage against the foe started to fade. He readily accepted the kindness the native people generously offered. He found them hungry for dialogue about his country and ideals, and he was also wondering what constituted their lives. Through the coming together of two, truth shows itself by breaking down prejudices and expanding the mind to include a greater whole of existing life.

Being of similar age and intellectual level, our Paxman found in the university students the most stimulating discussions. Here were people like himself who had not consolidated strict concepts and were not worried about being deceived by new experiences.

In the summer camping spots, only several kilometers from the hospital-camp, and among the counseling staff who came to supervise the 400 sun-enjoying youngsters, he found his student friends. They typified the new person who has become conscious of his individuality. Their colorful clothing were the modern styles from the mod shops of Italy or selected local tailors. Their music was mostly in English, with the latest rock tunes of Hendrix and Donovan.

The Paxman and Yugoslavian friend observed each other across a round table of truth, the roundness signifying the wholeness of truth with no sides of prejudice. Both had a wish to serve humanity. One had been taught the workers' revolution and the other instructed about the exactness of science and the mind, but they had seen that neither produce the "good life." The stage was set.

We had broken down; now we could only go up. The solution lay in a balance outside of the overdomination of political or religious ideas. At that moment the Christian realized that he was only one who possessed the truth, and that was through the person of Jesus Christ. The propaganda of Christ's truth cracked the student of Marx and enlightened the American Christian. This was how it happened when the Yugoslavian Red Star met the American Dollar Christian.

Meanwhile back at the camp, this Paxman, in addition to his maintenance work, helped to wash dishes, iron laundry, move tables and beds, haul garbage, plant trees and fix windows and electrical systems. Such duties often were performed after the set working hours of the day. He worked these hours not only to fill the extra time, but also to convey to his fellow workers the concept of service.

People noticed and asked why, thinking him a bit crazy. It gave him a chance to get in a short testimony and show them how much work really needed to be done. They didn’t understand completely and brought it up at their workers’ meeting. After that, they informed him that he shouldn’t work past noon, and absolutely not past 2 p.m.

This Paxman discovered that he had to find ways to use constructively his free time. During the winter he read, studied Slovak, made trips to see former MCC trainees in nearby towns, or visited village friends, sometimes helping them to cut firewood.

His work at Debili Rtic was a definite aid to the camp for needy children. Not that he worked extra hard, but just tried to keep a different attitude toward the whole situation. He tried to keep a service perspective and help wherever needed. It was an interesting experiment for him in a communist-ruled country.

— By Murl Dirksen, a Paxman, who recently returned from his Yugoslavia assignment.
Health for the Soil and Soul

Like other African nations, Tanzania has been assaulting a host of development problems since its independence. During the current Five-Year-Plan period the slogan, “To plan is to choose” is often quoted, for it emphasizes the need for setting development priorities.

Two of the prime development targets center on education and rural development. Massive resources are poured into the country’s “manpower producing unit,” i.e., the educational institutions. Those efforts make it possible to realize substantial “localization” of government posts.

By its nature, the current educational structure tends to produce high-level manpower. Those students who don’t find entry into either secondary schools or university are frustrated since they are in fact not really trained for making any special contribution to the nation. The high-level manpower needs are being met on schedule by the present educational structures. But at the same time, the economy is not expanding as rapidly as anticipated. If the current arrangements are maintained for some time to come, the country will experience a surplus of people with high-level training while the productive power of the masses remains static.

In view of these problems, the goals of education have been resighted, aiming to provide universal primary education by 1989. Such redirection of education is intended to bring the masses to a higher level of social and economic consciousness, making a variety of applied development aids more effective.

Ten MCC teachers are currently placed in church-related secondary schools and one couple teaches in a government technical school. Within the coming year, government will virtually be taking over the country’s entire school system, creating a proper public school system. Future TAP teachers in Tanzania will be making their contribution within the country’s public school system. Their sense of church-relatedness will be decidedly less distinct, though their contribution to the country’s development goals will be as strong as before. Also under TAP administration, MCC has six persons assigned to medical institutions in Tanzania.

Besides restructuring its education system, Tanzania has suggested a new framework for rural development. During the next Five-Year-Plan period the government will give priority assistance to groups of farmers who have arranged themselves into kibbutz-like settlements. These settlements are expected to facilitate the provision of water supplies, health and educational services plus market facilities. They are also expected to provide an excellent base for the establishment of cottage industries.

Hopefully, the Tanzania farmer in the Ujamaa Village scheme will experience health to the soul as well as the soil. This inter-relatedness is well described by Sudan United missionaries Peter G. Batchelor and Harry R. Boer in Theology and Rural Development in Africa.

“God’s salvation is always a twofold one. It saves from and it saves for. It saves from evil and it saves for good. When God saves the farm He saves it from erosion, from subsistence operation, from exhaustion, from drudgery and bondage. When God saves the farm He saves it for fertility, for productivity, for order, beauty, respect, attractiveness and joy of labor. The salvation of man has no meaning if it does not save all that the saved man’s hand and mind touch. Therefore the man who is indifferent to nature’s claims, to the treatment and potential of the soil he works, is less than the man God intended him to be. The task of the Christian agriculturist and farmer, in short, is to discover by experimentation, observation and study what the laws are with which God is pleased to control food, vegetation and animal husbandry and to devise methods of work and treatment that conform to and apply these laws so that the potential that is in the farm may be realized.”

Everyone is expecting the Ujamaa Villages to act as a development nuclei. These villages take a variety of shapes and their immediate needs are by no means all the same.

Ujamaa clusters and other training centers are giving priority consideration to the establishment of cottage industries. Needed are carpenter and metal working tools. The women’s groups are asking for sewing machines. Fortunately MCC has been able to provide a number of excellent material aid shipments containing just such items. This type of assistance capitalizes on local initiative and is very important in the training of new skills. The future will see the needs of this level rising. MCC should continue to respond to these kinds of needs. — By Harold F. Miller, East Africa TAP Representative, Tanzania.

Mennonite Central Committee

Founded in 1920, the Mennonite Central Committee is the joint relief and service agency for nearly all North American Mennonites. It coordinates and administers programs in overseas relief, education, medicine, agriculture and peace; voluntary service, disaster service and mental health. Representatives of fifteen Mennonite groups form the committee, which meets annually in January to review the program and to guide further outreach. The thirty-four-member committee operates through a nine-man executive committee, whose executive secretary-treasurer is William T. Snyder. Direct inquiries to the executive secretary or the information services.

Beginning in 1970 and marking its 50th anniversary, MCC will be using a new identification program approved by the executive committee. With the diversification of the MCC program it has been necessary to simplify the original mark, removing those elements that create a false or static impression of the organization. An attempt has been made to create a symbol which utilizes the universal language of the visual. It was intentionally designed to require a moment of active participation by the viewer to understand its content. That content is very simple: a dove or messenger form unfurls or empties from the cross. It is thus a visualization of the phrase used by MCC since its founding — "in the name of Christ." By restudying and revising its identification, MCC affirms its intention of being committed to innovation in the area of Christian service, responding to new needs wherever they arise in ways still to be found.

Contributions for the Mennonite Central Committee should be channelled through your own congregation’s offerings or be sent to your conference’s relief, service and peace treasurer. In Canada direct contributions should be sent to the provincial MCC treasurer.

attempts to implant self-discipline, the most consistent response from students has been, "You're different." Encouraging class response may make a "different" teacher, but it also creates a class perplexed with the new freedom. "Think for yourself" comes across as "Talk when you like." After one year of limited success, I vowed to start the second year much more strictly. It's 1970 and I have already taken the same oath for '71.

Meanwhile, the students spread their verbal, often well-meaning challenges to other classrooms where teachers are not prepared to break with the traditional lecture method. Reports of new boldness reach the staff room. My job is made equally distressing by the stifling of expression elsewhere in the school. Seemingly my colleagues and I are the undoing of each other's effectiveness and security.

The general observation that Canada tries so hard to be different from its southern neighbor has helped me realize I am plotting much the same course, except in reverse. Being different can become an end in itself. Like most disillusioned ex-beginners, I am awaking to the fact that not all students can be nudged into learning. Diplomacy may have bowed to tyranny; there must be a middle ground somewhere.

In light of these observations, I believe MCC is wise in the concentration on placement of primary and elementary teachers in Newfoundland. Students given broad foundations at the lower levels may later condemn the arbitrary selectivity of the rigid system and demand corrective changes.

To write Newfoundland off as a wasteland of cemented educators, puppet students, and nearsighted parents would be the easy way out. But silence is a poor yardstick for conversion. What appears stolid on the surface is surprisingly frictionless and operational underneath. I have asked myself what aspects of my hometown status quo would I challenge were I living there. The confrontations with tradition have fashioned a more functional approach to my job and to life itself. This compromising process is not unique to myself in the Newfoundland situation; it is the story of the college graduate evolving as participant in a society he had previously thought to be nonexistent.

Really, my task is accomplished, in part, when I can communicate to my various classes the difference between sour and bitter taste, formal and informal essays, metaphor and simile, between centigrade and Fahrenheit. There is no time to ask why.

Phys ed instructor, volleyball and basketball coach, English teacher, science teacher, choir member, Sunday school teacher—these roles have not always been easy for me to juggle. In this age of simulation, there's nothing phony about the relief that comes with a worshipful Sunday. More than any earthly thing, living with delightful Newfoundland families has kept my stay a memorable one. Then too, I have increased my life bird list by 16 species!

Through it all, the day may come when I will beg for the opportunity to blame short-term failures on such cut excuses as overload, lack of good teaching aids, outmoded audiovisual equipment, long school year (190 days), ancient textbooks, and my own inexperience.

Only One Way?

By Ruth Shenk

"Do you really believe that Christianity is the only true religion? Don't you think that people brought up as Buddhists without any knowledge of Christ will somehow get to heaven anyway?" These questions came from an American high school exchange student who was visiting in our home in Kushiro.

Sometimes one who has become a Christian from another religious background poses the question this way: "What about my ancestors who died without knowing Christ? The 'good news' came to me and I accepted but they never had a chance."

The full impact of Jesus' statement, "I am the way, and the truth, and the life; no one comes to the Father, but by me," does not hit us all at once. We accept Christ and are happy for the gift of eternal life. We are aware of persons around us who have made other choices. But one day the realization comes to us that there are those lacking sufficient knowledge to either accept or reject Him.

When we see a need we do something about it. In this case, either we get busy and do what we can to communicate the gospel or we rationalize that in God's great mercy there must be some other way for those who've had no chance to hear of Christ.

The guest speaker at our all-Hokkaido missionary meeting last fall said that missionaries lose their call and few people come to Christ when we forget that the only way to be saved is through Christ.

If we take seriously the implication of Jesus' statement, it will affect all of life — the way we live and the way we relate to people. Do we see people without Christ as having tremendous need? Can we see past their wealth, their popularity, their intellectualism to their basic heart need? If so, things will begin to happen.

To the high school exchange student we could only reply, "Yes, we take Jesus' statement seriously. That's why we're here, doing what we're doing." Shouldn't we all be able to say that?

Gospel Herald, February 24, 1970
If churches are going to stop the outflow of youth from their own families and reach the youth of the community they must "learn to communicate a feeling of love to young people."

So said the Rev. Robert S. Zuhl, new General Secretary of Youth for the Wesleyan Church headquarters.

The youth leader made the remarks to more than 600 delegates at the Wesleyan Church's Conference on Evangelism in Cincinnati.

"We must not forget that love is a universal language to all generations," Zuhl said. "This love doesn't lose patience with failures. It looks for new ways of being constructive to meet changing situations. It is not hung up on its own traditions and stock answers."

Ministers and laymen of the Wesleyan Church from all over North America gathered for a three-day Conference on Evangelism at year's end to study the role of evangelism in the denomination and to mobilize its resources for total evangelism in the 1970s.

The world of the 1970s cannot afford the "luxury" of the U.S. "relating to" Communist China on the basis of "mutual ignorance, fear, and hostility," according to the East Asia specialist of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ).

Dr. Joseph M. Smith said that the most urgent question facing the Western world in the new decade concerns the Chinese, who make up one fourth of the earth's population.

The former missionary to China wrote of U.S.-China relations for the February issue of World Call, the Disciples magazine. He found it inconceivable that the U.S., the world's most powerful nation, and China, the most populous, can live at total odds.

Coming to grips with the reality of China and the Chinese people, he said, is necessary for humanity if there will be "some degree of mutual dignity and freedom."

There are about 40,000 nuclear bombs and missiles in this country, with about 2,000 on target and approximately another 2,000 so maintained in U.S. nuclear submarines — enough to destroy not just Russia and/or China but all life on the globe many times over. These facts provide substantial proof that our military thinking has become irrational and insanely fatalistic and provocative.

In over 100 localities in this country, these weapons are made, tested, maintained, or stored. In one place alone, the Manzano storage depot near Albuquerque, N.M., there are enough nuclear weapons to destroy all life on the planet. At a base near Charleston, S.C., an explosion could destroy that state and most of North Carolina and Ohio. If the Earle Naval Ammunition Depot in N.J., had a nuclear accident, New York City would be entirely gone. There are 30 other major population centers similarly exposed, according to Stuart Loory of the Los Angeles Times syndicate whose research and reporting has greatly annoyed the Pentagon.

These war officials claim that chances for accidents are nil — yet consider two factors: (1) Despite all precautions, if a major city disappeared in a huge mushroom blast, it would be months before the cause could be determined, if ever, because all trained personnel and mechanisms would be gone without a trace. Moreover, panic among the military would most likely lead to all-out nuclear war, since it is known that some of our generals even wanted to launch a pre-emptive A-attack against Cuba at the time of the missile crisis in 1962. (2) Our bombers have had several accidents that could very well cause major disasters — the most recent ones in Iceland and Spain which have been remedied and covered up at fantastic cost, efforts still going on. On an earlier occasion, a B-52 bomber crashed near Goldsboro, N.C., while carrying a 25-megaton bomb; of six safety locks to prevent its explosion, five were found to be in a "go" position, only one remaining to save three states from destruction. The Pentagon can only claim the chances of accident are nil because much detail of these and other incidents has been suppressed.

Without a recovery of those lively spiritual convictions and vitalities through which the church itself came into historic existence, Christianity is unlikely long to remain either a serious contender among world religions or an effective alternate to the communist or any other ideology.

So stated Dr. Carl F. H. Henry in an address delivered February 8 at Butler University in Indianapolis, Ind.

"Religion cannot fail to survive, and Jesus Christ cannot fail to judge it," Henry said, "but whether Christianity survives in the next generation depends on the course it chooses."

He singled out as the two most significant religious developments so far in the twentieth century "the emergence of atheism globally as a mass phenomenon of major proportions, and the collapse of ecumenical Christianity into a theologically incoherent movement of arrested missionary vigor."

The growing interest in items such as yoga, astrology, and drug use indicate to Oregon Senator Mark O. Hatfield that America is experiencing a spiritual renaissance.

Americans are "looking for person-changing experiences," Hatfield said during the twelfth annual California Governor's Prayer Breakfast.

Some 700 business and government leaders present heard Hatfield say he believes the "most dynamic and exciting of person-changing experiences" and the basis of true peace are found in God and Jesus Christ.

Also speaking was Governor Reagan who said he believes America is headed for "a great spiritual revival."

An Episcopal clergyman congratulated the management of two national chain stores on their decision to close on Sundays.

The Very Rev. Kenneth W. Kadey noted that J. C. Penney and Sears Roebuck stores will be closed on Sundays while many others in shopping centers, both national and local, remain open to shoppers.

"The public should be concerned and refrain from shopping on Sundays," said Kadey, dean of St. John's Episcopal Cathedral. "Family life in America needs one day a week to relax. ... It seems reasonable to me to find one day a week when we need not buy or sell."

"It does not seem reasonable to say that Sunday is the only day we have to shop as a family when our doing so will keep so many people working and from having a family day off," he added.

Community leaders are joining forces to urge school administrators to inject more religious subject matter into their courses as the result of a film now being circulated.

Titled, "Keystone for Education — Religion and the Public Schools," the 27-minute color movie produced by Educational Communication Association, seeks to expose curriculum possibilities to a national audience. It attempts to clarify the interpretations of the Supreme Court decisions about teaching religion in public schools and points out methods and examples now in practice to make this subject an integral part of public school life.

Ten education specialists have collaborated on the script to provide an authoritative springboard for community information and action.

Committee Tackles Mission '70 Program

On July 1-7, 1970, Mennonite Board of Missions will hold its 64th annual meeting on the Christopher Dock Mennonite High School campus near Lansdale, Pa. This convention, called "Mission '70," has been in the planning stage for more than six months.

A Program Planning Committee, consisting of persons from Franconia Conference and from the church at large, was appointed during Mission '69 in Kalona, Iowa. Program planners for Mission '70 are: Samuel Janzen, Harrisonburg, Va., chairman; Robert J. Baker, Elkhart, Ind.; Gerald Benner, Ambler, Pa.; Hubert Brown, Goshen, Ind.; Mrs. Ernest Clemens, Lansdale, Pa.; Lupe Gonzales, Goshen, Ind.; Mrs. Alvin Kauffman, Elkhart, Ind.; James Longacre, Bally, Pa.; Henry P. Yoder, Lansdale, Pa.; Cleon Nyce, Perkasie, Pa.; youth sponsor; Tom Myers, Fountainville, Pa., MYF member; Lewis Strite, Harrisonburg, Va., coordinator; Jim Boys, Hesston, Kan., assistant coordinator; and Ivan Kauffman, Elkhart staff member.

The Program Committee held its first meeting during Mission '69, at which time the general plans for program and facilities were initiated. The general theme for Mission '70, "The Spirit of the Lord upon Me," from Luke 4:18, 19, was chosen during a second meeting on Sept. 6 at Christopher Dock School.

The third major meeting was held on Oct. 11 in Chicago. At that time the program for Mission '70 was outlined, schedule was arranged, and program participants were selected. Since then program planning has continued by correspondence and telephone.

Churches to Observe Missions Emphasis

The Mennonite Church has designated two days each year for special mission emphases in congregations. This happens in November for Fall Missionary Day and again the second Sunday in March. March 8 is slated for Spring Missionary Day, 1970.

Mennonite Board of Missions is offering several suggestions for congregational observances of this day as follows:

- Arrange a mission emphasis service. Have a VS'er or Paxman share his experiences. Invite a neighboring church pastor or minority group representative to speak. Show a missions film or filmstrip (available through the Mission Board audiovisual library). Write to the Mission Board for a staff person or missionary to present current domestic or foreign mission efforts.

- Post mission articles on the bulletin board. Use such items as clippings from the Gospel Herald, Inside Line, and other mailings sent to pastors and Mission Board members, or letters from missionaries.

- Select a special project for mission offerings. Primary departments can select a project from the new brochure containing 1970 Children's Mission Projects. Adults desiring to support a special endeavor can write to Mennonite Board of Missions for a list of Partnership Projects. A congregation may want to select a special project for the entire year rather than this one Sunday.

- Share mission-related experiences with the congregation. "Believing and Doing," the 1969 annual report of Mission Board program, reveals some interesting experiences and vital facts concerning what the Lord is doing in building His church.

- Provide children with missions savings banks. The Mission Board offers these metal globe-shaped banks free of charge to serve as a convenient reminder to individual involvement in missions. Write to Box 370, Elkhart, for a supply. Canadian churches should address the Provident Bookstore in Kitchener, Ont.

- Remember missionaries around the world. March 8 would be a good occasion to write a letter of encouragement to a missionary. Each one would appreciate knowing that the Mennonite Church is behind him with both prayer and financial support.

Mission Banks Available

In an effort to help children understand the meaning of the Great Commission through personal involvement in the mission of the church, Mennonite Board of Missions is again making mission savings banks available. These banks, molded in the shape of a globe as a symbolic reminder of the gospel's worldwide scope, are made of metal for durability and to serve as a convenient place for savings.

Leaders and teachers of children are encouraged to provide a mission savings bank for each child in their group. Mennonite Board of Missions has an adequate supply on hand that are being offered without charge. Churches within the United States should send their requests to Mennonite Board of Missions, Box 370, Elkhart, Indiana 46514, while Canadian churches should order through Provident Bookstore, Kitchener, Ont.

The mission savings bank is one in a series of materials being offered as part of children's mission projects for 1970. A brochure listing eight additional projects will be made available to Mennonite congregations in the near future.

To Host Nurses' Seminar

A daylong conference to help registered nurses develop assessment skills is set for Saturday, Mar. 14, in Goshen College's Science Hall.

Sponsored by the college, Goshen and Elkhart general hospitals, and District 12 of Indiana State Nurses' Association, the meeting is the second in a series of two to help nurses learn and use current methods of collecting information and identifying patients' nursing problems in hospitals and other health related agencies.

Leaders will be Lois Meier, professor and chairman of medical-surgical nursing, and Mrs. Janet Marie Bingle, assistant professor in medical-surgical nursing, both of Indiana University.

Chairman will be Mrs. Anna Frances Wenger, director of workshops for the college's division of nursing.

Activities of the day, which begins at 9:00, include lectures, discussions, role playing, films, and small-group sessions.

Enrollment is limited. Application to take part is required by Mar. 2. More information is available from the college division of nursing.

Smucker to Join Conrad Grebel

At the Feb. 2 meeting of the Board of Governors Donovan E. Smucker of Chicago was appointed to the faculty of Conrad Grebel College to begin service in Sept. 1970. J. Winfield Fretz, President of the College, said that Smucker was engaged to introduce the first of a series of general education courses.

At present Smucker is chief consultant for colleges of the Presbyterian Board of National Missions. From 1967 to 1969 he served as President of Mary Holmes College, Westpoint, Miss. From 1959 to 1967 he served as Chaplain and Professor of Religion at Lake Forest College in Illinois. For approximately ten years Mr. Smucker was on the faculty of the Church of the Brethren and Mennonite Seminaries when those two schools had a cooperative relationship from 1948 to 1958.

Philhaven Hospital has openings for LPNs, crafts, laundry, and office personnel. Interested persons may contact the administrator, J. Horace Martin, R. 5, Lebanon, Pa. 17042, or call 717 273-8871.

There is evident misunderstanding about the Mennonite Church's relationship to other religious bodies. A few years ago an ad hoc Interchurch Relations Committee was established by Mennonite General Conference to give counsel in such areas. The denomination has felt that it should not identify officially with other national organizations. Without our consent some publications of the National Council of Churches have listed the Mennonite Church as one of its cooperating churches. It is true that the Mennonite Church has used some materials from the Stewardship Department of the NCC, and has used the Uniform Sunday School Outlines. Investigation has been made concerning the reason for their listing the Mennonite Church as a cooperating church, and they have agreed to discontinue such listing. The Mennonite Church is not a member of the National Council of Churches.

Ruth and Rhoda Ressler arrived in Chicago from Osaka, Japan, on Feb. 14 for a six-week visit in the U.S.A. They are in the Elkhart-Goshen area for several days before moving on to visit relatives and friends in Ohio, Pennsylvania, etc. They return to Japan by March 31.

In the recent meeting of the Overseas Missions Committee, five OMA appointments were made: Mr. and Mrs. James Styer, Mr. and Mrs. Paul T. Guengerich, and C. Richard Friesen. The Styers have a three-year appointment at Woodstock School in India and from Philadelphia on Feb. 22. The Guengerichs have a one-year assignment at the Hokkaido International School in Sapporo, Japan, and will go to Japan this summer. Dick Friesen's assignment is youth work at the Santa Rosa church in Argentina. He will have several months Spanish language school in Costa Rica this spring and summer before going to Argentina.

Marjorie Shantz, Botijas, Puerto Rico, reports that at their special evangelistic meetings at Botijas there were ten professions of faith.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Shenk write from Kushiro, Japan: "We've now completed two full years of life and service centering in our 'new' location in Tottori at the western edge of Kushiro. By and large, they have been satisfying and reasonably fruitful years. Growth has been steady throughout the year in the Tottori group, perhaps..."
more in faith and commitment than in numbers. Several former seekers have discontinued but several others have joined us and the spirited involvement of the whole group in meetings and activities is unusual."

The Executive Committee of the Mission Board was scheduled to meet in Elkhart on Feb. 17 and 18.

The Overseas Committee of Mennonite Board of Missions, meeting in Elkhart Jan. 27-29, determined that the political situation in Nigeria is not sufficiently clear to formulate any official plan and strategy for resuming mission work. The Mission Board is in close contact with Mennonite Central Committee and is encouraging MCC to follow through with relief and rehabilitation programs. The Mennonite Church in Nigeria continued to grow in strength and numbers throughout the time of civil strife.

Erie J. Sauder, Archbold, Ohio, was recently named "citizen of the year" by a representative committee from the Archbold community. Sauder, active in church and community work, is president of the Sauder Woodworking Company. He is a member of the Tedrow Mennonite Church and serves as a director of Mennonite Economic Development Associates, Chairman of the Paraguay Committee, and on the Board of Overseers for Goshen College.

"Peacekeeping in Our Time" will be discussed at Laurelville, April 3-5. Laurelville Church Center is inviting persons from all points of the peace spectrum to talk with each other. All viewpoints will be heard. Resource persons are Frank Epp, Sanford Shetler, Emmet Lehman, and Doug Hostetter. For more information write to Laurelville Church Center, R. 2, Mt. Pleasant, Pa. 15666, or call 412-423-2056.

Readers Say

Submissions to Readers Say column should comment on printed articles.

We appreciated the fine article, "Special Delivery from God," by Robert Baker in the Jan. 27 issue of the Gospel Herald. Being parents of one of the special children from Korea, we share the Schwartz family's feeling that a "thousand blessings are ours because of them.

The addition of our adopted son to our family of three natural born children has been an experience rich in learning and the doubts and fears we may have had about adopting have been erased, and the presence of this son in our family is a continuing joy. We never cease to marvel at God's gift to us in preparing and keeping this child until He opened the doors for us to come together. With this background of God's leading, we can face the future with confidence in His continued guidance. — Mr. and Mrs. John Glick, Minot, N.D.

A Few Words from the Establishment, Jan. 13.

Ever since I was a young boy, I have been taught Christian love and nonresistance as I am sure you have taught your sons. I think that my position on draft resistance is a logical conclusion of some of the few words from the establishment which I have absorbed. So I am going to discuss your article as a fellow member of the establishment.

I don't think that I need to argue that war is wrong, because we both agree in acceptance of the Mennonite doctrine.

We also agree, if I read your letter properly, that the noncombatant role in the armed forces is unacceptable because it is directly connected with the military war effort.

I would differ with you, however, and say that cooperation with the draft is also unacceptable because it is also connected with the military effort though a little less directly.

First of all, and I think you'll agree, the draft itself contributes very strongly to the war effort. If President Nixon could abolish the draft without cutting the army size drastically, he certainly would abolish it, but going and all, tomorrow morning at 6:30 before breakfast. But if he is going to maintain a large enough army to fight the 'two and one-half wars per year' that the Pentagon is said to figure on, he cannot abolish it.

After I had registered for the draft, a few questions began to appear in my mind. For instance I asked myself and my friends and parents knew it and everyone knew that the army would not get any military service from me. So, the question is, why did they want me to come down and register, if they weren't going to get anything out of it at all?

Or what about the guy with a wooden leg? You could see just by looking that they were not going to get a fighter out of him; so why did they make him come in and register?

So after a while, I began to get a sneaking suspicion that in order to have a draft, everyone had to be registered, at least in our democratic society.

You can't have as large an army as we have without having a draft; and you can't have a draft without also having a universal registration for the whole country, and if you don't, you can't have as large an army as we have without universal registration.

So it bothers me that I voluntarily registered when I was eighteen because my registration was part of the universal registration which made the army as big as it is.

You see that both refusing to be part of the universal registration process and refusing to accept service in the armed forces are the same thing as refusing to be part of the total war effort. The only difference is one of degree. — Don Brennan, Goshen, Ind.

It seems that a few comments are needed regarding "Peace — The Vine or the Grape" (Jan. 20) lest some persons reach wrong, and perhaps unintended, conclusions from the article.

The author compares the 40,000 U.S. war casualties in Vietnam (which causes thousands to march in protest) with the 53,000 Americans killed on our highways in one year (which hardly raises any eyebrows). Perhaps we also need to rethink our priorities!

Granted that we must improve the safety of highways, cars, and drivers, these 53,000 highway deaths are not immediately comparable with the Vietnam deaths, even though they were committed with validity to premeditated, planned killing in war.

Mention was made only of the U.S. deaths in Vietnam and that some had died for a cause that they believe in.

Now dying for one's beliefs, or country, may be a very good and noble thing — it's the killing from which the Christian must shrink. And don't forget that the reported 546,904 Vietnamese and North Vietnam soldiers killed, perhaps four times that many civilians killed, as well as the 40,000 U.S. and 93,738 South Vietnam casualties.

The author also speaks of the ease of us being "carried along by a 'Peace Now' chant, and forget that Christ said that there will be wars, and that He warns us about those that cry, 'Peace, Peace.'"

Jesus did say that there would be wars. But that prophecy has been fulfilled many times over since He spoke it, and we must stop justifying present and future wars via the lips of the Prince of Peace.

Jeremiah 6:14 (not Jesus) is likely what is meant in the reference to crying "Peace, Peace.

The context is one in which the false priests and prophets were in effect saying, "Calm yourselves, everything is all right" when they should have been crying out for repentance and warning Israel of judgment.

Certainly this is not the message that the "Peace Now" group is trying to communicate — but just the opposite. Otherwise, the author made some good points. The article should be read and discussed. — John A. Hertztel, Newport News, Va.

The lead editorial in the January 13 issue is certainly to the point — warfare itself is an atrocity, regardless of the methods used. But where do we go from there? As Mennonites, what is our responsibility in regard to our country's actions?

It is my duty to me to realize that many of us assume responsibility only for our own behavior. We apparently feel that as long as we are peaceful and not directly involved in killing, we are fulfilling our role of citizens of our nation. But how can we escape our responsibility so easily, especially in a country with a democratic form of government? The democratic pro-

The Uyo Story, written by Edwin and Irene Weaver, describes the development of the Mennonite witness in Nigeria. No mission compound was established, no schools or hospitals built, even groups of churches wanting to join the Mennonite had to be refused. The development of missions work in Nigeria litted neither the old established mission church nor the "independent" church patterns. cess may not always work smoothly, but the actions carried out by the United States occur either because her people want them to happen, or allow them to happen. For this reason, until I have done all within my power to work for peace, I share the guilt of this country’s violence.

Christ has called us to assume responsibility for the actions of others. He said not, “Blessed are the peacemakers.” — Don R. Trorey, Washington, D.C.

I cannot but voice my reaction to the reasoning as I find it in Jan. 27 issue on “The Thousand-Year Period.” If as the writer says Jude 5-7 refers to Revelation 20:1-3, Satan was bound when the Lord destroyed the unbelievers after their day of judgment, and again when the angels which left their first estate and then at the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah and also 2 Peter 2:4-6. These two Scriptures give us true historical facts and show us that God is just and that His mercy is limited with wicked individuals, cities, nations, and the world, and that we may profit and take warning but not a word of them regarding Satan being bound.

Then he states that Revelation 12:7, 8 is the beginning of the 1,000-year period. Why does he not include verses 9, 10 which say that the great dragon, “that old serpent, called the Devil, and Satan” (Alderfer, Richard and Louise, Richmond, Va., a daughter, Douglas Allen, Jan. 14, 1970.) was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him, the accuser of our brethren is cast down, which accused them before God day and night. And if he is bound in Jude 5:7 why the need of an intercessor in our behalf before God, namely the Lord Jesus Christ? When Satan will be bound he is bound to those reigning with Christ and according to the German rendering, the heathen.

If the 1,000-year period in which Satan is bound is the church age, as the writer states then I wonder why all the wars, violence, crimes, and wickedness in the world and the drift in the church today. During that 1,000-year period there will be no deception on the earth, regardless how the devil tries to deceive. “The Lion may be classified. Yes, we need the whole armor of God to fight against the wiles of the devil because he is not bound at present, but very busy, even if it were possible, he would deceive the very elect.” If he is bound then the believer is unconditionally eternally secure and can do what he will even to the grossest of sin as one advocate of eternal security wrote. — Irvin G. Gehman, Barto, Pa.

What You Do, You Are!

By David Augsburger

"You can't judge me by the way I live," one of our most bloodthirsty actors of stage and screen protested recently. "I'm not that way at all."

When asked about his frequent scrapes with the law, he insisted, "Oh, I may do a few of those things, but I'm really a sensitive person, the kind, thoughtful, understanding type."

I'd like to believe him, but I find it a bit hard to divide between "being" and "doing" with such ease.

"My husband's a kind man; he has a good heart," the lady told me, describing the man in her life who was in prison for murder. "Why, I tell you, he couldn't hurt a flea."

But the fact was, he had killed a man. And he who murders makes himself a murderer.

"If you knew my motives, if you knew my heart, you wouldn't criticize what I do." How often that fine sentiment is used in defense of questionable actions!

But the fact remains, you are what you do because you do what you are!

Your actions may not be a perfect test of your character, but they are the only tangible evidence you can offer to prove that your intentions are worthy, your motives right!

A man's actions are like the index of a book; they point out what is inside.

A man's actions are the best interpreters of his thoughts.

Either they make his words believable, or they give the lie to all he claims to be.

Who will believe a man's claims when his actions contradict his words?

Emerson asked, "How can I hear what you say, when what you are is thundering in my ears?"

Let's face it. For most of the people about us, we are what we do! A few close friends may take us at our word, but most others judge us by our actions.

"Well done is better than well said."

Few people trust words and claims today. They want to see action!

"Tell it like it is," youth say, expressing their deep-seated distrust of adult demands that somehow seldom match up to adult deeds.

"Do it like you tell it," they shout at the inconsistent hypocrisies they see in those above them.

Don't they have a right to expect mature people to do what they say?

Shouldn't what a man knows find expression in what he does? What a man thinks show up in how he acts? What a man believes come out in how he lives?

Sure! And it always does. Maybe not what he says he knows, or thinks or believes, but what he really is, he does!

I've an acquaintance who's a real talker, "a conversationalist" they call him. Great guy to hear. Always good listening. He's loaded with rich ideas, big plans, fascinating stories, insights worth quoting; he's got inventions to patent, books outlined to write . . . what a guy!

But just ask, "What have you done?" And the guy begins to shrink away. He's all ideas. Never done anything. Always starting, always dreaming, always planning—but!

One in a million? Nope!

One of a million! One of a million persons with great emotional feelings, wonderful intentions—but! Could you be one of that million? Measuring by the yardstick of your deeds, what are you? You are what you do! Do you know what is right, but hesitate or refuse to do it? Can you hear what is truth, but go away and forget it? Listen to the words of James, from the Bible—

Don’t, I beg you, only hear the message, But put it into practice; Otherwise you are merely deluding yourselves. The man who simply hears and does nothing about it Is like a man catching the reflection of his own face in a mirror. He sees himself, it is true, But he goes on with whatever he was doing Without the slightest recollection Of what sort of person he saw in the mirror. But the man who looks into the perfect mirror of God’s Law, The Law of liberty, And makes a habit of so doing, Is not the man who sees and forgets. He puts that Law into practice And he wins true happiness.

—Jas. 1:22-25, Phillips.*

Are you one who hears . . . knows . . . agrees . . . but refuses to do? Knowledge produces responsibility, but it does not guarantee integrity. That is why God is most concerned not with how much you know, but with how you use what you know. “It is not unfamiliarity with the Law that justifies a man in the sight of God, but obedience to it. There is no doubt at all that he [God] will ‘render to every man according to his works’” (Rom. 2:6, 13, Phillips).*

What are you doing with all that you know? Your worth is determined by the good you do, not by the fine emotions you feel. And nothing is more dangerous than the repeated experiencing of a fine emotion with no attempt to put it into action.

Is there a credibility gap between your profession and your practice? Do you find it impossible to narrow the gap between your intentions and your actions? Do you habitually excuse yourself on the basis of good intentions, giving yourself the shadow of the doubt, meanwhile judging others by their deeds?

Yes?

Then let’s own up.

The faith in God you claim to have—is it affecting your life? Is it affecting the lives of others through you? If your answer is “no,” or “I don’t know,” do you have a genuine faith? Or is it a fraud?

The morals you defend—are you practicing them? In the small things of life as well as the big stuff? Do you put money in the parking meter? Do you pad your income tax return? Are you unfaithful to your wife in your dreams?

The knowledge of truth you possess—are you being true to it? Are you willing to stand by it without buckling under to pressures, without caving in to the crowd?

The responsibility to love others—do you, actually? The Bible says, “Let us love not merely in theory or in words—but let us love in sincerity and in practice” (1 Jn. 3:18, Phillips).*

The respect you have for the Bible—don’t mention the nice things you say about it, are you reading it? Are you following its truth? That’s the real test. (See 2 Tim. 3:16, 17.)

Your conviction that prayer works—do you pray? How much are you praying instead of worrying and putting all your trust in your own cleverness or skill?

Well, we’re only beginning. We should look at what you’re doing with your talents, abilities, opportunities, finances, time—with your life.

It’s what you do that counts. With God and with men! Not that you can make the grade with God just by what you do!

That would take some doing! Besides, doing is no substitute for faith. We’re not on an earn-your-own-way-to-heaven basis.

Realistically, no amount of doing—no matter how good—could undo what we’ve all done in our sinfulness and our rebellion against God. With all our doing, we’re done for! What’s done is done! Nothing ever happens but once in this world. What I do now I do once for all. It is over and gone forever. Gone with all its eternity of solemn meaning. That’s why what you do is serious.

“It was nothing you could or did achieve—it was God’s gift to you. No one can pride himself upon earning the love of God. The fact is that what we are we owe to the hand of God upon us. We are born afresh in Christ, and born to do those good deeds which God planned for us to do” (Eph. 2:8-10, Phillips).*

That’s the good news of the gospel! It’s not what I do that fits me for heaven; it’s what He did. What God did in Jesus Christ. When He showed His love for us, shouldered the blame for all we’d done, and then said, “If you believe, and show that belief by giving Me your whole life, all your affections, all your loyalty, you may be free.”

Free to do what we are because the load of guilt is gone. Free to do what we should do because we are different people now—new people.

Free to do what we couldn’t do before because now God’s strength is within us.

Now we can truly do what we are!

Follow Him. Do what you should do by being what you could be in Christ Jesus!

You dare not do less!

What you do, you are!—David Augsburger, Harrisonburg, Va., delivered this message over the Mennonite Hour radio broadcast.

Sam’s Problem

I think it was Samuel Shoemaker who said, “When my wife shows me a recipe for a cake, that’s theory; but when she makes it, that’s concrete.” My wife’s isn’t, but that was Sam’s problem. I’d like to say a little, though, about making theory reality.

I’ve heard it several times lately that the building of a new church building drew the congregation together. That’s great! I’m for whatever it takes to draw a congregation together. It is a rather major step forward when congregations point to an increased unity in the process of building the building. It wasn’t always that way, you know. There were two major occasions for splits in the church. One was when a building committee was appointed, the other when “the bench” broke.

Now, if unity can be increased by making the theory on a blueprint concrete, if doing what we say we will in the construction of a building draws us together, makes us stronger, and gives us a sense of accomplishment, then we have a hint of what it takes to get things moving in a congregation. It takes a common purpose. A purpose that is jointly conceived, is corporately accepted, and that has the total resources and will of the congregation behind it can hardly fail to be achieved.

It is odd, however, that the whole congregation can be mobilized so well to fulfill a common purpose when the purpose is to get that building built. It is odd that it is so difficult to design and fulfill a purpose in terms of corporate congregational mission. Could it be that we are simply dedicated too much to the wrong thing? Might it be that all this is an eloquent commentary on our materialism? Is it not time to listen to those, often clear-eyed youth, who say it is more urgent to make people the priority, instead of the red carpet? Those priorities may sort themselves out somewhat when the government begins taxing our facilities. It will be interesting to see how fast we will think of ways to use those facilities more than three hours a week — educational efforts for the community, like head start in the church basement, a place for teenagers to gather, a counseling center for couples, a reading room and discussion corner, a place where the poor can get more than food stamps, and a place where Christ can be met all week.

The positive thing to say is simply, let’s see whether we can use what we learned about a purpose when we built our building in terms of a purpose for congregational mission.

By Still Waters

"Hear my prayer, O Lord" (Ps. 39:12).

In his fervent prayer a man got his figures mixed up. "O God," he prayed, "send us a mighty revival. And whenever there is as much as one spark, please water that spark."

No doubt there are few areas of life which are more insincere than the prayer area. Pretense in prayer is all too common. We talk about the importance of prayer but pray very little. We ask great things from God but really do not want them. We cry for great revival but if God so much as sends a spark we quickly rush for some bucket of cold water to put it out.

David had no doubt about God hearing his prayer when he prayed, "Hear my prayer, O Lord." God is a prayer-hearing God — that is, He is able to hear our real prayer which may not be the same as the words we say with our lips. God is a prayer-answering God. And His desire is to fill our lives with all which is for our good.

God waits for our asking. But our asking must be sincere. And that sincerity is most manifest in our response when He sends the answer in His own way. For prayer is not a way to manipulate God to do our will. True prayer is asking God to do His will. And the honesty of our prayer is seen in our doing His will as He makes it known to us.

No Roof

The Scottish laborer had quit his farm job. The farmer’s neighbor stopped him to ask, "Was the work too hard?"

"There was nothing to complain of on that score."

"What then? Were the wages too low?"

"No."

"Then why did you leave?"

"There was no roof on the house," the Scotsman answered.

In Scotland, that expression means that there is no daily prayer offered in that house and hence there can be no peace, safety, or comfort.

Not all the "roofless" homes are in Scotland. Prayer we do not expect to find in godless homes. But, can it be possible that homes that call themselves Christian, whose members can be seen on the way to church each week, are without a roof of prayer during the day to preside over the decisions and actions of daily life?

I Am Ill at Ease

I am ill at ease in a society which has declared war upon its young people. Many it has doomed to kill and get killed in a jungle ten thousand miles away. Other thousands have been harassed out of the country — to Canada, to Sweden, to other lands. Many of its most intelligent have been officially snubbed, persecuted, or put behind prison bars. Still others, finding no resources adequate to the facing of the implacable hostility of their elders have turned to cynicism and hippiedom.

What happens to a society which rejects its youth? I am ill at ease in a society which can use the label of "communism" against anyone whom it wishes to stigmatize, where the flag has been pretty much pre-empted by partisan forces which threaten freedom of communication and the Bill of Rights. I am afraid of an establishment which will not tolerate nonconformity or that refuses to listen to any voices which do not reecho its own.

What happens to a society which can brook no point of view but its own? I am ill at ease in a society that can rationalize My Lai and yet decrees crime in the streets, a society that accepts atrocity but waxes self-righteously indignant at lawlessness. A people who can (perhaps with reluctance) somehow approve mowing down unarmed women and children with machine guns but condemn Nazis at Nuremberg who only obeyed orders scares me.

What happens to a society which teaches and approves violence? I am ill at ease in a society which increasingly seems to confuse realism with communication, which does not distinguish action and the words. Truth is the stubbornest thing in the world; all the waters of the ocean will never wash away one jot or tittle of it. No amount of suppression or of white-washing can ever unrecord it. An atrocity is recorded whether there are journalists or photographers there or not. It is recorded in the minds of the survivors, it is recorded in the personalities of the perpetrators, and it is recorded in the very annals of the universe itself — like the recordings in the grooves of a phonograph record. My Lai is recorded, and in the day of reckoning, I cannot think of a single argument which might prevail with the Judge to put Him on our side.

What happens to a society which confuses the message with its content? I am ill at ease in a society which insists that it can make peace by waging war, that it can save cities and villages by destroying them, that freedom of the press can best be preserved by censorship, that the Bill of Rights can be kept by suppressing it, that democracy can best be preserved with totalitarian methods, or that the equality of its citizens can be maintained by demeaning some of them. Chaos and the desperation which it brings about does not stop communism, but promotes it.

What happens to a society which attempts to bring about good ends with bad means? I am ill at ease in a society which has inverted its values, a society in which the making of the peace sign makes one suspect, where attending a peace rally labels one as giving aid and comfort to the enemy, a society in which those who insist upon sending young men to the other side of the world to shoot and get shot at are considered faithful to them and those who would keep them at home to utilize their potential to constructive ends are considered faithless and guilty of near treason.

I have misgivings about a society that insists upon imposing American-style democracy upon a country by destroying it and putting its citizens in their graves, about those who are terribly upset about violence on the streets of New York but not on the streets of Hue, that confuses the teachings of the Sermon on the Mount with the teachings of Karl Marx, and persists in preserving "national honor" by following a bitter mistake to its ultimate and violent end. I had thought that it was a fool who never changes his mind.”

What happens to a society which confuses protagonist and antagonist, Screwtape and the Enemy?

I am ill at ease in a society that cannot distinguish between the devices which are set to maintain the war, to "Vietnamize" it and thus to make it palatable and permanent, and the devices to end it.

What happens to a society which cannot distinguish between war and peace?

I am ill at ease in a society which is built upon false and paradoxical assumptions and invalid illusions, where "fair is foul, and foul is fair," where men put "bitter for sweet and sweet for bitter." I find myself wanting to extricate myself from such a society. But I find no way to do it.

And so I am ill at ease. — S. A. Yoder.

Law and Order Ticket

Not long ago, Senator Edmund Muskie read a significant quotation to the National Council on Crime and Delinquency:

"The streets of our country are in turmoil. The universities are filled with students rebelling and rioting. "Communists are seeking to destroy our country. Russia is threatening us with her might and the republic is in danger. Yes, danger from within and without. "We need law and order."

This quotation is from Adolf Hitler who said it in 1932, the year he came to power in Germany.
I sit here shivering with my topcoat and hat on in this Sheridan Avenue apartment. I came to this apartment, one block off the Grand Concourse, at 8:00 a.m. This is supposedly a good community. My friend asked me to come stay in his apartment, because more than 30 times when he left it someone broke in and stole things. He had lost most of his clothes and other things of value that can be carried out. On his small welfare and Social Security income, he cannot buy replacements.

Who steals his things? No one knows for sure. Most likely some persons in the area are working in teams. They must know the building layout and who the people are living there. Others have goods stolen too. These thieves obviously have the cooperation of the building superintendent. Can't the police do something? "No," they say when called. "We have thousands of other people in this precinct who have things stolen. We can't give all our time to you. We can't do anything."

The Cold Facts

But why am I cold? There has been no heat or hot water in this six-story apartment building for four days. Why? Who knows? The superintendent left for several days. One woman in the building has pneumonia. Where is the owner? No one knows. He likely hires a person to run the building. Each day there is no heat $85 is saved. Can't the tenants unite and do something? They are not united; they often do not trust each other. Can't one call the city office? Yes, but each office refers the caller to another. Can't the welfare office do something? They don't. The caller gets more runaround!

Well, you say, tell the people to trust the Lord! And shiver? Con-Edison threatens to cut off utilities. Money earmarked for food is then used to pay the bill. The Welfare Department will not write a check to replace what has been sent to Con-Edison. So where is money for food for a cardiac patient? The patient must see his doctor, but the doctor is so busy he often cannot see his patient, who in turn must come back the next day. Twenty-cent tokens now cost thirty cents.

This 58-year-old cardiac patient, a widower, with no children, few friends, and an independent spirit is now a charity case. He tells me he gets so disturbed and frustrated with his situation that he wonders whether he should end it all. "Who really cares?" He almost screams at me. "I do!" I quietly reply.

This man called the Heart Association, the visiting nurse, the society for the aging, the city office for the elderly, the synagogue, churches. Finally he called the Mennonite House of Friendship. We came. We helped. We must keep on helping. Whole days of helping.

How to Heal the Hurt?

This is the condition of thousands in this city. Many apartments have no heat, or irregular heat, for a week at a time. It's every man for himself. During a Sunday morning service three men began to take the battery out of a worshipper's car located across from the church. A neighbor saw what was happening and called out to them. They dropped the battery and ran. There are a few who care. But for many, crime is the only way of life.

Why not move somewhere else? But where? Moves are expensive. Isn't there another way? Yes; some get dogs, carry guns, and knives, or use drugs and alcohol to forget temporarily. Others endure, shiver, suffer, hope or despair.

Someone says, "The answer is to give them the gospel and that will change things!" What would Jesus offer in the Earl Tremont area of the Bronx? Would He just sit here and shiver, and think and pray for answers?

My friend, who is Jewish, wonders if there is a God. He hasn't been to the synagogue for years. Christian people haven't revealed God on his level of need. I feel I must witness. I tell him the Good Samaritan story. I must show love before my testimony or gospel preaching will have much effect on him. Will my testifying of Christ and His love turn on the heat or pay Con-Edison? Maybe he should just overlook his problems and this cold apartment, believe my message, and let me return to my warm house and adequate salary. What would you do or say?

Summer VS: A Visage

By Esther Schlabach

During the summer of 1969 I was involved in Hyde Park, a partially developed, largely Spanish-American sector of Pueblo, Colorado, the steel city of the West.

My association with the war on poverty program included supplementing an existing recreation program and helping to lay the foundation for similar future programs. I was also directly involved with neighborhood Youth Corps workers (teenagers from low-income homes) who supervised recreational activities organized by program coordinators for community children.

While it is arduous to summarize one's feelings about such an experience, here is my attempt:

Contemplating

Christ's relevance to crises in other subcultures, and calculating how challenge can be channeled to communicate constructively.

Attempting to transfer timely faith to tepid attitudes, and toying with temptations to tune in "tomorrow."

Joining hands, nonresistently, in the war against poverty, and detecting that handshakes with sweat are significant.

Struggling

when success seems secondary to failure, and shuddering when factions of fellowmen shrug their shoulders.

Deciding

that desire to delete dire need is mandatory, and beholding dreams being dissolved by disappointments.

Probing

into puzzling complexities of personhood, and relinquishing age-old legends of lament.

Reviving

hearts hindered by lack of a Christ-centered humanity, and resolving that schemes for erasing problems need revision.

Healing the Whole Man

By Luke Birky

Mennonite Board of Missions through its Health and Welfare Division manages ten general hospitals, eleven long-term care or retirement units, four child welfare programs, one school of practical nursing, and serves as the liaison and support channel for Mennonite Mental Health Services of MCC. These institutions are located in eight states, employ over 900 people, and have a combined annual budget of over seven million dollars.

The annual cost to the Mission Board for the Health and Welfare Division is approximately $90,000. Less than one half this sum is church-contributed. Thoughtful critics and supporters alike continue to ask why the Mission Board is involved in this type of activity, and if it is worth the effort.

It may be proper to point out that these programs are only one part of the Mennonite Church's total effort in these areas of concern. An increasing number of Mennonites are entering the health and welfare professions, and most are making significant contributions in private practice or in other agencies and institutions. Groups of members, congregations, district conferences, and regional groups have developed and are carrying on a wide variety of organized social services — camping programs, day care centers, nursing homes, and rescue missions. Most of these endeavors contribute significantly to society and to the total mission of the church.

Very central to the gospel as articulated by Christ is the concept of loving one's neighbor. This is not meant to be only an abstraction or lip service, but must result in concrete action. James 2:15, 16 puts it so well: "If a brother or sister is ill-clad and in lack of daily food, and one of you says to them, 'Go in peace, be warmed and filled,' without giving them the things needed for the body, what does it profit?"

The Health and Welfare Division sees its role as a service organization, providing assistance to communities and local Mennonite groups that have a vision and desire for serving in this way but who feel the need for a broader management, legal, or financial base. It is generally assumed that most North American communities, if informed and challenged, can provide the capital and operating costs.

In many situations outside administrative assistance has proved helpful and good results have followed. Through these programs, the church — without apology and without proselyting objective — has attempted to serve the physical, emotional, and spiritual needs of men. A freedom exists which allows the good news to be lived and spoken as a team effort.

Luke Birky, secretary for Health and Welfare at Mennonite Board of Missions, is currently on a one-year leave of absence for study at the University of Oregon's School of Community Service in Eugene. Ezra C. Bender, Harrisonburg, Va., is acting secretary.

Don't Beat Me on the Head with Your Heart, Brother Yoder

By Albie Derstine

Dear Brother Yoder,

I know you're concerned about me. I've heard you talking to my dad, heard your sermons about "the young people," and read your letters to the church papers. And someone says you told the church last Sunday that you've given up on me.

Don't do that, Brother Yoder. Just read this letter first, and let me tell you why Bets (that's Sam K.'s daughter) and I don't want you to forget us.

First of all, you may be surprised to hear me call you "brother." It's the first time I did it, and there isn't any malice meant. It's just that in my college classes there are several blacks who when they talk about each other say, "Now this brother here," or "I like that sister's idea." There's something good about that. It says people have something in common, which Mister doesn't, and even though you're fifty, and I'm twenty-one, we do have something in common, don't we? You baptized me and then you sold me your mare colt when I was in high school. Your boy and I went camping together on the Susquehanna. So if you don't mind, I'll say "brother."

Well, Brother Yoder, I want to tell you some things about us "young people," which Bets and I were hashing over tonight.

You're worried that we're "rebellion" and "drifting away," you told my dad. Listen. If your principles are right and if you live them yourself, we'll believe them someday. Being a Christian is a growing experience — you yourself said it. And a good many in our young people's group are Christians — not 100 percent Christian, but neither are you. That takes a lifetime. So you'll pardon Bets and me if we're still only 23 percent Christian and kindly show us how to improve. Believe me, we want to improve.

Life is good, we say. That's why we let our long hair fly free (Bets won't wear a bun like your wife, Marjorie. I'm being frank with you, Brother Yoder. So don't stop until the end) and ride motorbikes on Sundays. That's why we're marching in the protest march on Monday. Not because we don't believe your principles, but because we do, and we're trying to follow them to their logical conclusions. We're not only Mennonites, but we're American, and that means we're concerned for our country. We're tired of advertisements and the military. Well, you wrote a letter to Mayor Bolts about the WPA when that first came out in the thirties, your wife said.

Another thing, you talked about my car and the '26 Cadillac I'm fixing up on the side. Well, let's face it. I've got money, and so do you. Lots of it. I'm earning $125 a week since the last raise, so why shouldn't I spend it on a new Mustang with mags, and on a double-breasted suit, and to fix up my '26 Cadillac. That car's an investment. I'll sell it someday for twice that.

After all, Brother Yoder, you just remodeled your house and put in a $700 living-room suite and carpet in the kitchen. Sure it's easier on your wife's feet, I know that. Now my mom wants one too. You're milking sixty Holsteins right now, too. My point is, all that takes a lot of money. So if we've got to learn how to use our money wisely and give 10 percent to the Lord's work, as you say, lead the way. Tell us how you're spending your money.

Remember, most of us boys gave two years of our time and if I'd have had a little teaching on it, I'd have been willing to do voluntary service, instead of asking for a good salary. But nobody said anything. Everybody assumed it was all right to go ahead and earn all the money you could, just so long as you were working off your two years.

I know how you feel about money, though. None of us have ever been rich before, and it feels kind of funny to be that way. Rich. I mean really rich. So what are we going to do with all this money? I'm serious, Brother Yoder.

As I said, I'm speaking for my girl, Bets, too when I write this letter. Now you'll notice that this page is in red ink. That's because I wrote it last night after I'd taken her home for the night. I was a little embarrassed. She was wearing a really short skirt, and Preacher, I'm thinking she doesn't know how that charges me up. Well, you don't expect me to say anything to her, do you? I'd really appreciate if you would — but kindly, Brother Yoder. Don't blast us over the pulpit, because that turns everyone off.

The same applies to those fellows that drink and smoke and take drugs. And your boy's one of them, as I suppose you know. But could you tell them kindly? Not that it says in the Bible, "Don't drink," because we all know that isn't true. Not that it's unchristian either, because that's not true either. The definition of a Christian is not "a man who doesn't smoke," but "a man who believes that Christ is his Savior," if I remember correctly. I guess this all comes under the fruit of the Spirit, doesn't it? Well, show those boys how to live, explain, give reasons, and they'll respect you. I can't say they'll change right away. But I guarantee they'll respect you.

Now this next one is sort of touchy. It's about sex, you know. And I saw a cartoon that said, "Sex is a communist plot," but I don't think that's so. It's God-given, isn't it, Brother Yoder? Well, I know you overheard me say your Sharon's got a nice body, and I didn't mean no harm by it. You probably heard some four-letter words too, at least you would if you came out to the parking lot after Sunday school. But I say, words are words. We call potatoes, "potatoes."

I'm against dirty talk, and I know there are fellows around that make a girl want to drop through a hole in the sidewalk, she's so embarrassed. I just think we're the frank generation, and that has nothing to do with dirty talk or being unchristian. We're as concerned about having a happy love life, as you were at twenty-one, Preacher, and Bets and I decided no sex until we're married.

Now don't pick up that one thing and blow it up in your next sermon. I'm talking level with you, because I think the generation gap is jumpable. And I want you to be level with me.

You asked my Bets the other day, "Have you ever witnessed to anyone?" Not much, Brother Yoder. Not much. But we'd like to, if we knew how. We'd like you to show us how. Really, Bets is concerned about this girl we know who works at the college coffeehouse. But don't tell us about tracts, because that's an awfully easy way out. Just show us how to talk to people about our faith. Like I said, we're both Christians, Bets and I. But it seems we just don't know how. And not to be rude, but I don't think you've ever told us how in a sermon or privately. Probably our fault — we never asked before.

We'll be living in Cleveland, did I tell you? After the wedding next fall. It'll be our first time to live in the city, and I expect it might be rough, but Bets was in one of these servanthood things once in New York and really liked it. That was only for a summer though. I guess the city's rough on a fellow. Not all the Mennonites who go make it, I hear. A few end up divorced, a few get big-time jobs and drift off. But not everybody made it in the country either, did they? Sure, everybody keeps coming to church, but you know Old Man Fahnstock isn't much of a Christian. His children all went wild and he chases off Halloweeners with buckshot. Plus he raises ten acres of the weed for that company down in North Carolina, and I suppose you know which one I mean.

So that's why I guess we're still only 23 percent Christian, Brother Yoder. But we'd like to hear from you. Really we would. Don't write us off yet.

You've heard the Edward R. Murrow story about the difference between LBJ and JFK already, haven't you? Just in case you haven't, let me tell you. Mr. Murrow said he always knew where JFK's mind was, but he was never sure where his heart was. But Johnson, well, he was always sure where his mind was and Johnson kept beating him over the head with his heart until I guess he got sick and tired of it.

In short, what Bets and I would like is to know where your heart is, and don't beat us over the head with it. If you show us where it is, we'll come through, Brother Yoder. I can feel it in my bones. I want to be a 100 percent Christian in my heart. But you'll just have to show me how. Well thanks for your attention and if that "Brother" bothers you, let me know. See you Sunday.

Sincerely,
Albie

P.S. Bets says hello to Aunt Marjorie and Jill.

There is a story of a young college girl who visited the home of Beethoven. She asked permission to play on the great master's piano. She played a few bars and then said to the guard, "I suppose all the great artists have played this piano during their visits here?" He replied, "No. Paderewski was here two years ago and someone asked him to play. But he declined, saying he was not worthy to touch that piano." All great people are humble. That is why they are great. — Charles L. Allen, in Prayer Changes Things, (Fleming H. Revell Company).

God, Israel, and Palestine

By J. Otis Yoder

In view of the fact that there has been much question and discussion regarding the Middle East "seething pot," it seems necessary to offer some help to those on the sidelines. The experts who visit the area for a few days often come away with easy answers. Most of those answers offer no real solutions, however, because they fail to consider basic issues. Surface analyses of necessity only require surface solutions. The roots of the problem of the Middle East reach back into the early recorded history of man. We may even assert that the occasion of the situation lies in eternity with God Almighty, whose omniscience foresees all things from the beginning. Israel's prophet Isaiah spoke to this point in these words, "Remember the former things of old: for I am God, and there is none else; I am God, and there is none like me; declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times things that are not yet done" (Is. 46:9, 10a).

Accepting, as we do, the truth of the Bible we must let the Word of God form the basis of our preliminary as well as our fundamental discussions. It is with this in mind that the following analysis of the underlying factors of the Middle East question is presented.

Two Points of View

During the fall and early winter of 1961 my wife and I were living in the city of Jerusalem, Israel, where I was visiting professor at the American Institute of Holy Land studies. During our residence in Israel we became acquainted with a number of Jewish educators and merchants. One of these merchants is Leopold Rosenfeld whose shop is opposite the post office in Jerusalem. Mr. Rosenfeld is a most interesting person to visit. I often stopped in and talked with him. On one occasion as we were talking about the problem of Palestine, Mr. Rosenfeld said, "Before the war in '48 we had very cordial relationships with Arabs. In fact," he said, "during the war some of my Arab friends were most gracious in helping us." Mr. Rosenfeld had come from Germany to Israel some years before the formation of the state. On another occasion as I was leaving his store after a warm visit, he said to me as we neared the door, "You know, it doesn't make any difference what the United Nations does with this land, God said it belongs to us." Then he added, "Now you may have something and someone else is taking care of it for you."

I have often pondered Mr. Rosenfeld's remark and wondered at the depth of this man's perception and the gracious spirit which he expressed. There was a deep faith, as well, in his words, a faith that took him back across the centuries and anchored him in the promises that God had made to his forefathers. In fact, we can be quite certain that this same quality of faith sustained all the Jews during the centuries of their wanderings across the face of the earth. Leopold Rosenfeld expressed in those words the heartfelt faith of every sincere Jew, no matter where he lives.

During my teaching experience at Eastern Mennonite College one of my colleagues said to me, "Oh, I'm not interested in a piece of real estate," when we were talking about the promises of God with respect to Palestine and Israel. Of course, it can be understood that the attachment or detachment to the land of Palestine of a Gentile Christian is considerably different from that of a Jew. However, the attitudes of these two men, Mr. Leopold Rosenfeld and my Gentile Christian friend, are quite different. One is very much interested in a piece of real estate because God said it belongs to him and his people. The other couldn't care less about a piece of real estate. How can these two points of view be reconciled? My Gentile Christian friend does not stand alone in his point of view. Nor indeed does my Jewish friend stand alone as is evidenced by the modern state of Israel. Is there any point where these two attitudes can be reconciled? Basically, the answer is no. What has to happen is that one attitude has to be changed, one or the other.

God's Rights to Real Estate

There can be no question at the outset about God's relationship to Palestine. There are a number of Scripture texts in which God specifically stated that there is a piece of land which is of particular interest to Him. God, in fact, is sufficiently interested in a sphere of real estate that He was willing to make it habitable for man. We call it the earth. "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." On that earth He planted a garden, Eden. In that garden He placed the first man, Adam, made in His own image.
There man and his "help meet for him" broke the prohibition of God and consequently broke their fellowship with Him. When God pronounced judgment upon them and upon the serpent that beguiled them, He also pronounced a judgment upon the earth, that sphere of real estate which He had made as a place of residence for man.

It was to this same sphere of real estate that the Almighty sent His Son to redeem the man who had broken fellowship with Him. Through that Son, perfect Man and perfect God, the triune Godhead set out to redeem and reclaim what the devil had wrecked in the Garden of Eden.

In the course of time, God made choice of all the land mass of the earth and designated a small section on the eastern shore of the Mediterranean Sea as "my land." No less than nine places in the Scripture God made special reference to that small section of real estate as "my land." (See Lev. 25:23, 24: Is. 14:24-27; Jer. 2:4-6; 16:11-21; Ezek. 36:1-5; 38:14-23; Joel 1:5-10; 3:1-3; and Zech. 2:8-12.)

Now, maybe my Gentile friend is not interested in a piece of real estate, but it would appear from these nine Scriptures that God is. Furthermore, it is not the whole earth to which God referred in these instances. There are abundant other Scriptures which indicate that God is interested in the entire earth, in fact, the entire universe, not only the earth, but the earth and the heavens. But in these Scriptures cited above and in their contexts God indicated that He is interested in a particular piece of real estate.

The Scripture as God unfolded His revelation to man contains abundant references as to where that land is and what His particular relationship is with it and what people have been chosen to occupy that land.

Abraham’s Rights

In the very beginning of the Hebrew people in Genesis 12:1-3, God made choice of one man who was living in the center of human civilization, Ur of the Chaldees. God called him from Ur to a land that He would show him. When Abram arrived in the land to which God was taking him, the Almighty made an unqualified promise to him: He guaranteed that land to Abram and to his seed. Later in Abram’s life after Lot had separated himself from him, the Lord appeared again and reconfirmed His promise. In fact, He said unqualifiedly, "All the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever" (Gen. 13:15).

We must give attention to these promises, else the Word of God makes little sense. The important point is that God set out to accomplish His purpose. Abram and his seed, along with the land, form an infinitely important part of that purpose. However, Abram faced a serious problem. God had promised a land to him and his seed forever but he had no children. How could this promise be realized? When the conflict of promise and fulfillment arose in Abram’s mind God again promised him the land and named ten Canaanite nations that would be dispossessed so that the promise could be carried out. Genesis 15:18-21. God was interested in the real estate of these ten Canaanite nations and promised it to Abram.

Because of the implications of fulfillment since there were no children born to Sarah, she offered Abram her Egyptian maid to wife. From this union was born a son, Ishmael, and the basis of crisis was laid. However, the purpose of God was not set aside. God reappeared to Abram and changed his name to Abraham, meaning he was to be the father of many nations. Genesis 17:5. Then God made a distinctly important covenant with Abraham setting forth the temporal extent and the earthly people of that covenant. Genesis 17:6-8. It is an everlasting covenant with Abraham and his seed.

Even though Ishmael was Abraham’s son, yet God said Sarah would have a son, though she was past age, at which both Sarah and Abraham laughed. “And Abraham said unto God. O that Ishmael might live before thee” (Gen. 17:18)! In reply to Abraham’s prayer God settled it forever that it is not Ishmael but Isaac whom God has chosen to inherit the promises. Genesis 17:20, 21. Sarah’s effort to help God by using Hagar did not change God’s purpose. God said Sarah would give birth to a son, Isaac, and added, “I will establish my covenant with him for an everlasting covenant, and with his seed after him” (Gen. 17:19). Thus God not only made choice of a land but also of a people who were to inherit that land.

Isaac was born in due time. He grew up and was married. From that union twin sons were born. It was the practice that the oldest son stood in line for the inheritance. However, God informed Rebekah, Isaac’s wife, before their birth that the practice will not be followed in the case of her sons. Instead “the elder shall serve the younger” (Gen. 25:23). She understood that the younger will come into the right of inheritance. God did not tell Rebekah how this would come to pass but assured her that it would be so.

When Jacob fled the wrath of his brother Esau and spent the night at Bethel, God appeared to him in a dream. There God renewed with Jacob the covenant promise of the land and seed as He had earlier given to Abraham and Isaac. Genesis 28:13-15. There was again a choice made by the Almighty which carried forward His purposes.

From this point on in Bible references to the land of Palestine there is an association of that land with the promise made to Abraham. We cannot overlook this fact if we are to get any clear understanding of the relationship of God to Israel and Palestine.

Israel’s Rights

In preparation for the Exodus when God called Moses on the back side of the desert He remembered His promise. Exodus 3:1-14. In this encounter God came to Moses as “the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob.” He further stated that He had come down expressly to bring the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt into a good land. “Unto the place of the Canaanites, and the Hittites, and the Amorites, and the Perizzites, and the Hivites, and the Jebusites” (Ex. 3:8). These are seven of the same Canaanite nations of which God had spoken to Abraham 400 years earlier. This act of God establishes the fact of His purpose and that He can and does carry it out. The promise of God is valid and abiding.
All through the wanderings of the children of Israel en route to the land of Canaan, there was always that hope that one day they would possess the land promised to them. In spite of the fact that they did not enter at Kadesh-barnea that hope was never lost. Moses kept it alive. When they finally came to the plains of Moab and it was time for Moses to lay down his leadership, he encouraged them to go in and possess the land that God had sworn unto Abraham to give them. When he encouraged Israel to go into the land, Moses with a true eye of a seer saw beyond the immediate possession of the land and warned them that they would be cast out whenever they broke covenant with God. Even so, God would not forget the promise He had made because it was bound inseparably to the oath He had made with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Deuteronomy 30:1-5, 15-20.

Joshua replaced Moses as the leader and distributor of the land. After God's people came into the land of Canaan their record is a story of ebb and flow. Sometimes they faithfully followed the Lord's will and He blessed them. At other times they chose to ape the Canaanite tribes around them who had not been altogether dispossessed, and God chastened them. With the establishment of the monarchy and the choice of David to sit upon the throne of Israel there was further steadfast confidence that God was fulfilling His purposes. David looked forward to the coming of his greater Son who will one day sit upon his throne as promised. 2 Samuel 7; Psalm 89. There can hardly be a throne or a kingdom, however, without a land or without a people.

The prophets continually sought to bring Israel back to the covenant relationship which the patriarchs demonstrated and which God so surely had confirmed under the leadership of Moses at Mt. Sinai. They were to be a kingdom of priests and a holy nation under God. God had predetermined in the eternities of the past that “my land” should be their possession forever. In their messages the prophets warned Israel again and again that their path of idolatry would eventually bring the judgment of God upon them. They would be taken captive and cast out of the land and left to wander upon the face of the earth where they would find no rest for the soles of their feet and no comfort of body or soul in any country. Two such captivities took place. One was the Northern Kingdom in the year 723 BC. That kingdom was not restored in biblical times. There was a second in the year 586 BC when Jerusalem and Judah fell. Of that captivity a number returned after 70 years. In the days of Nehemiah, Ezra, and Zerubbabel they rebuilt the city wall and the temple. They were, however, never really an independent nation.

From the year 586 BC until May 15, 1948, the Jews were under the domination of Gentiles with a short break of 100 years or so during the Maccabean rule. Every one of Israel's prophets, except Nahum and Jonah, spoke of the fact that God will not forget His covenant with Abraham. Even though they were to be scattered to the four corners of the earth, God will bring them back again to their land. The Almighty had sworn by His own integrity that the promise He had made to Abraham He will eventually carry out. No less than forty-three such pronouncements were made. The purpose of God must be seen in the focus of His land and His people. (Note in particular Is. 11:10-16; 14:1-3; 34:1-8; 41:8-14; 43:1-6; 54:1-17; Jer. 12:7-17; 16:10-21; 31:27-37; 32:37-44; 33:1-7; 50:17-20; Ezek. 6:1-10; 34:11-31; 36:1-15; 37:1-14; 37:15-28; 38:1-13; 39:1-15; Dan. 11:13-27, 11:31-45; 12:1-9; Hos. 1:10, 11; 3, 4; 5, 13:9 — 14:9; Joel 2:15-27; 3:1-8; Amos 9:8-15; Mic. 2:12, 13; 4:1-8; 4:11-13; 7:7-20; Zeph. 3:9-20; Zech. 6:9-15; 8:1-9; 8:9-15; 10:9-12; 12:1-14; 14:1-21; Mal. 3:1-6; and 4:1-6.

Messiah's Rights

What shall we say to all these Old Testament promises that predict a return of Israel to the land? How do we interpret them in the light of the New Testament? Are the promises of God really valid? Does God start down one road and then change His mind? Does the New Testament set aside the Old Testament promises? Does the New Testament add to the Old Testament so that the promises can really be fulfilled?

We must pay close attention to the opening words of the New Testament. When Gabriel came to Mary in the city of Nazareth his words to her are most significant. “And the angel said unto her, Fear not, Mary: for thou hast found favour with God. And, behold, thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a son, and shalt call his name JESUS. He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest: and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David: and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end” (Lk. 1:30-33). The announcement of the birth of Jesus contained in it a reference to the promise of God to the Israel of the Old Testament. There was a direct connection unmistakably to the promise God had made to David and earlier to Abraham. Here again the divine purpose was further unfolded.

The Messiah who was promised could not be the reigning Messiah until He had become the suffering Savior. It was to this piece of real estate, Palestine, that the second person of the Godhead came as perfect Man and perfect God. It was on that hill outside the old city wall that He offered Himself as an atoning sacrifice for the sins of the world. It was there by His shed blood that forgiveness became possible. It was there on Mt. Calvary that the purpose of God was carried forward. By the resurrection of Jesus from the dead, He now stands in perfect agreement with all that the prophets spoke. No wonder He reprimanded the apostles for not believing all that the prophets had spoken. God never turned a corner in carrying out His purpose. All that the prophets spoke must surely come to pass, else God is fickle and cannot carry out what He has promised.

Gentile Christians' Attitudes

God, Israel, and Palestine are three concepts that cannot be separated in the Holy Scriptures. Too much is at stake for God to relinquish His promises. He has sworn by Himself that He will accomplish His total purpose. Before we can fully understand the twentieth-century problem in the Middle East, we must understand what happened to Abraham and what has happened to his seed. We must understand the undeniable promises God made to Israel through the prophets.

When the Gentile church understands the sweep of the divine program there will be no more antagonism expressed toward the Jews. There will be the kind of cooperation and love that will put hundreds of Gentile Christians on their knees to join the Savior as He wept over Jerusalem. We pray that before it is too late the Lord may take away the misunderstanding which has settled upon so many Gentiles. Paul put it straight. "For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance" (Rom. 11:29)

Over 3,000 Churches
Go out of Business Each Year

By J. Richard Hawley

Is your church for sale? Will it be in a few years? Over 3,000 churches go out of business every year, with their buildings being sold or demolished. Whether or not it will happen to yours no one can tell for sure. Yet there are certain attitudes or characteristics in the life of a fellowship which can serve as a warning that the end is coming, sooner than you think.

Dr. Lyle Schaller, student of church life, consultant and professional church planner, has uncovered four characteristics which spell disaster. It is his reasoned opinion — based on hundreds of case studies — that where these facts exist the life of a congregation will be foreshortened considerably.

In his book, The Local Church Looks to the Future, Schaller states: "The most highly visible of these characteristics is the lack of outreach and an almost total concentration of resources on member-oriented activities. . . . Evangelism and outreach, mission and witness in the world are almost completely ignored, especially when measured in terms of the allocation of lay leadership." A look at the way the budget of most churches is divided, to say nothing of the way time is spent by members in church-related activities, is disturbing. How little is actually concentrated on "outside the walls" activity! What a small effort is made to effect change in the lives and situations of men!

Schaller further pinpoints this characteristic by saying: "While they must be used with discretion, it is possible to develop a set of yardsticks that may be helpful for forecasting the imminence of death. When the average attendance at worship is less than 40 percent of the total confirmed membership, when the rate of baptisms each year is less than two per hundred members, when the number of persons received by profession of faith annually is less than two per hundred members, when the median age of the membership is twenty years above the median age of the residents of the community, when the level of giving drops to the bottom 10 percent for the churches in the denomination in that region, when over 85 percent of the budget is allocated to congregation care, and when over one half of the expenditures are for the care and maintenance of the property, death is probably near."

A second characteristic of a congregation that is losing its effectiveness is an excessive emphasis on the past. When the effort that goes into the celebration of a large number of anniversaries, homecomings and other events which glorify the past exceeds that which goes into evangelism and mission, the signs of decay and degeneration are beginning to show. And when the worship and preservation of the building take priority over the worship of God and the use of the building in witness, the end really comes into view. Schaller puts it: "When the care and maintenance of the building, rather than the effective use of the building as a tool for mission, become the governing concern of the trustees . . . it is a mark of yesterday's congregation."

The third sign needs little explanation. It is when the neighborhood church becomes a church without a neighborhood constituency. Some churches, like most downtown congregations, cannot be considered in this evaluation. But the vast majority of churches should have a strong neighborhood orientation to live. "The lack of a meaningful relationship to neighboring residents frequently is a characteristic of yesterday's congregation."

The fourth characteristic is surprising. It is the negative attitude of the congregation toward the denomination, denominational officials, and denominational resources. Few may view such an attitude as the bearer of death, for quite the opposite view is often heard. Yet the fact remains, when the denomination is viewed as an enemy rather than a potential ally, trouble is brewing. "Instead of viewing the denomination as a source of aid, advice, and help, the denomination is seen as an outside force extracting money from the local church and attempting to dictate policy, program, and goals." This sense of alienation makes it all but impossible for the denomination to render assistance and help the church to adapt to change. Experience has further shown that unless help is sought after — and is a result of a careful study of its purposes and clear delineation of its plans, no help should be given. Unsolicited help is seldom used effectively.

Dr. Schaller states: "A congregation displaying only one or two of these four characteristics may or may not belong in the category of yesterday's congregation. A parish displaying all four, however, probably has a short expectancy as a church. It may continue to exist for years, or even decades, as an institution, but its future as a religious institution is limited."

What can you do if any or all of the characteristics apply to your particular church? First of all, carefully consider whether or not your church should have a future. A congregation — like an individual — was not meant to live forever. It has a normal life cycle, time of birth and growth, peak of strength and service, decline in vitality and resources. Has your church performed its original purposes and outlived its reason for being?

If this is not true, begin by following the example of Christ who "humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross." Death must precede new life (except a grain of wheat die...). Congregations evidencing new life have gone through their Gethsemanes and Calvarys. Being dead to self, they have been raised to newness of life — for the sake of others. Then — and only then — has the Spirit been given freedom to live and move within the fellowship and cause its effectiveness to be restored.

This comes about in a number of ways, but present in all renewal or rebirth experiences is "the process of the rediscovery of purpose, the reawakening of a sense of mission, the redefinition of goals, and the renewing of the spirit of the members. This is the process of moving from a survival structure to a missionary structure." This happens far more often than most critics realize. "It happens in many situations in which denominational executives, church planners, and consultants have written off a parish as doomed to extinction. It happens often enough to demonstrate the power of the Holy Spirit."

The key question would then appear to be, "Will you let the Spirit work in your midst, even if it means purging the old to allow the new to come?" The alternative is certain and unwelcome, "A Church for Sale."

To Help Us Stay Young

On the occasion of the celebration of his 80th birthday, Herbert Hoover said this:

"The older I grow, the more I appreciate children. Now, at my 80th birthday, I salute them again. Children are the most wholesome part of the race, the sweetest, for they are freshest from the hand of God. Whimsical, ingenious, mischievous, they fill the world with joy and good humor. We adults live a life of apprehension as to what they will think of us; a life of defense against their terrifying energy; a life of hard work to live up to their great expectations. We put them to bed with a sense of relief — and greet them in the morning with delight and anticipation. We envy them the freshness of adventure and the discovery of life. In all these ways, children add to the wonder of being alive. In all these ways, they help to keep us young."

Calling the Holy Spirit

By Rose Ann Martin

God, I’d like to talk directly with the Holy Spirit. Thank You. Spirit, I rang up to tell You I feel sorry for You. I know no one died — that’s not why I called. I just feel awful sorry for You.

It all started last night when I went to a meeting. You know it’s fall and that means the annual church business meetings. Well, I never realized until last night how important You are at business meetings. Whenever there was an argument (heated discussion), both sides claimed You inspired them. Those who wanted a pulpit with a high top said if the others would let the Spirit speak to them they would see how symbolic it was of reaching up to You. Those who wanted a low pulpit said the Spirit showed them how symbolic it was of how small man is in Your sight.

Now I want to know something, Spirit. Are You that political that You favor both sides? I guess there was no connection, Spirit, but it did seem strange that those who never want to spend money wanted the low altar. Spirit, do You change Your tune with big spenders? They are tuned in right, aren’t they?

Then there was a matter of joint witness in the community. Some said we should have a Thanksgiving service with the large church down the street. It would show the Spirit is working, they said.

Mrs. Klein sprang to her feet. She said the church down the street did not believe in nonresistance and how could the Spirit work in such a setting. It would cloud over His message, especially if they would have a prayer for their servicemen.

I know that church knows how we feel and I thought a Thanksgiving service wouldn’t hurt us. I didn’t know You’d be on both sides.

You know it’s pretty hard to vote at business meetings, Spirit. I don’t know whether to vote with the no-to-progress, no-to-spending Spirit or the no-stop-to-progress, no-end-to-spending Spirit. I really called, Spirit, to see if You could help. But please don’t divide Your Spirit a few more ways. I got the impression last night that not only is there a Trinity — Father and Son and Holy Ghost — but there is at least “binity” of Spirit.
Our world is becoming one vast city. Old patterns are being upset by technological advance, the rising expectations of the underprivileged, and the youth revolt. But in this ferment and flux spiritual realities are becoming visible: the presence of Christ, the power of the Gospel, and the fellowship of the church. Through His people Christ is at work throughout the world inviting every man into the circle of His fellowship.

Amidst the din and destruction of war in Saigon, Vietnam, a young congregation is growing and developing. Under the leadership of Pastor Tran Xuan Quang, these Christians serve their neighbors through adult classes, an elementary school, emergency relief, medical services, family assistance, and rebuilding projects. National Christians, Vietnam Christian Service workers, and ten Mennonite missionaries share together in the deed of service and the word of testimony.

In New York City, one of the world’s centers of finance and commerce, the Seventh Avenue Mennonite Church is learning to serve its community in partnership with the local people. When individual members are committed to servanthood, the church building must reflect the same stance. In the auditorium fixed benches have given way to chairs to serve a variety of activities throughout the week. In a Headstart program, the congregation helps people of the community to improve the situation for their children. Government funds are available to the project; the community shares in seeing that the funds serve their needs. Members staff this program and a youth center—God’s people helping their neighbors, available to hungry hearts with the Gospel message. Leading the team are Pastors Richard Pannell and Harold Davenport.

In the land of the Queen of Sheba, now impatient for progress and development, Addis Ababa, Nazareth, and Dire Dawa are the bases of activity for the Meserete Kristos Church. Missionaries are learning to step aside so that national leaders are free to help their brotherhood develop its own patterns. “Facilitator,” not “administrator,” is the way they describe their leader. In his first annual report Shamsudin Abdo wrote, “Many members feel more responsible for the church work. Although there are many clashes of ideas we are not afraid of them, because very often unity comes from diversities. Evangelism is our central concern for the coming year.” A three-year breach between central leadership and the Shoa congregation has been healed. “Through this painful experience,” Ato Shamsudin wrote, “the Lord has taught both sides more about His love, mercy, and forgiveness.” Two months later sixty additional persons were baptized into the congregation.

In Washington D.C., capital of the nation richest in resources, but threatened with decay from within, some youth volunteers are struggling to get to the root causes of the problems that beset their community. While their involvement has only begun, these youth workers are convinced that one must move beyond putting band-aids on festering sores; that he must get to root causes. This requires special training and expertise, and long-term involvement. Workers must be closely identified with the community; the leadership must have enough local autonomy to find the way. Nelson Good and the VSers are experimenting with an evangelistic approach to the inner city.

In restless, eager Honduras, Tegucigalpa, LaCeiba, and San Pedro Sula have become the focal points for a church which began twenty years ago in rural areas. Missionaries, VSers, and national Christians are pooling their efforts through a Committee of Christian Service (COSEC), experimenting with a coordinated program of agriculture and community development, literacy, medicine, and evangelism. Administrator LaMar Stauffer is responsible to COSEC Chairman Miguel Lopez. Ernestina Chavez works with Mary Leaman at Gualaceo clinic, and Albania Molina with Alta Mae Metzler in home economics. Hondurans served with missionaries in war relief projects, and with overseas MDS personnel in rebuilding a school following hurricane Francella. Chairman Norman Hockman reported that the Honduran Mennonite Church has begun its third year in intensive evangelism. Membership last year increased 20 per cent, and offerings 50 per cent.

Eastern Board is a district board. The church has asked us to spearhead a part of her overseas witness—an experience that has brought blessings to our people that could have come in no other way.

We appreciate the way the total church is strengthening our hand. Of our 200 missionaries, 40% are from outside the conference. Of our $1 ½ million budget, 10% comes from the wider brotherhood.

In turn, we also want, under God’s leading, to carry our share in the program of the total brotherhood. Steps are being taken to strengthen our home ministries on the eastern seaboard, working together with others whom God is using.

Who Shall Live is a report prepared for the American Friends Service Committee which deals with man's control over birth and death. It recognizes the relationship of a number of seemingly separate problems —abortion, contraception, increased life expectancy, genetic counseling, surgical transplants —and treats them as several aspects of a single question. It deals with the question: How can we maintain the size of the population so that every individual does not merely survive but can develop fully and participate in society in a satisfying and productive way? This careful study by outstanding authorities is available in paperback for $1.75 and cloth, $3.95.

The major program division staff of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) was urged to explore "possible services and resources needed" for a ministry to an estimated 60,000 Americans in Canada who have evaded military service.

The United Christian Missionary Society said, in making the request, that the church was not sanctioning desertion or draft dodging in expressing concern for them and their families. "Rather it is seeking to minister to human needs," it said.

"Just as the church provides chaplains to men in the armed forces without seeking to justify the war process itself," said the Disciples leaders, "and just as the church seeks to provide pastors to men in prison without asking first what crime they have committed, just so the church is called upon to provide pastoral care to these young men and their families."* * *

Who Is a Jew? In a historic pronouncement last month, the Israeli Supreme Court drew a legal distinction between "peoplehood" (nationality) and religion of the Jewish people. The judges ruled in a 5-4 decision that the government must register the children of a Jewish father and Gentile mother.

The nature of Jewry has long been in dispute. The current issue involves an Israeli naval officer whose wife refused conversion to Judaism but fully joined her husband's concept of "belonging to the Jewish people." The government would not register their children, claiming that the Jewish religion and peoplehood are indivisible as defined by the Halachah, Jewish religious law, which recognizes as Jews only children of a Jewish mother or a convert to Judaism.* * *

To "sell" religion, the "Good News" must have a little bad news mixed in with it, Marshall McLuhan told religious broadcasters. Addressing the 27th annual convention of the National Religious Broadcasters, the well-known author and philosopher on communications media said that good news is not news, it's advertising and as such is terrifying.

"Good news," he continued, "threatens you with change. It says, 'Man, if you buy this, you are going to have to be different.' And, salesmen, remember you are selling something most people are terrified of —good news."

Therefore, he said, mix a little bad news — traditional hellfire — into the good.* * *

Mrs. Madalyn Murray O'Hair, the self-styled atheist credited with bringing about the Supreme Court ban on public school prayer, founded her own "church" in an effort to break down the tax-exempt status of the churches.

Declaring herself a "bishop" and her husband, Richard, a "prophet," she said her Poor Richard's Universal Life Church was her latest attempt to do something about the relationship of religion to the tax structure of the country.

"I've researched this for a year," Mrs. O'Hair said. "It's absolutely airtight." She said she had drawn from all churches in formulating her church's charter. According to Mrs. O'Hair she and her husband have taken vows of poverty and turned over all their property to the church. "As long as all churches and all religions are tax-exempt, this church will be tax-exempt," Mrs. O'Hair asserted.

She said "converts" can sell or give their property to the church and then operate on a tax-exempt basis, with the church purchasing and leasing back property to owners. Among the operations possible, she listed motels, stores, mines, newspapers, farms, industries, utilities, racetracks, distilleries, and restaurants.

"This is firmly established in law," Mrs. O'Hair stated, "including Supreme Court decisions and Internal Revenue rulings."* * *

The United Methodist Church and the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) have reported fairly heavy membership losses in 1969.

According to an announcement issued in Evanston, Ill., the "official" membership of the United Methodist Church is 10,789,624, a decrease of 201,096 from the December 1968 report.

In Indianapolis, Dr. Howard E. Dentler, Year Book editor and assistant to the general minister of the Christian Church, said that the membership now stands at 1,444,465 —a drop of 148,000 in a year.* * *

Just as the adoption of Christianity determined the date of the fall of the Roman Empire but did not save it from the inevitable end, so Marxist doctrine has delayed the breakup of the Russian empire — the third Rome — but has been powerless to avert it.

This is the view of a young journalist from the "Samizdat" group of underground writers in Moscow who publish unconcerned by the Soviet bureaucracy.

Andrei Amalrik, 31, was quoted by C. L. Sulzberger in London as saying that "I have no doubt that this great eastern Slav empire, created by Germans, Byzantines, and Mongols, has entered the last decades of its existence."

The young writer sees war with China growing, Germany and Eastern Europe "desovietized." Amid this fury, Amalrik sees Moscow's "bureaucratic regime unable by its habitual half-measures simultaneously to wage a war, solve the economic difficulties, and suppress or satisfy public discontent."

This, he said, will cause the Soviets to "lose control over the country and even contact with reality . . . power will pass into the hands of extremist groups and elements and the country will begin to disintegrate in an atmosphere of anarchy, violence, and intense national hatred."* * *

Two American church editors have denounced both Christian and Jewish leaders in the Mideast for using Scripture to justify political and military actions by Arab and Israeli forces.

In a joint editorial, slated to appear in two major religious journals — Catholic and Protestant — the editors urged leaders on both sides to "help defuse" the present crisis by rejecting the use of the Bible for propaganda purposes.

The editorial was written by Dr. J. Martin Bailey, editor of the United Church Herald, national magazine of the 2,000,000 member United Church of Christ, and Charles Angell, S.A., editor of The Lamp, a Catholic publication devoted to Christian ecumenism which is published by the Atome- ment Friars at Graymoor, N.Y.

Writing after an extensive fact-finding tour that took them to Egypt, Lebanon, Jordan, and Israel, they deplored "glaring anti-Jewish statements from otherwise respected Christian leaders," and, at the same time, chided Israeli spokesmen for quoting the Bible as justification for Israel's existence as a modern state.

Study Commission Announces Change in Schedule

A special session of General Conference and the three Boards (Mission Board, Board of Education, and Publication Board) scheduled for August 1970 has been postponed until October 20-22, 1970.

This change grew out of discussions between the Study Commission on Church Organization and the Executive Committees of General Conference and the three Boards. It recognizes that more time will be needed in the process of implementing the new Mennonite Church structure. The report submitted by the Study Commission on Church Organization (SCCO) to General Conference at Turner, Ore., last year was given general approval. However, much work remains to be done in spelling out the administrative details and implementation procedures for this proposal for restructure of the church's Boards and agencies.

Furthermore, it is also being recognized that concerns are being raised about certain aspects of the new model. In order to give adequate time to enable listening to these concerns, the schedule has been delayed.

The October meeting will be intended to confirm the model or approve a revision of the model. Following that, work will proceed on preparation of the bylaws and organizational details for the new plan.

In August 1971 a constitutional assembly will be called to give formal approval to the bylaws for the new organization. This assembly will be comprised of delegates from the district conferences, recognizing that the locus of authority in the Mennonite Church rests in the district conferences and that the district conferences are involved in determining membership of the three Boards.

Paul N. Kraybill, SCCO Executive Secretary, has been assigned responsibility to move ahead in studying the model and listening to the concerns of the church. He will arrange for meetings with churchwide agencies, district conference representatives, and congregational councils in order to secure broad involvement in this next stage of the SCCO's work. It is hoped that this will come a model that will satisfactorily reflect the brotherhood's mission and goals.

Anyone wishing to communicate to the SCCO any concerns or suggestions regarding the process of restructure is invited to contact Paul N. Kraybill, Executive Secretary, SCCO, Box 128, Salonga, Pa. 17538 (telephone 717 989-2251).

Bible Study Grows in Ghana

"Our correspondence courses seem to be advertised by word of mouth. We get applications faster than we graduate students, and young men make up the largest percentage of enrollments." Laurence Horst sent that comment to Mennonite Broadcasts from Accra, Ghana, where he is Home Bible Studies pastor. He and his wife, Marian, left the United States in mid-1969 to work with the growing Ghana Mennonite Church.

Home Bible Studies in Ghana are handled by two separate departments: the local Mennonite Church and The Way to Life radio program office. Anna Kurtz is in charge of radio-related correspondence.

Home Bible Studies have received much criticism in Africa, claiming that the courses are written in an American context and not African. However, Horst believes that the lessons are applicable and says that people are "begging to be enrolled."

To support his belief he quotes a letter from a young man: "This course has changed my life entirely and some of my friends wonder about my new way of life. It has taught me to pray, to forgive, to give, to read the Bible, and many other things to prepare me for the coming of Christ." Another project becoming increasingly important in the Home Bible Studies work is the Mennonite Bookstore in Accra. A book list is sent to each student, along with an extra one to give to a friend. Horst feels that this helps to advertise the store, as well as the presence of the church there.

About 1,500 items are sent out from the bookstore each month.

Much of Horst's time is spent in sending letters in response to questions from students. He spends about 30 minutes on each letter and feels that "the chance to write personally is a great opportunity to give guidance to a young man who will be helping to determine the future of this young nation."

The Horsts have begun holding church services in their home. Several young men are attending who, they believe, "could be an important factor in the opening of an enlarged church ministry here in this capital city."

The influence of Mennonite radio programs is very small in Ghana. Although Mennonite Broadcasts' Way to Life program is transmitted over ELWA in Liberia it does not reach Ghana very well. But Horst believes that Way to Life "can be a valuable member of the Ghana Mennonite Church team for evangelism and Bible teaching" and he is eager for the day when the church is large enough to support the broadcast locally.

Personnel Needed for Expanded Nigeria Program

Although Nigeria's civil war is ended, the need for emergency relief and longer-term rehabilitation is not. The big relief agencies of the world are rushing in to feed the Ibos, offering almost more than can be distributed. The U.S. government offer of 40,000 tons per month is described by some authorities in Nigeria as excessive. Many of the European medical teams are of two to three months duration.

In light of these developments, the Mennonite Central Committee believes its specialty in Nigeria, as in other areas of the world, will be in the longer-term aspects of rehabilitation.

Toward that end, MCC plans to increase its medical and rehabilitation teams, and to continue working with both the American Friends Service Committee (AFSC) and the Christian Council of Nigeria, as it did during the war.

Personnel are needed immediately to fill these projected plans. Within the next 60 days MCC needs 4 doctors, 3 nurses, 2 agriculturists, 5 agricultural Poxmen, a construction supervisor, a social worker, a mechanic, and an administrator. MCC will draw from those who have applied, but additional volunteers are still needed. Interested persons should write MCC, Akron, Pa. 17501.

Vern Preheim, director for Africa and the Middle East, was in Nigeria the last of the month and the first of March. With officials in the Christian Council of Nigeria, Preheim clung up plans as to how best MCC can assist in the council's plans for long-term rehabilitation.
Valentine’s Day Project Sends Health Kits

Each year the Locust Grove Mennonite School, Smoketown, Pa., sponsors a special Valentine project to help the needy in some part of the world. This year the project was health kits for Haiti.

At a special all-school assembly on Feb. 12, the colorful health kits were arranged on the stage of the school. The 153 students from kindergarten to grade eight had brought in 361 kits. Each kit contained a comb, toothbrush, toothpaste, and a washcloth. One family which has three children in the school gave 20 kits.

Miss Maribel Kraybill, principal of the school, introduced two guests who showed the students slides of Haiti. Mrs. Sam Martin showed slides of the work at Hospital Albert Schweitzer, where she and her husband had served for three years. She had also prepared a special bulletin board display for the project. Abner Stoltzfus showed pictures of the work his son and daughter-in-law, Dr. and Mrs. Richard Stoltzfus, are doing at Grande Riviere du Nord.

Arthur Driedger, MCC director for Latin America, accepted the health kits from the school and told the students of the great need Haiti has for such items.

Locust Grove has sponsored a different Valentine project each year since 1958. Through the years they have donated books, sewing supplies, mittens, stuffed toys, dimes for medicine, quarters for chicks, towels, and soap. Last year the students gave 870 bars of soap for a Mennonite hospital in Shirati, Tanzania.

SST-er Helps Even After Return Home

One of the unexpected results of Goshen College’s Study-Service Trimester abroad is continuing help after the student returns home.

Linda Graber, 19, a sophomore from Clinton Brick Church, near Goshen, Ind., is a student who took her concern for the morally abandoned Costa Rican girls she learned to know back to her home congregation.

Miss Graber’s service assignment was to live and help care for 40 morally abandoned girls in a shack in Puntarenas, on the west coast of Costa Rica.

J. Daniel Hess, faculty leader of the Costa Rica SST unit, says, “At first in her service Linda was lonely and quite homesick, but by the end she had done a very nice job.” Through her, Linda’s family, a member of the congregation, and the intermediate department of her Sunday school are sending offerings for a year to help homeless Costa Rican children.

The first check of $50 went to support Hogar Cristiano (“Christian Place,” the name of the children’s home), where Miss Graber worked.

Future gifts will go to a new program of the Bible Home, considered one of the best children’s programs in Costa Rica. Around the edges of San Jose are many extremely poor and uncared for children who come from what are known as barrios. The Home will soon launch day care centers for these youngsters and provide not only meals but classes and recreation for them.

Hess says, “It means much more than you think to have congregations and parents in the United States supporting the program and work in Costa Rica in this way.

“The anticipated program in the barrios is worthy. Some of the leading doctors are urging the local Mennonite VS unit (under the Conservative Mennonite Board of Missions) to focus on the poor suburbs rather than on the rural areas. As soon as the day care centers are completed, I will be sending SST students to them to help staff them.”

Miss Graber, a 1968 graduate of Bethany Christian High School and the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Graber, of R. I, White Pigeon, Mich., is preparing to be a special education teacher for handicapped children.

New Faculty --

Augsburger and Penner

A. Don Augsburger, former pastor of students and associate professor of Christian education at Eastern Mennonite College, will return as Director of Student Affairs at EMC.

Augsburger will assume the position vacated by Paul T. Guengerich who will serve in Japan one year at the Hokkaido International School in Sapporo.

Since 1964 Augsburger has been in Goshen, Ind., where he held several positions as a churchman and educator. He was Assistant to the Dean of Goshen College Biblical Seminary for two years. In 1965 he became pastor and bishop of the North Goshen Mennonite Church. For the past two years he has been the superintendent of the Bethany Christian High School in Goshen.

President Myron S. Augsburger announced the appointment of Archie Penner as associate professor of theology.

Currently teaching at Malone College, Canton, Ohio, Penner has also taught New Testament, Greek, and church history at Steinbach (Man.) Bible Institute, and at Mennonite Biblical Seminary, Elkhart, Ind. Reared near Winnipeg, Man., Penner at. tended Bible Institute before graduating from Goshen (Ind.) College. He received his MA from Wheaton (Ill.) College Graduate School. He took further graduate work at Goshen College Biblical Seminary, Winona Lake (Ind.) School of Theology, and Northern Baptist Theological Seminary, Chicago. He received his PhD from the University of Iowa, Iowa City.

Peace Section to Sponsor Second Study Tour

As a follow-up to the highly successful 1969 Study Tour, the MCC Peace Section will again take a tour throughout the major Middle East countries. This year's tour is scheduled for the three weeks of July 24 to August 14 and will be directed by a person who participated in last year's tour.

The purpose of these tours is to acquaint North Americans with the tensions and human problems of the Middle East today. There will be visits to the major historical sites of Egypt, Jordan, Lebanon, and Israel. Brief stopovers will be made in Rome and Athens. MCC work in Crete, Jordan, and Israel will be visited. Like last year, the emphasis will be on how Christians can contribute to the reconciliation of Arab-Israeli differences. There will be briefings, lectures, and discussions in each of the countries visited.

The estimated cost of the tour is $980. There are nine $200 scholarships available, five of which are reserved for college students. Interested persons should write to the MCC Peace Section for further information.

Brotherhood Meeting

The Church Welfare Committee of Mennonite General Conference sponsored a Consultation on Brotherhood Concerns February 2-4 at Willow Valley Motor Inn, Willow Street, Pennsylvania. About 40 persons were invited. Thirty attended. Seven presentations were made in addition to a major devotional message. These presentations served as discussion stimulators for the respective sessions.

The meeting was not for the purpose of decision-making. It was rather to give occasion to identify issues which strain brotherhood, and provided an opportunity to seriously listen to one another. The setting provided an occasion to better understand one another and one in which an experience of brotherhood was realized.

Plans are being made for similar consultations to be held in other areas of the church. These consultations have been made possible through a grant of Fraternal Funds from the Mennonite Mutual Aid Organization.

Hershey Reelected President of DIA

Lester T. Hershey, director of Spanish programming for Mennonite Broadcasts, was elected to a third term as president of DIA at the December meeting in Bogota, Colombia. DIA (Difusiones InterAmericas) is an interdenominational organization dedicated to the promotion of Christian broadcasting in Latin America. Hershey was re-elected in a general assembly of DIA which met during open periods of the First Latin-American Congress on Evangelism held in Bogota in early December.

DIA, with headquarters in San Jose, Costa Rica, is involved in many mass communication projects. These include tape recordings of Spanish songs and programs, conferences on gospel communication, workshop training in the use of radio and TV, and many others. They now distribute about 1,600 programs per month.

Mennonite Broadcasts' recordings of Spanish hymns have been used in the production of LP record albums. These records are used in broadcasts, churches, open-air meetings, clinics, schools, and homes to take the gospel to people who may not listen to other kinds of approaches.

In the words of Kenneth Weaver, executive director of Mennonite Broadcasts: "DIA is an excellent program of outreach in Latin America and we are happy to be able to work with them in this ministry."

Who Are the GCs?

Secretary of the General Conference Mennonites Heinz Janzen likened his church today to "a man whose backbone begins at El Reno, Okla., runs north until it rams the Canadian border with the right arm of the conference upraised over western Canada, dangling Pacific Coast churches like grapes, the left arm running east to the Pennsylvania churches and the head of the conference, Henry Poettcker, at the head of the backbone in Winnipeg." He was speaking, of course, of the General Conference geography.

What are the "G.C. Mennonites" really like? Colorful and varied, writes Janzen in the March issue of Christian Living magazine. He goes on to describe a church of immigrants who awoke the Mennonite Church in the latter nineteenth century by introducing Sunday schools, traveling evangelists, church colleges, and a new sense of mission. In World War II they were accused of selling out the traditional Mennonite position of nonresistance, yet today the majority of G.C. boys once more take the peace stand.

Illustrated with several unusual historical photos, Janzen's "The Patchwork Quilt of the Mennonites" is the fourth in a series of eight studies of Mennonite groups in America to run in Christian Living, sponsored with a grant from the Scholawer Foundation, and aimed at providing in-depth information about the various Mennonite groups and appreciation for the character and contribution of each. Still to be featured in 1970 are the Mennonite Brethren, Evangelical Mennonite Groups, "Old" Mennonites, and the Amish groups.

Foundation Grows

The Mennonite Foundation enjoyed substantial growth in its churchwide ministry during 1969. Foundation personnel are observing increasing evidence that Mennonites want to be good stewards of their accumulated possessions.

Gift assets held by the Foundation increased 35 percent to a total of $1,259,000 at the end of 1969. During the past four years these assets have grown more than eight times. Most of the gift assets represent cash and property received and managed by the Foundation for eventual distribution to designated Mennonite institutions and other charitable organizations.

The Foundation staff was enlarged during 1969. Harry E. Martens is now serving as a full-time Estate Planning Consultant. Also initiated during the year was the appointment of Area Representatives in the more populated Mennonite communities.

The Board of Directors became more inter-Mennonite during 1969. The Finance Committee of the Board, which directly oversees the work of the Foundation, now includes Board members from the General Conference Mennonite Church and Mennonite Brethren Church, as well as from the Mennonite Church (OM).

The Foundation reports that it has only begun to challenge Mennonites to dedicate more of their growing estates to the cause of Christ. Gift assets are expected to exceed $2 million by the end of 1970. The Foundation is intensifying its efforts to be more helpful to a greater number of persons throughout the brotherhood.

Travel for World Conference Being Planned

Mennon Travel Service is already planning tour and travel arrangements for the Ninth Mennonite World Conference to be held in Brazil in 1972. A unique cooperative relationship with Menno Tours, Asuncion, Paraguay, is making possible direct South American contacts for both tours and transportation plans from North America.

Tours are being developed to include primary tourist attractions such as Iguaçu Falls, Macchu Pichu, the Amazon River, Rio de Janeiro, Lake Titicaca, and Buenos Aires. Certain itineraries will include a visit to Mennonite colonies in South America. Depending on public interest, additional

Prior to this she was married to Floyd Sowers of Goshen, Ind. The Sowers moved to Hesston in August 1969 when he enrolled at Hesston College for the 1969-70 school year. During the fall term, Mrs. Sowers has been employed at Halstead Hospital, Halstead, Kan.

Mrs. Sowers is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Milo Kaufman, formerly of Hesston. Bro. Kaufman, president emeritus of Hesston College, is serving as interim pastor at Willow Springs Mennonite Church, Tiskilwa, Ill.

Chaplain Appreciates Correspondence Courses

In a letter dated Dec. 31, 1969, Clyde R. Garriott, Protestant chaplain of the Missouri State Penitentiary in Jefferson City, wrote to Wilbur Hostetler: “We received your last shipment of Home Bible Studies courses, and we want to express our appreciation for your generous giving. Many favorable comments have been made about the courses, and we recently issued about 30 certificates of completion.

“We are using the courses in the reception center,” Garriott added, “and have found these introductory and shorter Bible courses to be much more effective. We pray that God will continue to richly use these courses.”

Hostetler, director of Home Bible Studies at Mennonite Board of Missions, said that the Missouri Penitentiary’s use of HBS materials is unique in that the Elkhart office merely supplies lessons and certificates as requested, then Chaplain Garriott administers the courses to inmate prisoners and grades them himself. The usual procedure is for Hostetler and his wife, Velma, to administer and grade courses received on an individual basis from the more than 290 current enrollees from all walks of life.

Two new Home Bible Studies courses of 12 lessons each will soon be added to the six currently in use. “The Mature Person” by Ray Keim and “The Christian Home” by Donald G. Miller are expected to be released sometime this year. Two popular courses — “The Bible, the Word of God” and “The Church, the People of God” — have been rewritten and are now being edited.

The Home Bible Studies Division, with offices at Box 370, Elkhart, Ind., 46514 and Box 472, Harrisonburg, Va., 22801 offers correspondence courses free of charge as a public service to individuals and groups requesting them.

VS Unit Opens Playground

The Englewood (Chicago) VS unit has received a helping hand from several public-minded persons employed at the Northern Trust Bank in Chicago. A project called “Operation Playlot” was undertaken in Aug. 1969 in which the Northern Trust Jaycees helped to resurface and repair a playground at 6751 South Green Street across from the Englewood unit.

Englewood VS-ers and Jaycee volunteers worked together to repair benches, install new swings and a slide, haul gravel, and generally reorganize the playground area. After two months of work, the playlot was opened in October to community children.

Finances for the Jaycee project came from the sale of “gourmet booklets” which offer more than $50 worth of dining and entertainment at a sizable discount at Chicago’s finest restaurants and recreational facilities. “We sure appreciated the Jaycees time and money given to this project,” Maynard Brubacher, project director for the Chicago unit, said recently. “Northern Trust Bank Jaycees and Green Street area residents are scheduled to participate in dedication ceremonies tentatively scheduled for April 1970.”

VS-ers Receive Urban Orientation

Three persons from urban Voluntary Service units administered by Mennonite Board of Missions attended a three-week urban study program in Wichita, Kan. The study, which ran Jan. 5 through Jan. 30 was sponsored by Hesston College for eight members of its student body involved in a unique interterm experience.

The Wichita Urban Experience proposes to isolate problems such as welfare, racial equality, poverty, court and police procedures, and community action and family counseling programs. It is to be a learning experience in the development of skills and techniques for community involvement.

In addition to regular field trips and orientation sessions, the students and VS participants each had an on-the-job training experience with community agencies. The student is expected to involve himself to the best of his ability in all aspects of urban community.

According to a statement released by Hesston College, formal study is being required in the areas of Negro history, church involvement, minority relationships, and various courses of action that are available options in confronting today’s social and

Nursing Instructors Join Faculty

Two instructors joined the nursing faculty at Hesston College at the beginning of the spring term. They were Marcella Finney of Wichita, Kan., and Mrs. Bonnie Sowers, Hesston.

Mrs. Finney, a native of Arkansas City, Kan., received her BS in Nursing degree from Incarnate Word College, San Antonio, Tex. In 1968 she earned the MS degree from Marquette University, Milwaukee, Wls., with a major in medical-surgical nursing and a minor in education.

She has 11/2 years of teaching experience and considerable experience in nursing service administration.

This past semester she was a member of the faculty at Sacred Heart College, Wichita.

VS-ers who took part in the urban study program were: Linda Alger of the Wichita VS unit; Bertha Kaufman, is assigned to the Philadelphia unit following the Wichita experience; and Don Kraybill, program director for the 18th Street, Chicago, unit.

"It is significant that we have three VS-ers from our program cooperatively involved in this program with students from Hesston College," said Ken Seitz of the Relief and Service Office in Elkhart. "This is a first step toward providing more in-depth orientation for persons preparing to move into difficult service assignments in the inner city."

Philhaven Is Accredited

Philhaven Hospital, R. 5, Lebanon, Pa. 17042, recently received notification from the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals that it has been approved as a member hospital for a three-year period. The Joint Commission is a national accrediting body made up of medical and hospital associations. The notice pointed out a number of strong points in the program of the local psychiatric hospital, as was evident in the granting of a three-year approval. It is not uncommon for hospitals to be approved for only one year at a time. The local hospital felt that Commission approval was needed to continue improving the program, as well as to assure the patients and the community that the highest standards of psychiatry and medicine were being maintained.

In an effort to continue expanding and upgrading the program of the local hospital, a number of important staff appointments were made during the past year. A. M. Hostetler, M.D., was appointed medical director in Aug. 1969, and approximately two months later John D. Walmer, M.D., became the third staff psychiatrist. Robert A. Reday, M.D., has been with the hospital now for over three years. Also, in July 1969, Rowland Shank, PhD, was hired to head up the psychology department.

Philhaven Hospital has always been interested in helping to meet the psychiatric needs of Lebanon County. Several years ago they began accepting emergency patients through an arrangement with the county commissioners. Within the past six months the hospital has agreed to accept both inpatients and outpatients through the County Mental Health Program. The hospital will continue to be interested in offering expanding services to the community.

Marvin Yoder reports from Sapporo, Japan: “Reiko Yaguchi, for whom many of you have been praying for a long time, is to be released from hospitalization for bone cancer. Dr. Kanaya says she seems well enough now to go home. Just now she seems to be at the peak of an improving trend. This trend itself is completely novel in Dr. Kanaya’s experience. He says he has never before seen anyone survive the kind of relapse Reiko experienced beginning last fall. But he says we cannot expect to cure cancer. Your continued prayers are appreciated."

Dave Helmuth, Albonito, Puerto Rico, says: “This semester has gone well so far. We have 70-75 matriculated in the various Centers. Here at Albonito we have 10 studying and I feel like we have been able to make some progress in the seriousness of the courses. Dave Powell is writing an in-depth course in the Book of Acts which I have high hopes for further use. I have translated some of John W. Miller’s recent book, The Christian Way, and organized it into a course which we are using in various churches and also hope it can be of continued use as catechetical material.”

The Navaho Gospel Hour, produced by Mennonite Broadcasts, is heard each week on radio station KHAC in Window Rock, Ariz. Recently the station manager at KHAC received several letters from listeners and sent them on to Mennonite Broadcasts. One listener wrote: “I do really appreciate the program and would like to thank all the sponsors that make this broadcast possible. A lot of our people will enjoy it and live for God.” Peter and Naswood Burbank, two Navaho brothers, are the speakers, and Stanley Weaver is director.

The Writers’ Fellowship of Lancaster area will meet on Mar. 15 at 1:30 p.m. at the Mennonite Information Center. Anyone interested in writing is urged to attend. You may also bring a manuscript.

Readers Say

Submissions to Readers Say column should comment on printed articles.

Just a bit of criticism of a recent editorial in which “proof texts” were belittled. Is it good logic to go to the Scripture for guidance, and then to refuse what it says in a specific verse? Must we always read between the lines? Is it honest to read between the lines when God has spoke clearly on any subjects? I feel confident that the Bible is a beautiful combination of “proof texts” and that to reject these is to reject the Book itself.

If I want to show why I believe in nonresistance, I refer to Matthew 5:39 or Romans 12:17-21, and don’t read between the lines in Numbers. Or if asked why my wife wears a covering, I use 1 Corinthians 11:1-16 as a covering. If God didn’t mean what He said in those verses, why did He write them?

I am aware that people may misuse Scripture, and fail to compare spiritual things with spiritual, and I am glad for many sincere seekers who have been able to find a specific truth in a specific verse.—Charles B. Breneman, Elida, Ohio.

The editorial in the Feb. 3 Gospel Herald calls for serious reflection by ordained men.

“Preach the word,” “Search the scriptures,” “Preach the unsearchable riches of Christ,” and “Woe is unto me if I preach not the gospel.”

Are Bible statements. Why the sad remark that we go home from church worship spiritually hungry? Jesus Christ is the bread of life. Brethren Pastor, let us examine why we preached during the past year and if our sermons are Christ-centered, and proclaimed with a burning conviction in the power of the Holy Spirit, then nobody needs to go home from a worship service spiritually frustrated.—J. B. Martin, Kitchener, Ont.

Take Up Your Cross—and Relax!

By Mark Gibbs

Any visitor to the United States these days learns a great deal about the deep difficulties of the churches. This last year I have found much despondency, and indeed an almost masochistic wallowing in gloom. Some church leaders seem indeed determined to point out the worst points in the contemporary scene — perhaps in order to atone somehow for previous neglect of time.

Of course, there are many American congregations, and many church institutions, in serious trouble. Certainly there is division and dismay among both clergy and laity. Yet a visitor from abroad can also find many signs of hope and of growth, both in parish life and in experimental ministries; and I do not think it is accurate or fair to give too dark and depressing a picture.

Signs of Life

In the first place, the bitter concerns and arguments now to be found in church after church are in themselves a sign of life, not of death. I must frankly admit that when I first made some academic study of American churches, in the 1940s, then I was disturbed and despondent about their attitude to racism, and to the deep poverty so evident both in the inner city and in many rural areas. They were not then alive with controversy on these issues; far too often they were apparently apathetic and callous. It is rather like the past history of slavery and the slave trade.

When these beastly horrors were first publicized — and many Englishmen as well as Americans were profiting from the slave trade — then the nation and the churches seemed more divided and disturbed than in the “peaceful” days when slavery was taken for granted. But the disturbance was the beginning of the change. The American churches are perplexed by many controversies at this time, but they are in a much more healthy state than when they mainly bothered about the size of their rival sanctuaries. Spiritually, they are in much better shape than many quiet, dull, and empty churches in Britain and Europe.

What is more, any balanced survey of the American churches today will, I believe, show some most encouraging signs of renewal, and some very promising models of church life for the future. This is true both of many parishes and of other kinds of church ministries. For instance, many Roman Catholics are sadly discouraged about the progress in updating their giant and sometimes unwieldy institutions.

Yet the style of many Sunday masses is now wonderfully different from the formal Latin drone of only a few years ago — with the laity half asleep or slipping out the door as soon as it was legally permissible. Again, it is simply not true to say that almost all suburban Protestant churches are hopelessly racist or pietist. Their congregations are mixed in their attitudes and often caught in historical and social prejudices; but very many of the laity (and indeed many of those rather despaired church women’s groups) are quietly and effectively taking positions which would have seemed very far out only a few years ago. And many of the new styles of urban church work are achieving distinct, sober progress — for instance (to mention only three which I saw in the fall of 1969) the Boston Industrial Mission, the Chesapeake Foundation in Washington, D.C. — which concentrates on poverty questions — and the Centre for Urban Encounter in Portland, Oregon.

Tendency to Emphasize the Bad

The trouble is that somehow there exist horrible communication blocks which make it difficult for American church people to hear good news. Even major church committees may sometimes not know of important and promising new experiments — especially if they do not belong to their denomination. (There are even worse blocks which somehow stop news of experiments from the Netherlands, or Germany, or Africa — as if Americans were only prepared to belong to a world church if it was as bad off as themselves!)

In an almost perverse and quite unbiblical way, there is a tendency to emphasize bad news, and to ignore the good. Of course, there is no room at all for complacency: Christians need to face hard facts, no matter how unpleasant they are. But a diet of unrelieved disasters is neither nourishing nor necessary. It may be that some clergy in the States are suffering from something of a Jeremiah complex. Certainly it may have been right in the last few years to shock and shake complacent congregations out of their cozy apathy — for instance, about the ghastly tragedy of the Vietnam war.

Gibbs is an Anglican layman and schoolmaster from England who is joint author of God’s Frozen People.
But now the tactics of congregational renewal need to be different.

In the first place, church leaders and parish ministers must make a very thorough and persistent effort to understand where the laity are at the moment. Some of the people in the pews are of course disturbed, bewildered, and defensive. This is not just because of changes in the churches: the whole of American life (even in remote country areas) is changing so fast that perhaps three centuries of change are now squeezed into something like seventy-five years.

We live to be 300 years old, in terms of social change. In actual fact, very many older American church people are adapting to the 1970s with great courage and skill; but some are frightened, and need much pastoral help if they are to find their true vocation for the future. It is not much use to shout at such people; and I suspect that sometimes church leaders and parish clergy must learn more courteous and effective ways of leading them on.

On the other hand, many other lay people are by no means so fearful about the future. American congregations include—thank God—many "strong" Christians, who are not proud or arrogant, but nevertheless still confident that even in these stormy days they will find a job to do and a life to enjoy. They are not frightened by change: in big ways or small, they are the changemakers, in industry, in city life, in their local schools and hospitals, and in their homes. Sometimes, indeed, they are unfairly impatient with the clergy because the church seems to lag behind, not because it moves too fast. Many of them are deeply involved in the structure of society—business, government, education—and they know quite well by now the defects of these structures and the possibilities of their renewal. Some of the younger ones have tough and fundamental questions to ask about American society. But young or old, these are competent, critical people, and if they can only be given a first-class Christian education to match their secular sharpness, they will be a major strength for the churches of the future.

The Minister Struggles

I suggest also that for their part, the laity in and on the fringe of the American churches must try harder to understand the struggles of the clergy today. The role of the priest or minister has changed radically since the days when he was the center in the parish of both the theological knowledge and religious discipline. It is just as difficult for many older clergy as for many older laity to accept the pace of change today.

It is not easy for a younger minister, eager for church and social renewal, to realize that he cannot "be the church" on his own, and that he must find a new role as an adviser and resource person for the laity, rather than try to be the leader in every situation. And, unfortunately, very few seminaries as yet train the young clergy for such new styles of church life, or even show him convincingly how valuable his new role may be in the future.

There is an urgent need for the American churches to offer far more opportunities for clergy and laity to learn together their mission for the days ahead. If this is to happen, it will require the acceptance of two principles for adult Christian education.

1. The clergy must learn how to learn from the laity as well as how to teach them. They must know how to stay sometimes in the background: they are not normally in the front line of business or political life. And the laity must learn how to treat the clergy as human beings, with minds and opinions and fears like everybody else, instead of expecting them to be drearily neutral on anything controversial.

2. The churches must offer a wide spectrum of different kinds of learning opportunities; and much more money will have to go into adult Christian education and training of all kinds. If I may say so, some dioceses and denominations suffer more than a little from fads and fashions in laity education (whether it be sensitivity training, racist studies, or prayer groups). There are a great many different ways in which Christians can learn together, and it is rather fine how many useful experiments and techniques have come to the world church from American pioneers.

But an experiment in one city or parish is not automatically to be copied everywhere else, at least not before a very careful evaluation. No parish can do everything; every parish is different: it is stupid to expect too much uniformity. And, of course, not everything can be done in a parish setting.

Some American cities have already developed a rich variety of experiments in nonparish groups and activities: very many clergy and laity should be encouraged to join in one of these, in addition to (rather than instead of) parish life.

In his very funny book The Mackerel Plaza, Peter de Vries has the phrase "Take up your cross and relax!" It sounds irreverent; but I venture to suggest that in fact, it is excellent advice for the people of God today. Certainly there are burdens for us to bear; but we shall carry them more effectively if we are a little more confident and relaxed about the months and years ahead. We need not be fearful. There are a good many signs of hope if we look for them.
Three Overlapping Cultures

A week or so ago I heard someone review some comments on culture made by Don Jacobs earlier. The review was very helpful so I'd like to share what I heard. I hope that if Don Jacobs reads this in Africa he will recognize enough accuracy in this thirdhand report to feel a bit of ownership in the ideas.

In America, perhaps for the first time in history, three cultures overlap each other. First, there is the prewar culture. These are the people who grew up on the work ethic. They came through the depression so it is easy for them to emphasize thrift, hard work, "pay cash," and property ownership. They put Christian values on all this—"if any would not work, neither should he eat," and all that.

Then there is the postwar culture. Affluence moved in. The new generation deprived of many things by their hardworking parents emphasized education, success, and status. Whether one could pay for the big car, plush split level, and impressive spending didn't matter because the credit card and the Beneficial Finance was always good for another round. This completely different culture did not forget to upend itself with Christian values. It emphasized the successful church. "Let the buildings we worship in, the church schools we send our children to, and the programs we promote be unashamedly as good as the world's," they said. "God deserves the best. Success is not so bad if God gets His share."

A third culture has entered quickly before the other two have left the stage. It is the "now" generation. They react to hypocrisy. They are anti status. They see what is phony and empty so they search for meaning and relationships. They emphasize life together, are interested in peace and justice. And it just happens that there is something in the Bible about that.

Until now a person ordinarily saw only one culture at a time. The oldest culture had a strong hand in determining the new because it came so slowly. In our time there are three cultures in America, each making its own point and in the church each supporting itself with a theology.

We are not talking about a simple triple generation gap. There are people of each age group in all three cultures. So we have a problem, especially since it is nearly impossible to step out of one's culture. Nor does it help to use one's Christian value system to bat the person of another culture in line.

The positive thing to say is that the church now has the grandest opportunity of all time to be the church. Let it be enriched by building bridges across the cultures within itself. Let the church prove that the coming of new cultures does not mean the death of the church.

— Arnold Cressman

By Still Waters

"Blessed are you that sow beside all waters" (Is. 32:20).

Most persons miss the meaning of life and make little contribution to life because they are waiting for something big to come along. They expect to shine in something big sometime. The fault is not that they have no ambition. Rather, the fault is that in looking for something to do which will bring recognition and renown they overlook everyday's opportunities.

Happy are we when we sow beside all waters. Happy are we when we sow seeds of love, kindness, and patience at home, school, and work. Happy are we when we learn to give the helping hand to whomever we meet in need. Happy are we when we are able to give a healing word or touch to the many persons we meet.

Each person we meet needs our love and concern. Each situation we are in calls us to give our best. Each stream has adjacent soil in which we may sow the precious seed of the gospel.

To realize this truth is to realize that it really doesn't matter if our work is always noticed or not. We do not sow only when we are sure of a bountiful return or when others will admire our effort. Happiness is not in this. Happiness comes when love leads us to share wherever we are and to whomever we meet.

The fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge.—Prov. 1:7.

A License to Gripe

"A Gripe Card" has been suggested by the pastor of an Ohio Methodist church. Properly filled out, it entitles the bearer to gripe about his church. The card says:

1. I attend all the regular and special services of my church.
2. I pray every day for my church and pastor.
3. I volunteer for, gladly accept, and enthusiastically carry out all jobs and offices I have in my church's program!
4. I give at least a tithe of my income to my church.

Any member who gives an affirmative answer to all four can gripe!

Wind of the Spirit, Blow

A friend and I were walking the streets of Jerusalem late one night. We had visited shrine after shrine during the day. Here in the heart of three great religions, we saw some of the most sincere worshipers we had ever seen. Suddenly my friend turned to me and said, "You know, only a mighty work of the Holy Spirit can break through all which keeps people in the Holy Land from really seeing Christ. If much of what we see here is supposed to be Christianity, then it is understandable that folks do not accept it."

"But," I said, "it is no more true here in the Holy Land than anywhere else. At home also it will take the wind of the Spirit to blow away all the unworthy accretions which Christianity has gathered before people will be able to see the true essence of the gospel in Christ."

If Christianity is merely monuments and sacred shrines which point to the past, then it is as dead as any other faith. True, Christianity is historical. True, it has a great and glorious past. But if that same Christ who was known by those early disciples is not known by us, we are of all men most miserable. If that same Holy Spirit which baptized those early believers has not baptized us, we are as helpless as they were before Pentecost.

Yes, I have long ago concluded that only a great outpouring of the Holy Spirit which demonstrates again the supernatural character of the Christian faith will crack the crust of deadness in what is today a cold and calloused Christianity in so many places and in so many lives.

We are too often like the disciples in the valley who could not help the needy father and his son. There was help, however. Suddenly, when they saw their own failure and inadequacy, they looked up and saw Jesus coming down the hill toward them. Turning to the troubled father they said, "Man, we cannot do what is needed. But here comes Jesus. He can do anything." This second step is the step so much needed today. After recognizing our own inadequacy we must take the step of simple faith, which will not stagger at the promises of God, and turn the eyes of people to Christ. This is the Spirit's work. He shall not speak of Himself but He shall speak of Christ.

This is why the Spirit is sent — to reveal Christ as He really is and to change us into His same image. And how we need His ministry today! People will never really be impressed for God by beautiful buildings and by lives which merely refrain from doing things which others do. There is an abundance of these in every part of the world. The world is struck for God when, by the power of His Holy Spirit, His people are enabled to live beautiful lives and supernatural lives which the world admits it cannot match.

If it is true that only a fresh pouring out of God's Spirit will reveal Christ and make the Word flesh under the secular attack of today, then we must be open to the Spirit whenever and in whatever way He wishes to come. We dare not set up our requirements for the Spirit's work. He sets up His own. We dare not say He must follow a prescribed formula and form. Read Acts and you see Him working in many different ways and through many different people. Our responsibility is to be honestly open to His work in our own lives. We must trust Him to work in the lives of other believers.

Without telling what or how the Spirit should work, we do know from the Scriptures that three things will be true in a Spirit-led work. First, the Spirit's work is to magnify Jesus Christ. Those in whom He works will love Jesus Christ more. They will not speak of themselves, even as the Spirit speaks not of Himself. But they will speak for Jesus Christ.

Second, a work of the Spirit will magnify the Word of God. He will create love for the Word which means a love not only to hear but to obey. The Holy Spirit is given, in the final analysis, only to "them that obey him."

Third, a work of the Holy Spirit will produce the fruit of the Spirit. The great work of the Spirit, which preceded and produced the Welsh revival and reached around the globe, was such a manifestation of the fruit of love, joy, and peace and the rest of the fruit of the Spirit that the unsaved and unsanctified cried out in repentance and faith.

Thank God that He has already begun His work in the church today. The winds of God are moving — He is beginning to break through. Will we be caught up in His work? Here is our hope and prayer. — D.

The Grace of Grit

Someone said it. I don't know who. Perhaps it was in a prayer someone prayed for the grace of grit. But I think I know what he meant.

Especially in the Christian life we are tempted to be quitters. We run into the smallest snag or difficulty and we give up. Or we receive a little rebuff from someone and we make it clear if that's the way the church feels, OK, we'll quit. The important questions, of course, are: How does Christ feel? What is right? What ought we do? And if we know answers to these, then God will give us the grace of grit to stick to it. Further, the cause of Christ will be strengthened.

Jesus said, "Happy are those who stand for the right and take joyously the results, whatever such might be." So did the prophets before you. God grant us the grace of grit. — D.
What the Social Drinker Needs to Know...

By Andrew C. Ivy

In matters of health an ounce of prevention is worth, not a pound, but a ton of cure. The prevention of any disease is based on discovering the cause of that disease as soon as possible and educating the public regarding how it may be effectively prevented. This is the reason that I, medical scientist, physiologist, and physician, am interested in the prevention of alcoholism.

Alcohol is the cause of alcoholism. In medicine the cause of any disease is separated from the contributory elements. For example, the germ bacillus tuberculosis is the cause of tuberculosis; poor diet and poverty are often mutual contributory factors. Unless the germ tuberculosis exists in the environment outside a person and then gets inside her or him, that person will never contract tuberculosis. Similarly alcohol is the cause of acute and chronic alcoholism, because, unless alcohol gets inside a person’s body, the disease is not contracted. Amongst contributory causes may be listed shyness, desire to conform, frustration, tension, emotional immaturity, the presence of alcoholic beverages in one’s environment, and their glamorization and advertising.

A Self-inflicted Disease

A disease is present when any function of the mind or body is impaired. “Ism” means to be “under the influence,” so alcoholism exists when there is enough alcohol in the blood to impair the brain. Physiologically, an “excess” of alcohol means that amount required to impair the higher functions of the brain. In most persons this is one or two beers, cocktails, or highballs, depending on the drinker’s size and susceptibility to the drug, alcohol.

Acute alcoholism refers to a temporary impairment of the brain by alcohol for perhaps a half-hour to two or three hours after taking one or two beers or cocktails, or impairment for days or a few weeks after drinking larger amounts. Chronic alcoholism refers to the condition in which the drinker is more or less continuously under the influence of alcohol for weeks, months, and years. Repeated exposure to acute alcoholism leads to chronic alcoholism in which the liver and brain undergo degeneration. The only certain way to prevent chronic alcoholism is to prevent acute alcoholism. The only certain way to prevent acute alcoholism is not to drink alcoholic beverages.

An “alcoholic” is a person who relies on alcohol to meet the ordinary demands of life and who continues to drink after his drinking has caused marital, occupational, or social difficulties. Most alcoholics are addicted to the drug and cannot quit voluntarily.

Acute or chronic alcoholism is a self-inflicted disease, a vice which is readily transmitted in susceptible persons.

A Grave Public Health and Social Problem

Dr. Harris Isbell, chief of the Narcotic Hospital of the United States Public Health Service, stated: “Numerically, alcohol is the most important of all addicting depressant drugs in the U.S.A. and in Western civilization.” This statement is undoubtedly correct.

Mrs. Marty Mann of the National Council on Alcoholism, also states: “The ‘disease’ of alcoholism threatens to destroy the country.” I agree.

The liquor business states that in the United States 85 percent of the alcohol is consumed by 22 percent of the drinkers. This indicates that if every adult were a “moderate” drinker and could remain such, the alcohol beverage industry would lose more than one half of its business. Despite all their professions, do the producers of alcoholic beverages really want all drinkers to remain moderate? Obviously not. It advertises “one more, after another.”

The Drug Alcohol Puts the Brain to Sleep

Alcohol does not stimulate the brain although it may appear to do so. It impairs the judgment, making a person less tense, more talkative, more hilarious; it weakens the sense of caution and slows the reflexes, thus rendering a man more accident-prone. It causes him to imagine he is a better motor driver when he is really a worse driver. A small amount of alcohol causes the drinker to do and say things which he would otherwise not do and say.

The alcohol in one to three beers or cocktails inflames all the passions. It inflames acts of violence. That is why saloons and liquor stores are closed by state and city officials after riots have started. This is locking the barn door after the horse is stolen.

One beer or cocktail is enough to put to sleep and impair the higher functions of the brain. The sense of caution, judgment, and ability to drive an automobile are impaired before one feels the effects of alcohol; that is, before the feeling of warmth of the skin and a feeling of "relaxation" and "no worries" is noticeable.

All Are in Danger

According to the best and latest estimates possible, susceptibility to alcohol is such that one in four persons who begin to drink occasionally or moderately becomes a dependent or a heavy drinker or an alcoholic. At the present time there is no way to determine who is and who is not susceptible to becoming a dependent or an alcoholic. But we know that the only absolute way to avoid becoming either is to practice total abstinence.

Some religious groups (alas, not all) believe that it is morally wrong to use alcohol and that, even if a person is not susceptible to its effects and may not become a dependent or an alcoholic, he should not drink and thereby tempt his weaker or susceptible brother who may. In such a case, if you drink, your "moderate, social drinking" is a contributory factor to his alcoholism. I heartily and prayerfully agree with this moral principle.

Prevention More Urgent than "Cure"

After working first-hand with rehabilitation and learning about the large number of alcoholics in Chicago and the rest of the United States, I realized that a rehabilitation program could only scratch the surface. This is true for two reasons: first, the number of dependent drinkers is very large; second, the rehabilitation of an alcoholic is a very difficult and many times an impossible task.

Moreover, it should be emphasized that for every dollar collected from the alcoholic beverage traffic in taxes, the taxpayer pays more than six dollars to pick up and save the damages.

Ways must be found to deglamorize the use of alcoholic beverages. The fatal defect in "social" drinking is that about one half of the "moderate drinkers" do not remain "moderate" all the time. In fact, "moderate drinking" is the cause of all the problems due to the human consumption of alcoholic beverages.

Plato wrote that the purpose of education is to develop the natural talents of a person so as to make him a more complete personality and a fit member of society. Thus, alcohol education, in which the whole truth is told, is a part of secular, ethical, and religious education in the highest sense. To teach and to influence people how to relax, to live up the party, to have fun, to forget worries, and to enjoy life without using drugs is the greatest challenge which confronts religious and secular educators and parents today.

Now Is the Hour

By Pauline Lehman

Does the term "the now generation" strike a sympathetic chord? Or does it generate overtones of rebellion, riot, and revolution? Consider the words "now" and "generation." Should not the church as much as anyone be the "now generation"? Many biblical passages refer to the urgency of the gospel. The time is now. Do we carry this sense of urgency?

This past fall the Rehoboth Mennonite Church in St. Anne, Ill., began a "now" program to more effectively reach the youth of our community—a program designed to bring in the unsaved ones and to encourage Bible study and witnessing among Christian youth. The Bible club, primarily for Christians, meets every Sunday evening, and, using a planned outline, shares something gained from the week's quiet time and prays together. At most meetings invitations have been given to accept Christ or to re dedicate one's life as the leader senses need and the leading of the Spirit.

There is a definite attempt to memorize Scripture using a Scripture memory packet. As various groups of verses are learned, credits are earned toward a summer camp scholarship. A daily quiet time is a requirement. A diary with suggested readings is provided that contains space for the youth to write in his own words the personal implication of the message for each day.

Each year on Youth Sunday members of the "now" generation have opportunity to plan and carry out the morning service as they wish—to share in talks and songs and testimonies and lead the congregation in worship.

Several times a year special social activities are planned, deliberately designed to attract as many unsaved youth as possible. These are highly hilarious evenings with tremendous team competition. Then comes a change of pace. The gospel is presented clearly and dynamically for 15 to 20 minutes, an invitation is given and those who respond are counseled and followed up. There is no apology for the gospel or assumptions that everyone is already saved. This is the main purpose of the evening—to invite youth, to present the gospel and to give them a chance to come to Christ, now.

The church, to be part of the "now generation," must make every club, class organization, and meeting count for eternity. To make this a reality, youth leaders and counselors are needed—people primed by the study of God's Word, filled with a spiritual concern for youth, and aware of what's happening today in order to communicate with the "now" generation. These are the kind of people we must ask God to send which the church must commission and then stand behind in sympathetic trust. Not just for two years of VS. The lateness of the hour demands all of us, each part of our lives, now.

Fellowship Makes a Difference

By Floyd Schrock

Fellowship. Friendship. Sympathy. Support. Such words help to describe what is happening to hundreds of American and Canadian women in Heart to Heart Fellowships. They are discovering that Christ has the wonderful power of drawing friends and neighbors closer to each other.

The Heart to Heart Fellowship organization receives its thrust from the Heart to Heart radio program which originates at Mennonite Broadcasts in Harrisonburg, Va. Ella May Miller is speaker on the program, and her books and printed talks are often used to guide the group discussions. Two of her books, A Woman in Her Home and I Am a Woman, have been best sellers for Moody Press.

Back of the Heart to Heart effort is the desire to help housewives become better wives, mothers, and homemakers, and to help them realize that they have a position of great privilege and responsibility. Suggestions on how to meet the pressures of daily living are also an important purpose of the program.

According to Ella May Miller, the Fellowship groups allow homemakers "to see their problems through someone else's eyes, to find encouragement and helpfulness in their neighbor's experiences, and to share together in the always-right ministry of the Bible."

There are organized groups in 31 states and provinces in the United States, Canada, and British Honduras. More than 1,000 women are involved in the more than 100 groups which meet on weekly, biweekly, or monthly schedules. Group sizes range from 57 persons down to four per group.

In Virginia a group of about 15 has been meeting once a month, and the leader is enthusiastic about what has been happening. She believes that group therapy is definitely helping individuals in her group to accept themselves and their situations. The wide age span represented means that the younger members find help from those more experienced. The leader says, "There's a great deal of common sense in human experience. Those who do not have many close friends find that they aren't alone in their problems."

The structure of the groups is very simple. The leader is usually the only appointed "officer" of the group and is responsible for details of scheduling, meeting places, etc. Topics of discussion are chosen by the participants. Most of the groups listen to the Heart to Heart program together or at least read the printed copies of the radio talks. Parts of Scripture or devotional books are often used. But the main idea is to talk about things that are really relevant to the needs of the individual. Outside helps are used primarily as guidelines.

For many groups the joy they are finding in their times of praying and sharing is too good to keep to themselves, so they are reaching out into surrounding communities. They are placing printed messages in laundromats and similar places, believing that God can speak to troubled people in this way.

The Fellowship idea is continually spreading to new areas as people see the value of them. The Heart to Heart staff at Mennonite Broadcasts has prepared a special kit to send to individuals interested in organizing a group.

The kit includes a few simple suggestions for organization, many ideas on conducting meetings, and examples from groups already functioning. Also available is the "Housefellowships" booklet, edited by James Fairfield, which gives ideas and a bibliography of helpful literature for group activity.

A lady in Mississippi expressed the feelings of many others when she wrote, "I think this is a terrific idea! It has helped us to learn to know and understand each other better as we listen to your radio talk, then discuss it and end with our personal problems, joys, and ideas."

This is the reward for the Heart to Heart speaker and staff—the knowledge that their efforts are helping individuals discover new life in Christ; a new life of Christian love and concern for family and friends.
Black-white. Add Christ-like love and understanding and you have gray.
Beautiful, isn't it?

It happens when youth mingle with adults. To exchange ideas about the meaning of mission—Mennonites from all kinds of backgrounds. Like 17 conferences, nine related Mennonite groups, and eight foreign Mennonite conferences. Christians from 24 other denominations help too. A mix from 32 states, three provinces and 17 countries.

It works a wonderful sense of unity. It makes a lot of sense and seems so applicable to today's fragmented world which defies simplistic solutions to tough problems.

It happens when man and God meet.

Where Shall Justice in the Middle East Begin?

By J. Otis Yoder

Meaning of Justice

The Old Testament Scriptures have basically one word for which our English word justice is a fair parallel: tsedek. By usage in several contexts, Leviticus 19:15; Isaiah 45:23; 59:4, we discover this meaning: right action corresponding with truth. English dictionary definitions include “the principle of rectitude and just dealing of men with each other: also conformity to it: integrity: rectitude: one of the cardinal virtues.” Justice, then, must take account of all persons involved. A third definition gets its meaning in the Middle East setting. It comes out of the Arab desire for justice by which is meant the liquidation of the state of Israel.

Roots of Justice

The historical experience of Israel in Palestine must be commonly understood before any valid answer to our question can be found. After their rise to statehood under David and Solomon the kingdom was divided and deteriorated until both Northern and Southern kingdoms fell and their people were forcibly deported in 723 and 586 BC respectively. Some returned from Babylon after 70 years and resettled the land with those who had not been carried away. Only during the Maccabean rule did they enjoy a degree of self-government.

In the year AD 70 Jerusalem was destroyed by the Roman, Titus, and Jews were massacred by the thousands. This was repeated again in AD 135 and Jerusalem was completely destroyed. It was plowed like a field just as Micah (3:12) had predicted. Later a Roman city was built on the site. Even with all the deportations and invasions some clung tenaciously to the soil of their forefathers, guaranteed to them forever by divine oath to Abraham (Gen. 17:6-8).

The return of the Babylonian captives made possible the birth of Jesus Christ in Bethlehem of Judea. After His crucifixion, resurrection and ascension, on the day of Pentecost the church was born by the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon the waiting disciples who were Jews. Even though the church became largely Gentile, Christianity was considered by the Roman government as a somewhat dangerous sect of Judaism.

By the famous Edict of Milan, Constantine the Great in AD 313 decreed that Christianity should become the religion of the Roman Empire. This act left Judaism the only illegal religion and passed the sword of persecution from the State to the Church, thus the Jews became the subject of “Christian” hate. Jews were persecuted in all quarters of the Roman Empire and scattered to the four corners of the earth by Gentile powers. They became subject to ridicule, persecution, prejudice, and banishment all in the name of Christ. The “Christian Church” must stand before the bar of the justice of the God of Israel for her ruthless treatment of the Jew.

It was not until the middle of the seventh century that the Arab tribes rode out of the desert wastes. In the name of Islam they took the Middle East by the sword. They conquered the northern countries of Africa and threatened the overthrow of Spain. The Crusaders arose in the eleventh century fired by the Roman church. With little restraint they plundered villages and massacred Jews in their zeal to wrest the Holy Land from the Turks. Should not the bloody trail they left behind call for some kind of justice or reparations?

In Palestine the Mamelukes followed the control of the Crusaders and the Ottoman Empire marked its control from 1517 to 1917. After World War I Palestine was placed under the mandatory supervision of the British by the decision of the League of Nations assuring the Jews “a homeland in Palestine.” There has always been in the heart of the Jew the desire to return to the land of his forefathers no matter where he has wandered.

Israeli Statehood

“Zionism, the movement of national revival, which paved the way to the rebirth of Israel’s independence, articulates the age-old nexus of People and Land; it was, in a measure, inspired by national liberation movements all over the world, and it is, indeed, an indivisible part of them.” Other nations are being born. Israel is being reborn. Of all the newborn

J. Otis Yoder, Quarryville, Pa., is presently editor of the Prophecy Department of the Sword and Trumpet. President of HERALDS OF HOPE, INC., and speaker on "The Voice of Hope."
nations, is Israel alone to be denied the right to exist? The Arabs seek for the right of self-identity. But when the Jews ask for the inalienable right of self-identity in the land of their forefathers they are told to forget it. Where does justice begin?

"The final seal of international sanctions and acceptance was set upon Israel's vindication of its freedom and statehood by its admission, on May 11, 1949, to membership in the United Nations and by its entry, therefore, into the ambit of a Charter that is based incontrovertibly on the principle of the sovereign equality of all member-states."

The League of Nations guaranteed a homeland for the Jew in Palestine (1918). The United Nations voted to give a part of Palestine to the Jews (1947). The United Nations recognized Israel as a state among the states (1949). Yet no Arab state has officially recognized the state of Israel as a legal entity. No proposal has satisfied the militant Arab. He sees only one solution: "push the Jews into the sea." Where shall justice begin in the Middle East? Does only the Jewish nation have no right to exist?

Arab Resistance

In utter rejection and complete defiance of the United Nations' resolution the Arabs launched the war of 1948. When the cease-fire lines were established in 1949 the Jews rightly maintained that the 1947 partition plan was no longer valid, for the Arabs had shredded it into pieces. Losing the war of '48 the Arab leadership sought only revenge. Is this the real meaning of justice?

Historically the West Bank was never a part of Trans-Jordan until the Hashimite Kingdom of Jordan seized it in 1948. Before that the Jews had built a university and medical center on Mt. Scopus, northeast of Jerusalem. Even though the U.N. in '49 guaranteed them the right of possession they were not permitted to use the facilities for 19 years. Before 1948 the Jewish Quarter of the old city held one of the oldest synagogues in the world. During Arab control the entire Jewish Quarter was destroyed and a number of Jewish graves on the slopes of Olivet were desecrated, the tombstones having been used to pave courtyards. Have you ever heard Israelis asking for reparations?

"The absurdity of the Arabs' clamor for a surrender of Israel's sovereign territory is shown up by the simple arithmetic of the proportions of their own. Israel's area is slightly less than 8,000 square miles. [1948-1967]. This is but a tiny fraction (0.2%) of the extent of Arab sovereignty, stretching for over four million square miles through thirteen independent states." Justice in the Middle East cannot be one-sided.

The Refugee

Sociologists emphasize that the most important item of consideration must be people. Does this include the Jew? In the face of the diabolical plan of Hitler Jews were driven to seek asylum somewhere. With confidence they approached the world community for the right to enter the land promised to them by the Balfour Declaration in 1917. They were denied. All the nations of the world stand condemned at the bar of justice for the hundreds of thousands of Jews who lost their lives in the Hitler holocaust in Europe and the hundreds more denied entrance into Palestine who went down into the bottom of the Mediterranean.

Where shall justice begin for the Jewish refugee? The exiles coming home to Israel from 80 countries of the world come as brothers. No Jew is denied a home in Israel today. Those coming from Arab lands came out with nothing. Jewish funds provided these immigrants homes, jobs, schools, and security. For every house the Arabs left in Palestine the Jews left five in Arab lands. The Jews have come home expecting to work and are turning a barren desolate land into a garden.

How shall the Arab refugee find justice? These people are victims not only of the poorly administered British Mandate but of their own wealthy rulers who choose to maintain the old feudal system rather than to give the common man a worthwhile life. Many Arabs left their homes in Palestine at the command of the Arab Legions. For more than 20 years they have been the world's most popular refugees.

After World War II it was estimated that there were 50 to 75 million refugees. India and Pakistan solved their problems as did many other countries by recognizing each other's integrity. But in the Middle East this has been impossible. "... Dr. Elfan Rees of the World Council of Churches has noted, 'The Arab refugee problem is by far the easiest post-war refugee problem to solve by integration. By faith, by language, by race, by social organization, they are indistinguishable from their fellows of their host countries. There is room for them and land for them in Syria and Iraq. There is a developing demand for the kind of manpower that they represent. More unusual still, there is money to make this integration possible.' " The United States alone between 1948 and January 1969 contributed a total of $433,418,000 for relief for the refugees of the Middle East. Israel released all accounts of Arab refugees held in Israel totaling $10,000,000 and accepted back 50,000 Arabs.

"If the wealthy Arabs would do for their brothers what the wealthy Jews have done for their brothers, the Arab refugee problem could be completely solved in one-half year." Instead the oil-rich sheikhs lavish their wealth on harems and gold-plated Cadillacs. Where shall justice begin in the Middle East?

The Arabs of Israel have found living much better than they had before the formation of the state. We are personally acquainted with some. Our Christian Arab guide from Bethlehem during the November Hope Bible Lands Seminar, 1969, said, "I am proud of what the Israelis have done with this land in twenty years. It is amazing." Christian Arabs who understand the Scriptures see the plan of God for Israel. Even the Koran of the Mohammeds predicts the return of Israel to the land of Palestine. 7

Conclusion

Justice can never be achieved by the liquidation of a sovereign people. "The oft-repeated attempts to be anti-Zionist without being anti-Jewish (anti-Semitic in that sense) were shown to be erroneous by the complete solidarity of all the
We Beheld His Glory

By Winston J. Martin

"The Word became flesh and dwelt among us, full of grace and truth; we have beheld his glory, glory as of the only Son from the Father." (Jn. 1:14).

I made this world; a perfect world it was once. I pronounced it "good" and was well-pleased with what My hands had wrought. But peace, prosperity, and pleasure were short-lived. The man I made marred My masterpiece. Yes, I made the world, but man made it a mess. Not only did he ruin himself, but his surroundings; sin, suffering, sorrow, sickness, and death sprung up—oh, dreadful day!

But I had a plan. I cared for man—even men of sin. I would redeem them. I would see the day when there would be a new heaven and earth and man would be a new creature. I Myself would bring it about. I would show men I cared. But how much it cost to show him that; it cost; it hurt.

I had made the world but when I came to it, not only was it not what I intended it to be—that was bad enough—but My people, the children I had created, failed to know who I was! Now it wasn't as though I had come without notifying them of My arrival. Hundreds of years prior I had reported to My prophets that I was coming; I told them where and under what circumstances. People were to watch, but they missed Me. The prophets themselves didn't understand all I told them to tell, but they spoke for Me. Prophecy must be proclaimed even though it is not thoroughly understood.

Just in case they would miss My appearing I even sent a special messenger with a telegram to herald My coming. "Make straight the way of the Lord." "I am not the Christ, but he is coming soon." He even said at one point, "Behold, the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world!" But only a handful accepted his announcements.

Now if men in general had not known Me it wouldn't have been so bad; the Gentiles might have been excused, for they were largely unfamiliar with Jewish literature. But My own people, the Jews, even those in My hometown, failed to grasp who I was. Sometimes I wonder how much My own family really knew.

I gave up so much to come here: I laid aside My glory to come to a sinful world. But there is some consolation: some received Me. My disciples did. What changes I saw in them. Peter became that great preacher; Matthew, the collector of taxes, a man of compassion. These examples encourage Me. Then after My resurrection many more believed and received Me, and to those who did I have given the power of adoption so that they are now God's sons. I thank God for each one of them.

But 2,000 years have passed since I walked on earth and men in My own home still do not recognize or believe in Me. Truly, in My own home— the church which I Myself have built—I would expect all to recognize Me as God's Son; but some thought I was a great man but no more. The sad part is they profess My name and claim to be My disciples. They don't really believe I can do all I promised in My Scriptures. They don't really feel they need Me to forgive their sins, because they're not agreed on a definition of sin; standards to them are relative. And so My own people who profess Me have not received Me. I can hardly adopt them as God's sons until they're ready to put themselves up for adoption.

It grieves My heart when I see those in church who have never become My sons—but they think they are! Some will even say someday, "Lord, I've testified for You and done many wonderful works; don't You remember me?" My an-swear will have to be, "You may have known about Me but I never knew you."

My own people have not all received Me. Many are in church with all kinds of opportunities to hear the gospel. They see, but do not perceive, and hear, but do not understand. Others are afraid of the cost of commitment; afraid what friends will think; afraid they won’t be able to hold out, so why bother. But to all who would receive Me I would adopt them into My family, “No man is able to pluck them out of my Father’s hand.” With Me they’re secure as long as they wish to be and yield to Me.

I came into My world but discovered it was no longer really Mine; as far as men are concerned, they run it. Men believe they are in control of world situations; but it is only My grace that keeps a semblance of peace prevailing. If I did not overrule men and their leaders they would ruin themselves.

I came into this dark world. How dreadfully dark compared to the splendor which surrounds God’s throne where once I dwelt and will dwell again. I came as a light. I gave up a lot to come here. I gave up My heavenly glory where I was surrounded with angels for servants, and I Myself became a servant. So much I longed to get close to man that I clothed Myself in a robe of flesh; flesh, the meanest part of man. I, who was perfectly holy, got into a robe of flesh and appeared on earth in the likeness of sinful flesh and was made sin for them — I who knew no sin. I condemned sin in the flesh and delivered men from sin.

“The Word became flesh and dwelt among men” and still I was full of grace and truth. I was full of grace and continually am being filled with grace so that I am able to assure men that I have grace enough for their sin whether they are down and out or up and out. For men in despair who no longer care I have grace sufficient; grace “forever full, forever free, a never-ebbing sea” of grace that redeems, satisfies, and keeps. From the fullness of My grace My followers have received “grace upon grace.” I once exhorted men to forgive their brethren seventy times seven but they peter out so quickly (and keep count). I forgive and don’t keep count, yet many heed the opposition when he says: “Christ can’t forgive you for that sin; He can’t keep you saved, so why try to be a Christian?” If only these would believe My Word; they would discover grace upon grace flooding their lives.

I came to enlighten men with truth. I was not only “full of grace” but full of truth as well. I came to enlighten men with truth but discovered men are intellectuals. They like their own limited enlightenment better than the wisdom that comes from above. They can explain away things I taught them about God. They can explain away passages that are hard to comprehend. How can I force on them something they don’t desire? “The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him.” I could help them solve the mysteries of the moment and of history. In My Word I tell them where history is going and that I’m still on the throne and am coming again. I also promise that if any lack wisdom they are to ask of God, but men aren’t turning to the Bible, My best seller, to find answers. They buy Bibles by the millions each year but seldom read them for enlightenment; Christians even have many translations to help them understand, but seldom use them except to carry them to church.

But the fact that grieves Me most is that I commissioned My adopted sons to go into all the world to spread enlightenment with the gospel; but the number of those who are packing up and going aren’t even meeting the modest number requested by the mission boards, much less the number of recruiters I call for that the mission boards don’t even know about. Have not My enlightened ones, who have held My glory, the gumption to proclaim it? My truth would solve so many world dilemmas in such a hurry.

Even My true sons aren’t living up to what I teach them week by week; some won’t put themselves out to go to church to learn more about Me and My requirements. Some are afraid that the more they hear, the more will be required of them. True. But the blessings of service outpay the sacrifices for service.

Many, oh so many, have beheld My glory, “glory as of the only Son of the Father” but have not really recognized Me as Lord. Many have beheld, but held their peace to themselves and have not proclaimed it. They have not gone up to the high mountain in their communities to declare: “Behold your God.” So many millions would be delighted to behold My glory, but how shall they hear without preachers?

Many have beheld Me and I have healed them, but they have gone their merry way like the ten lepers, only one of whom came back to say “thank You”; they don’t come back to ask: “How can I serve You for all You’ve done for me?” I delight to heal; don’t get Me wrong; but I would delight to get the glory too for all I do. I expressly made man so he could glorify Me among his brethren and enjoy Me forever. I long for men to behold My glory; I long to be lifted up so I may “draw all men to myself.”

I came to My own home, and My own people did not receive Me; but to all who receive Me I give power to become children of God. I dwelt among them “full of grace and truth” and they beheld My glory.

Wit and Wisdom

A man was testifying in court. He noticed that everything he was saying was being taken down by the court reporter. As he went along, he began talking faster and faster, the reporter frantically trying to keep up with him.

Suddenly, the man said, “Good gracious, mister, don’t write so fast. I can’t keep up with you!”

Two small boys were discussing the capabilities of their mothers, who were active club members.

“My mother can talk on just about any subject,” one youngster said proudly.

“Aw shucks,” retorted the other boy, “my mother can talk without any subjects at all.”
Attention,
Ye Builders of Churches!

By Helen Good Brenneman

Not long ago I attended a church wedding at the end of a long and weary day. To my dismay, I discovered that the sanctuary of the church was six steps up, the rest rooms twelve steps down, and the basement was unequipped with any place to sit other than a table. Later, I spoke to the minister's wife, whom I know personally, and I told her, "I would never join your church. And it is no reflection upon you or your husband's sermons or the church fellowship. For anyone who is not in the peak of health, your church is impossible."

"I'm glad you said that," she replied graciously, "because we are in the process of building a new church, and we might forget the handicapped."

Now, I can excuse an older building which seemingly was built for mountain climbers. But I have a hard time with new churches which are so inconvenient. I am sure that no congregation I know would put up a sign in front of the building, "No one allowed in this church who is over sixty years of age or physically defective." But for all practical purposes many churches I have visited might just as well erect the sign.

Those of us who travel on crutches or in wheelchairs are quick to notice physical facilities when we enter a public building. A friend of mine, who walks with the aid of crutches, recently moved into a new town. She and her husband were attracted to a nearby Mennonite church, but after one visit they looked elsewhere for a church home. Too many steps! A pastor's wife tells me that a lady in her congregation has become a radio Christian because she is embarrassed to be carried up two flights of stairs in her wheelchair. Another wheelchair friend reports that although she bought a youth-sized chair for going through narrow passageways, she has encountered new public buildings with rest room doors so narrow that even a youth chair will not go through.

On the positive side, I have noticed some thoughtful provisions for the less-abled. One new church, which has its major fellowship facilities in the basement, has provided a convenient rest room on the main floor. In my home church comfortable lounge chairs have appeared in the front entrance, where it is often necessary to wait for transportation or to stand for extended periods of time. It is not unusual to find hearing aids installed in many church pews for those who are handicapped in that way. Even older buildings are often equipped with handrails on stairways; occasionally one finds a wheelchair ramp or an elevator. And wherever one goes there are always people who are quick to stretch out a helping hand or to show Christian courtesy in any of a dozen ways.

I hesitated to write this article, for it sounds a bit complaining, but I feared that while I hesitated someone might build a magnificent house of worship, lovely to look upon, but so high and lofty that some of us would be left out in the cold.

Are You There, God?

By L. C. Gooding

Lord?
Are You there, Lord?
Such things are happening,
so much of suffering,
so much of greed and violence and hate
(and yet I read, "For God so loved the world —") that sometimes I have to wonder if You care.
Or — if You're even there.

And then there's me, Lord.
I go along and mostly try to do what I should do, what I've been taught are Christian things to do;
and no one knows (but You; I think You know) that inwardly I seethe and boil and ache.
You know I seldom show it but I am bewildered by my doubts and often plagued by fears; and torn by grief when I so often miss the mark, that holiness I truly do desire.

I wonder — is this prayer, just rambling on like this, just telling it the way it is?
But life's so complex, and I'm so alone.
I feel bad, Lord. I had to tell someone;
just thought I ought to tell You.
Are You there?

This valuable paperback is well worth the money, but more especially the time to study it. Pastors especially will appreciate these Passion Week sermons that they have not preached, and they will preach better on these same themes by reason of the thinking that will be suggested as they read these sermons and peruse the many sermon outlines and the poems offered with each section.

Spurgeon's sermon on "Father, Forgive Them" is well worth the price of the book. Though he was a sincere Calvinist, in some respects his invitation in this sermon is Arminian, to be sure, when he extends the offer of salvation to any and all sinners, indeed to all mankind, repentant or no. Listen.

"Will He refuse you? Stands it to reason that He can? . . . Even for you will He plead. . . . Come put your case in His hands. . . . He lives and while He lives He pleads; and while there is a sinner upon earth to be saved, there shall be an Intercessor in heaven to plead for him."

As this reviewer read Spurgeon's other sermon, the one on "The Saddest Cry from the Cross" ("My God, my God, why . . . ?") my tears fell freely, so potent was the plumbing of the depths that Spurgeon rightly claims cannot be plumbed. Says he, "What was this forsaking? We are trying to come a little closer to this burning, yet unconsumed bush—with our shoes off our feet, I hope, all the while." This is the seventh printing of this work. — J. Paul Sauder.

This book is completely different from all other "Lenten Service" books that I’ve read. Although the chapters are simple sermons for the Lenten season, the message is completely contemporary. There is not the rehashing of old theories and illustrations, but a newer fresh approach to today’s needs. A refreshing book for the pastor, it should provide stimuli for new illustrations for sermons.

There are nine different chapters, each a sermon, speaking on a subject which is timely. — Waldo E. Miller.

This is an excellent book on the seven last sayings of Christ from the cross. The chapter titles are: (1) The Forgiving Spirit; (2) Hope for the Hopeless; (3) The Women in His Life; (4) Mastering Mental Depression; (5) On Being Really Human; (6) Secrets of Satisfied Living; (7) The Safest Deposit of All.

This book is full of Scripture quotations with many quotes also from other sources. The crucifixion story is made alive again for the reader. For the busy pastor there is an abundance of illustrative material which he can use in sermons. — John E. Lapp.

The Lenten Sourcebook by Herbert Lockyer. Zondervan Publishing House. 1968. 192 pp. $4.95

The Lenten Sourcebook was prepared by Herbert Lockyer to help "young and inexperienced pastors who require necessary help as they come to face Easter with its opportunities of declaring the truths such a season represents" (p. 20).

The author briefly describes the origin and observance of Lent in the history of the church. He reflects upon ways that pastors and churches can prepare in order to make the most of the Lenten season. The major portion of the book contains suggested Lenten programs, sermons, illustrations, prayers, poems, and plays that a pastor could use as he plans the Lenten emphasis in the congregation he serves. — James E. Horsch.

This is a real contribution toward understanding biblical concepts of spiritual living. The author is well qualified with his wide knowledge of Scripture to successfully present both sides of the subject. For example he deals with the sovereignty of God and man’s free will, putting them in a balanced perspective. He gives a balanced view of the baptism of the Holy Spirit and the importance of dedication.

He does not overlook the value of service and witnessing and gives this balanced statement, "Doing good without witnessing the message is the social gospel; witnessing without doing good is the unadored gospel. — Bringing results (converts) from the witness is something only God can do, but giving the witness is something we must do."

I would highly recommend this book for church libraries. I am sure it will give answers to many confused ideas. It is well worth reading for the chapters on "Legal or Legalistic," "Should I Seek to Speak in Tongues?" "Money and the Love of God," "Routine Faithfulness." His chapter on "Using Your Gifts" is the most balanced I have read on spiritual gifts. — C. J. Ramer.

Forty-five college students and their professor participated in writing Stand on Your Own Three Feet. Three to six students collaborated on each of the eight chapters, all projects in a class in Contemplary Youth Problems at Seattle Pacific College. The chapters represent considerable research. The titles: Inner Space; High Fly and You’re Out; The Suble Uncertainties of the Simple Ship; Home-icide, Exit Right, What’s There to Do? Who’s Standing on Your Air Hose? and Hurry Up and Wait! A variety of problems and questions which youth face—sex, drugs, alcohol, family conflicts, identity questions, choice of college or vocation, questions about faith—are included in the discussions.

The writers are committed Christian youth. The discussions are addressed to Christian teenagers primarily of high school age, and underclassmen in college. However, the discussions will be helpful to parents who ought to hear and understand their teenagers. Very good for the youth section of the church library. — Virgil J. Breneman.

So Who’s Afraid of Birthdays by Anna B. Mow. J. B. Lippincott Co. 1969. 128 pp. $3.95.

Anna Mow, herself over sixty, has written a book for those over sixty and those who expect to be. She sees clearly the pitfalls and the joys for persons of this age.

Mrs. Mow is not one to live in the past, but she knows how to draw on it for counsel to others. She does this with wisdom and wit.

In this, her fifth book, Mrs. Mow writes about the common problems of retirement years: illness, feelings of self-pity and uselessness, loneliness, and despair. She always sees the possibility of beginning anew. One could say that her own life philosophy is, "So birthdays don’t count. It is life that counts."

The twenty-one chapters have such titles as: Can You Hold On? Can You Let Go? What Are You Learning? Have You Given Up Childish Ways?

Any 65-year-old or older who wants to know what to do with himself or herself without merely killing time, will find help here. — Helen Alderfer.
A Jesuit educator told an audience that President Nixon's Vietnam policy is "bankrupt, a tissue of inconsistencies."

Father Robert F. Drinan, S.J., vice-president and provost of Boston College and dean of its law school, spoke during the John Ireland Lecture Forum sponsored by the Archdiocese of St. Paul-Minneapolis urban affairs commission.

"In the past 20 years," Father Drinan said, "this country has seen a fantastic growth of the military state, and it's leading us into a snake pit of disaster.

"The military-industrial complex was Eisenhower's phrase — no hippie he — and how right he was to warn us. What's happened is that the military has become so strong that it has influenced our foreign policy so we try military solutions to social and economic problems."

Father Drinan is outspoken about what he says he learned on a visit to Vietnam.

"The White House people lied to us before we went," he stated. "I can't believe they were so ignorant; they must have been lying. I tell you, we have spent $30 billion a year in South Vietnam for the past several years seeking a military solution. And the country is a mess. If we'd been spending $30 billion a year there in health and education programs, the Cong would be nowhere to be seen."

Pope Paul VI declared that priestly celibacy was "a fundamental law" of the Latin Church and "cannot be abandoned," or even "put under discussion."

Addressing thousands of Romans and pilgrims gathered in St. Peter's Square for his regular Sunday noon blessing, the Pope said:

"Among the great issues, in need of God's help, toward which we direct the prayers of those good and faithful souls who turn to the Lord on behalf of us and our intentions, there is one that is now close to our heart and of which much is said: the sacred celibacy of priests.

"The celibacy of priests is an act of faith and love which our Latin Church, with great experience and courage, has imposed on her priests for the purpose of greater selection and perennial renewal of her priestly ministry." * * *

The Board of World Missions of the Presbyterian Church, U.S. (Southern), has asked the denomination's General Assembly to give attention to the global dimensions of racial discrimination and ghettos.

Dr. T. Watson Street, executive secretary, noted that such issues are often thought to be confined to the U.S. "They have far wider implications," he said, adding:

"Two thirds of the population in the areas served by the board is black. The people in these areas see parallels between their frustrations and those of the American Negro. Thus they watch with keen interest what is done and what is left undone by Christians in America." * * *

Did you know that the great TV networks fear the concern and reactions of ordinary wives and mothers more than they do Vice President Agnew or official panels? They can counter the Veep's accusations, confer and argue with the panels — even argue with Senate committees. But if thousands of women start writing the sponsors of TV programs, protesting and announcing their intention of boycotting products and turning off programs — panic hits Madison Avenue and the network offices.

One concerned woman started an organization last spring to mobilize and register opinion on TV programs. Already more than 44,757 persons in 30 states have signed an "expression of concern" against what they consider objectional TV fare, particularly violence and sadism in TV programs and movies they feel are too sexually explicit for home viewing. Photostatic copies of these statements and names were sent to the three TV networks and to the Federal Communications Commission last spring as the opening move in a rebellion led by housewives against entertainers they think are unfit for the home.

They are organized nationally under the name of CURE, which can stand either for Citizens United for Responsible Entertainment or for Christians United for Responsible Entertainment — according to the choice of local units. CURE was organized by a small group of Baptist women under the co-chairmanship of Mrs. Sam McGennis, wife of a Baptist minister. The group has spread rapidly throughout the nation, with a threefold aim for first requesting NBC, CBS, and ABC to (1) eliminate the "for adults only" movies from TV; (2) decrease sharply the violence and sadism in TV programs; (3) show more character-building programs for the nation's youth. * * *

Churches have failed to guide their members on deciding the issues of peace and war, a United Methodist theologian from Atlanta said.

"People in my own denomination have acted from their liberal utopian positions of the 1930s when they spelled out church stands," Theodore Weber was quoted in the Chicago Daily News.

The Social Ethics teacher at Emory University told Reporter James H. Bowman that the "churches have not provided people with a realistic context for making decisions."

The Methodist was in Chicago for an "action consultation" on "conscience, war, and the churches" at McCormick Theological Seminary.

Groups like the Mennonites, Weber stated, "have done the best job of helping people decide the morality of war." But he said with groups open to possible justification of the use of force, like the Methodists, it has been "a different ball game altogether." * * *

A doctor who directed Canadian medical aid in Vietnam for five years says he knew about the Song My massacre two weeks after it happened but did not report it because such slaughters were commonplace.

Dr. Alje Vennema said in Toronto that his hospital was six miles from Song My, where at least 110 civilians are alleged to have been murdered by United States troops.

Vennema said another reason why he did not report the incident was that the U.S. forces would argue that all the dead were Vietcong, "even the two-year-olds."

He said he saw the bodies of women and children who had been shot after U.S. search-and-destroy missions in the Duc Pho district. * * *

The medical staffs of the two hospitals at Turlock, Calif., organized a campaign last November to help smokers quit. Doctors and dentists contributed to the Turlock Journal a series of articles on "Twenty-one Reasons Why You Should Stop Smoking."

Signs on roads leading into Turlock read: "Welcome to Turlock — Please Don't Smoke. We're Trying to Quit." "End Emphysema." "Cut Coronaries." "Clear Air," and "Curb Cancer." "L.O. (I Quit)" buttons were made available. For three weeks doctors gave free advice on how to quit smoking. Campaigners went to drugstores and asked for statements from them on the health hazards of cigarette smoking, and also urged them to stop selling cigarettes.

One of the articles said: "One drop of nicotine, the amount in 70 cigarettes, will kill a man in a few minutes if the drop is given in one dose." * * *

The teachers and Chamber of Commerce took their campaign to the public schools. On December 7 there was a "Cough In" at the High School. Smokers were asked to throw their cigarettes into a wooden coffin. Later the coffin was buried.
MDS Reaches Adulthood

Disaster spells misfortune, calamity, catastrophe, bringing with it destruction of life, property, projects, and careers. But when a word becomes a name, it often undergoes a metamorphosis as its identity changes.

As evidenced at the annual All-Unit Meeting of the Mennonite Disaster Service held at Millinger Church, Lancaster, Pa., on Feb. 13 and 14, the word "disaster" is taking on new meanings. From the early beginnings of MDS in Kansas as a clean-up team after physical disasters, it soon grew to include longer-term rehabilitation.

MDS is much like the Christian church—it develops through human suffering. This past year saw MDS spurt from adolescence to early adulthood. The catalyst was some of the worst disasters in the memory of mankind.

Floods, fires, tornadoes, hurricanes—they all played their part. But the most severe testing of MDS strength came in Mississippi and Virginia in the aftermath of Hurricane Camille. As a direct result, two special-interest groups, which until now had gone more or less unnoticed, were officially recognized for their contribution and worth.

With the determination of women and hardened bishops of youth added to the traditional MDS trunk, MDS effectiveness increased immensely.

This year, disaster, as reported at the annual MDS meeting, came to mean more than cleanup or even rehabilitation after physical deprivation. Disaster has come to mean not only the destruction caused by an act of God, but also by acts of man. Projects such as community work, working with the disabled and disadvantaged, aiding in Head Start programs, and caring for disadvantaged children were mentioned seriously as worthwhile projects. As Freeman Lambright, Ind., stated in a report, "Whenever lives (spiritual or physical) are lost, it is a disaster."

Inner-city work is shaping up for some of the units. Rehabilitating ghetto homes is an important aspect of this work. Most find that when working under black leadership toward black goals, they are surprisingly well accepted, even though they come as uninitiated white Americans. James Burkholder, pastor and MDS project leader in Pittsburgh, Pa., says, "It is often our innocence that makes us a success. We don't know enough to know that white cannot work with black."

As special speaker at the meeting, David Augsburger, Mennonite Hour speaker, compared MDS men to "God's gamblers," a phrase once used by non-Christians to describe the compassionate acts and risks of early Christians during a bubonic plague. "We are there not so much to help, but to make it known that Jesus Christ is what makes our lives work. Wouldn't it be great if the people whom you would work could say that you reminded them of Jesus?" he said.

Robert Lavelle, black realtor and community leader, Pittsburgh, Pa., and with whom the Pittsburgh MDS unit has been closely associated, spoke on some of the problems the black community faces. "Blacks are the victims, not the causes of the ghettos. Every ghetto started as a good white neighborhood. City services move out with the affluent white. One-family dwellings are made into multi-family dwellings. There are more people but fewer services."

"Black Americans have had their spirit killed," he said, referring to Jesus' words on fearing those who kill the spirit rather than those who kill the body. "There can be no change without suffering. Just stand alongside us in our suffering."

The strengths of MDS were heralded as a telegram from Robert Pierpont, national director, Disaster Services, American National Red Cross, and a letter of appreciation from President Richard Nixen were cited. But the weakness of the MDS organization was not left untouched. Much discussion and some polarization on issues had taken place before the delegates had arrived.

A strong desire for unity through Christ predominated. The issues will be faced throughout the months ahead toward a better witness for MDS.

The 1971 All-Unit Meeting will be hosted by Region V in Alberta, Canada, on February 12 and 13.

Women Grace MDS Operations

"How can Mennonite women exercise their faith through Mennonite Disaster Service?" was the question which was discussed by a panel of four ladies.

Participants on the panel were Mrs. Ben Wedel, Moundridge, Kan.; Mrs. Charles Miller, Wauseon, Ohio; Mrs. Esther Eby Glass, Lancaster, Pa.; and Mrs. Ernest Yoder, Rustburg, Va.

Each of the ladies told about her experiences of working with MDS. Mrs. Wedel was on the first plane of volunteers from Kansas to fly to Mississippi after Hurricane Camille struck. There were six women in the group and she stayed to supervise a second group of ladies who came to help. They worked mainly with the Red Cross, preparing food, helping the people in the long lines waiting for assistance, and just listening to the people as they told of their experiences during the time of the storm.

"Many times we found we were doing more good just by listening to them and gaining their trust," she said. "We were known as 'angels of mercy' to the storm victims."

Mrs. Miller was involved with MDS work in 1965 after Hurricane Betsy hit Louisiana. Her experiences were a bit different from those of the usual volunteers in that she worked in a local restaurant which was next to the motel where the MDS teams stayed while in the community for cleanup.

"I told them I couldn't do much, but I could wash dishes, and that's what I did." She soon began other tasks in the kitchen and also helped prepare some of the meals.

When she left home, she had envisioned working with other Christian ladies. "Little did I realize that I would work in a place that had a bar." The people she worked with had many questions about her work and the Mennonites. "Questions such as, 'Why don't you drink?' 'How many hours a day do you pray?' and 'You mean you're working here for nothing!' really put me on the spot," she said. Through this experience, she was able to communicate her faith and show that God was a God of love. She also led one of the girls in the restaurant back to the Lord.

When the unit was ready to leave Chalmette, the people wanted them to stay and begin a church.

Mrs. Glass related incidents of women who worked in Virginia after the flood. One lady, she said, worked there when the water was still quite high and the shock of the disaster—what she had seen and done—didn't really affect her until after she was back home and had time to think about the terrible things she had seen.
Another lady spent a week in Virginia and was kept busy from morning until night. She set breakfast tables for MDS teams, painted in a house all day, and returned to help with the supper dishes in the evening.

"Ladies who stayed home and cared for other women's families should be given much credit for their contribution to MDS. Without their willingness and cooperation, many of the women who served would not have been able to," she said.

Mrs. Yoder was involved in the Virginia work also. She reported that there were 2,000 days of work put in by women after the disaster in Virginia. She was involved in sorting clothes. There were 12 centers where used clothing was stored and they had to get it out of the schools before school could begin.

Much of the clothing was given to the storm victims, and the rest was sent to MCC for shipment overseas. Ladies from Canada, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Virginia helped, but there was too much for them to do in order to do a proper job of sorting the clothing, she said.

Mrs. Wedel suggested some guidelines to the women as they contemplate serving in any capacity with MDS: (1) go with an open mind to work where you are needed the most; (2) go with the intention of working long and hard hours; and (3) go with an understanding spirit — willing to listen to the people as they tell of their problems.

Youth Find Role in MDS Operations

"This is the first time in the history of Mennonite Disaster Service that youth have been included on the program of an MDS meeting." So spoke Ray Horst, Volunteer Service director for Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, as he introduced a panel of four young men.

"More and more, MDS is becoming an organ of the church in which people of all ages may become involved," he continued.

The fellows, Raymond Reitz, Steve Alderer, Howard Hall, and Virgil Gerber, told the group of their experiences and insights gained as they worked at the various projects.

Reitz, a senior at Lancaster Mennonite School, said that he first heard of the need for volunteers to go to Virginia in church one Sunday. They were to go armed with buckets and shovels to clean mud and debris from the area.

The group worked four days, but Reitz stayed on two extra days. During his stay, he was involved in three different projects — cleaning mud out of houses, working on a sewer line, and searching for bodies. "This was an experience I'll never forget," he said.

Gerber, a senior at Bluffton College, along with 14 others, spent a 3 1/2-week interterm session in Mississippi. Although they were not skilled laborers, they were able to make valuable contributions to the work which is still being done in Mississippi.

"This was an experience which really affected me spiritually," he said. "I was able to help and at the same time show and experience love as I became involved with the work and the people." The group was also able to serve in a community center in the evenings. They presented a church service at one of the local Mennonite churches while they were in Mississippi.

Alderfer, a senior at Christopher Dock High School, was one in a group from his school who spent Christmas vacation working in Mississippi. He admitted that at first the group felt as if they weren't accepted too well by the other MDS workers, and it took some time for them to be assigned a project. At last they were put to work cleaning a house at Pass Christian which is to be used as the unit house for a newly created VS unit established to help the people in Mississippi. Their work consisted of cleaning out mud and refuse that had been left by the hurricane.

"Our first impressions were changed by the end of the week and we wanted to stay for another week," he added.

Hall, a student at Messiah College, was in Appalachia for two weeks over Christmas vacation with a group of students sent by MDS to work with a special local need. The team members, who were also members of the American Association of Evangelical Students, worked directly with the MCC Volunteer Service unit in Whitesburg, Ky. They demolished an old house to salvage lumber in order to put a new roof on a burned-out house for a needy family.

Unfortunately, this group had very little interaction with the people in the community and Hall feels that to make a significant contribution in a situation such as theirs, involvement with the community is essential.

The panel agreed that each had gone to serve with different goals in mind, but at the same time emphasized the values and insights they had gained through the opportunity to help others in time of great need.

1800 MDS Volunteers in Mississippi

In another month, Mennonite Disaster Service expects to terminate its operations in Mississippi, where it has spent the past five months since Hurricane Camille passed through.

From Aug. 17, 1969, to Feb. 1, 1970, 1,793 persons have participated in some phase of the MDS operations on the Gulf coast. This report was given by Chris Graber, MDS Region II director.

"This adds up to a contribution of about 8,955 man-days, or about 62,685 man-hours of labor. Over 690 different jobs were completed and 15 new houses nearly constructed," Graber noted.

Over 250 girls and women contributed time to the massive project, and 290 students were on the scene from the following colleges: Goshen, Hesston, Eastern Mennonite, Conrad Grebel, Bethel, Bluffton, North Manchester, and Kansas State. Students from several of the Mennonite high schools also served.

Of the total number of persons, 274 were from Canada. The remainder came from the following states: Kansas 360; Indiana 405; Ohio 271; Florida 54; Illinois 37; Nebraska 28; Michigan 29; Mississippi 10; Alabama 9; Georgia 14; Oklahoma 19; Washington 7; Colorado 8; Pennsylvania 10; Virginia 14; Minnesota 3; Montana 2; South Dakota 37; North Dakota 2.

Plans Statement on Abolishing the Draft

At the February 9, 10 meeting of the MCC Peace Section, it was decided that when the Congressional Armed Services Committees conduct hearings on draft reform the Section will present a testimony against continued conscription. The hearings are expected to begin on March 16.

The Peace Section has spoken against the draft since the 1940s. Usually this has been accompanied by statements encouraging the widest possible recognition of conscientious objection to military service. Reflecting the increased agony both within and without the church, the Section agreed that this time their statement should clearly focus our biblical and historic Mennonite witness against conscription.

William Keeney, chairman of the Peace Section and dean of Bethel College, was asked to present the statement to the House and Senate Armed Services Committees. The Peace Section is encouraging members of the constituency to express their convictions on conscription in connection with the Congressional hearings. The Washington Office of the Peace Section will assist any MCC constituent to make a witness on this issue either in the hearings or personally to Congressmen and Senators.

The precise statement is now being prepared. The Peace Section and various conference peace committees will be asked for their counsel before the final copy is presented.

Closely related to the decision to testify on the draft was another decision to sponsor
Resslers on Brief Furlough

The names “Ruth and Rhoda Ressler” mean much to many Japanese in Hokkaido and in the city of Osaka on southern Honshu island. Ruth and Rhoda first went to Osaka in 1949 for a three-year term of rehabilitation work with Mennonite Central Committee. In 1953, after teaching school for a year in Pennsylvania, the Resslers returned to Japan as mission appointees of Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart. Following language study they assisted in the development of the Kamishihoro Church in Hokkaido where Kimura-san is the present pastor. The church developed a kindergarten program during this pioneering evangelistic effort.

In 1965 the Resslers began teaching conversational English in Osaka as self-supporting Overseas Mission Associates. On their return to Japan in early April after a six-week furlough, Rhoda will assume a professorship at Ohtani Women’s Junior College and Ruth will teach at Poole Women’s Junior College. In addition, both Ruth and Rhoda teach conversational English to adults in various industries, businesses, and the customs office.

Ruth teaches a two-hour morning women’s class once a week, which at the women’s request includes one hour of Bible study. Both Ruth and Rhoda find a great freedom to discuss spiritual matters as the students broach the subject. Businessmen, doctors, teachers, housewives, and others are eager to learn English in order to conduct business, to travel, to help children in school, to entertain Expo guests. “Expo bimbo,” meaning “Expo poor,” is common vocabulary in Japan these days.

The Japanese readily adopt foreign words into their vocabulary. Rather than develop distinctive Japanese expressions, new foreign terms and words are adopted at face value. To most Japanese, television is simply TV.

Ruth and Rhoda speak of their students and colleagues with feeling, with admiration, affection, and straightforward concern. “Was I a coward for resigning at Momoyama University (a school affected by student unrest)?” Rhoda asks. “I feel like I let them down. At the end of last term one student came up to me and asked me whether it was my being a Christian that made me so patient and ready to listen.”

The parents of Ruth and Rhoda were known to many older readers as Uncle J. A. and Aunt Lina, missionaries to India from 1890-1908, and longtime editors of Words of Cheer.

Board Nears End of Fiscal Year

Total giving to Mennonite Board of Missions has increased by $65,000 for the period from Apr. 1, 1969, to Jan. 31, 1970, as compared with the same time period last year. The Board is deeply grateful to the church constituency for its continued financial and prayer support.

The Mission Board continues to struggle with the problem of inflation. Even though program size has been increased very little in the recent past, the cost of operation continues to rise.

In an effort to keep expenditures in line with contributions, the Board program administrators were asked to find ways to reduce operating budgets. Some were able to postpone certain expenditures, which allowed the budget to be reduced by $62,950. This kind of budget cut is not a reduction in program, however, since program changes cannot take place overnight. It is merely a delay in certain expenditures which must be made eventually.

Contributions needed to operate this year’s Mission Board program amount to $1,978,050 (with budget adjustment). The Board has entered the last month of its fiscal year which ends Mar. 31. Additional contributions are needed before Mar. 31 for the Board to meet its obligations and to have adequate resources for ongoing program operations.

Contributions may be forwarded through congregational treasurers, district conference treasurers, or sent directly to Mennonite Board of Missions, Box 370, Elkhart, Ind. 46514.

Board Members Alerted to Mission ’70 Plans

In an innovative move this year, the annual meeting of Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities will schedule the business sessions to be held both prior to and following the public sessions. In previous years, all Board business preceded the public meetings.

All Mission Board members are asked to note this year’s schedule change and to plan to be present if possible for the entire Mission ’70 Convention slated for July 1-7 on the Christopher Dock High School campus near Lansdale, Pa.

Each Board member will have the following schedule: July 2 — Board business session all day; July 2 evening through July 4 evening — public sessions with Board members participating in assigned strategy groups; July 5 — take part in mission reports conference in Franconia Conference churches; July 6, 7 — continue Board business sessions.

This shift for Mission ’70 was formulated by the 14-member Program Planning Committee to provide a block of time to introduce basic issues, to involve a larger group in a search for God’s will in making Spirit-led decisions, and to encourage continued support of Board activities.

Mennonite Board of Missions’ governing body, in addition to the Executive Personnel Committee officers, is comprised of 18 district board presidents, 22 district conference appointees, two Publication Board and two General Conference appointees, 11 members at large, and one life member. Each of these Board members, after participating in the decision-making processes of the business sessions, is then responsible to report to the conference, congregations, and other groups he represents.

Social Workers to Meet

George Smucker, President of the Association of Mennonite Social Workers, chaired a recent meeting of the Executive Committee held at Indianapolis, Ind. The primary purpose of the meeting was to finalize plans for the association’s annual meeting to be held at Bluffton College, Bluffton, Ohio, on April 10 and 11, 1970. Also discussed were efforts to update and expand the organization’s membership data, and to review the goals of the organization in light of current needs and opportunities.

The association, since its beginning in 1957, has served as a vehicle for the discussion and sharing of ideas related to social welfare and the Christian faith. During the 1970’s a more active role will be sought in interpreting to the larger Mennonite brotherhood the impact of radical changes which are taking place within our social institutions. Persons working in a professional social work position or studying toward a degree in social work are encouraged to write for a membership application to: Marion Steiner, 1921 Altgeld Street, South Bend, Ind. 46614.

Mission Projects Are Available for Children

Each year Mennonite Board of Missions suggests some projects for children to help them better understand the meaning of the Great Commission, become involved in the church’s mission, and learn about giving through personal experience. These projects are designed to help children develop Christlike attitudes of love, compassion, and acceptance toward other people. Seven projects have been selected for 1970. Each project ordered comes with a set of materials that includes a teacher’s guide, pupil’s guide, and additional audiovisual material. The projects for this year are:

— A Place to Play. Frontier Boys Village in Colorado presently has no indoor gymnasium and no outdoor recreational facilities. Forty boys plus the staff will do the work if finances for the materials are provided.

— A First Real Home at Frontier Boys Village in Colorado. Some of the boys living at Frontier have no real home. A number of small cabins could be remodeled where some of these boys would live as a real family.

— Nursery and Sunday school supplies for inner-city children. Two nurseries — Bethel in Chicago and Bethesda in St. Louis — and a Sunday school at University-Euclid Church in Cleveland are included in this project.

— Mission Transportation for American Indian mission stations. Included here are Black Mountain and Blue Gap in Arizona and Philadelphia, Miss.

— Learning to Sew in the Middle East. Mennonite Central Committee helps teach young girls to sew. A cloth kit and other materials for girls on the West Bank cost about $10 per month per girl.

— Bible translation in Argentina. Missionary Albert Buckwalter is translating the Bible into the Toba Indian language. Financial support is needed to sustain this work.

— A Vehicle for African Travel. Laurence Horst is on regular mission assignment traveling among villages in Ghana. Funds are needed to purchase a vehicle to help him in his work.

To encourage participation in these projects, mission savings banks and dime cards are available upon request free of charge. Capital for earning projects for missions is also available. The leader or teacher requests the amount desired and then returns the original capital plus income from the investment project. Previously called a “quarter fund” project, now it is termed the “dollar project.” Persons who have not already received the descriptive brochure for these projects should write to Mennonite Board of Missions, Box 370, Elkhart, Ind. 46514.

Church Has a Happening

“Mike Sokoll considers the entire city of Stockton, Calif., to be his mission field. After 16 years as a pastor I have yet to make some of the significant contacts in certain areas of city life where Mike already is involved.”

The speaker: Donald Yoder, pastor of Trinity Mennonite Church in Phoenix, Ariz., and overseer for Southwest Mennonite Conference. During a Feb. 17 interview at Mennonite Board of Missions headquarters in Elkhart, Yoder discussed this new Mennonite witness presently growing within his district conference.

Mike Sokoll is a key figure opening doors of opportunity in Stockton, an industrial city of 86,000 located 80 miles east of San Francisco. Sokoll moved to Stockton with his wife, Mary, and three children in Jan. 1969. Since then the house church the couple established has had five baptized members and an average weekly attendance of 30. But there’s more to the story than this.

Mike Sokoll has no place he really calls home. After spending his early years wandering across Western United States, he gained entrance into the world of organized crime by age 16. Small wonder, then, that he eventually found himself on the inside looking out — from behind the four walls of a prison cell in Centreville, Mich.

Yoder explained that Mike one day came across a copy of Good News for Modern Man, and, not having any other literature readily available, he began reading. Immediately captivated and convicted by the contemporary message, Mike fell to his knees in his prison cell and turned his life over to Jesus Christ.

Through continuing contacts with members of the Locust Grove Mennonite Church in Burr Oak, Mich., Sokoll became a member of that congregation upon his release from prison. The Sokolls were subsequently commissioned by the Locust Grove congregation to move to Stockton (where Mary had grown up) to explore possibilities for a new ministry there.

“Presently we are active in a varied assortment of activities,” Mike wrote in the current issue of the Southwest Conference Messenger. “We have been working with blind people. There is an active tutorial project which allows us to help young people with their education. I have opportunity to witness to the institutional leaders when setting up tutoring projects. Many openings for a larger Mennonite witness are available as a result of these contacts.

“In the past few weeks we have had confrontation with two dope addicts and two victims of broken marriages, three marriage counselings, and a threat on my life,” Mike continued. “In a little over a month 74 visitors entered our home for reasons ranging from instruction in Christian living to material help, sleep, and escape from bodily harm and mental depression.”

Among the baptized members of the Morning Star congregation are Phill Blaine and Bruce Leavitt. Phill, 50, is blind, but carries on an active Christian witness. Bruce, 21, who serves as Sunday night moderator and plays the guitar for church services, recently lost a girl friend because of his peace position. Following college in June, he plans to enter Voluntary Service.

Yoder pointed out that the Stockton congregation is in dire need of a permanent location for worship. Thus far the group has been meeting at the Sokoll residence, which has proved to be inadequate for the growing number of persons attending. They have even had to turn people away until they have more space.

Plans also call for the establishment of a Voluntary Service unit to be administered by Mennonite Board of Missions. Assignments will likely include teaching in lower economic areas, providing medical services, and working with local organizations involved in community development. Target date is May of this year.

Not the least of Mike Sokoll’s unique gifts is his ability to fuse the seemingly inconceivable entities of evangelistic fervor and social action. “He not only leads persons to Christ,” said Yoder, “but he sticks with these new Christians and helps them face the crucial issues of everyday life.”

“The Morning Star Mennonite congregation is a happening church,” Yoder added. “It is a real encouragement to see people actually asking to come to church from all walks of life who have discovered the excitement of knowing Jesus Christ personally.”

FIELD NOTES

Wilbert Shenk accompanied Vern Preheim of MCC to Nigeria to participate in planning the Mennonite contribution to relief and rehabilitation needs. They arrived in Nigeria on Feb. 25 for a two-week visit.

The Earl Swartzentruber family, after a three-month furlough in North America, was scheduled to leave for Argentina on Feb. 26.

The H. James Martin family from Uruguay, who were living in Harrisonburg, Va., moved to La Junta, Colo. Their address is: 522 Lincoln Ave., La Junta, Colo. 81050. James has been invited to pastor two churches: East Holbrook in Cherraw and First Mennonite in La Junta.

Stan Friesen writes from Ibadan, Nigeria: "Our first weeks in Ibadan have been full and exhausting, but rich and encouraging. We were met in Lagos by John Crossley who was a real help in negotiating our way through customs and immigration. We had no difficulty getting a two-year residence permit."

Charles Shenk, Kushiro, Japan, reports: "In Tanase-san’s absence I’ve been asked to give guidance to the Eastern Hokkaido Bible School program here in Kushiro. I feel that the EHBS program is proving itself in that all the men who have finished are now serving faithfully — in some cases outstandingly — as pastors or lay leaders of congregations. The Obihiro school has its own equally encouraging story. There is substantial interest to expand the services of EHBS to Asahigawa and Sapporo. It seems to me that Tanase’s return to strengthen and expand this work could well be one of the most significant factors in the building of the church in Hokkaido."

There were 291 persons on the active roll for Home Bible Studies correspondence courses as of Dec. 31, 1969, according to Wilbur Hostetler, Elkhart, director. Eighty-one from this group were prisoners, new enrollees numbered 96, and 126 persons completed courses.

Five Eastern Board VS-ers, after completing a Spanish language course at San Jose, Costa Rica, have now moved to their assignments. David Stauffer went to Orange Walk, British Honduras, as manager of the Trading Center. Gerald Leaman went to Cayo, in western British Honduras, for agricultural extension work. Across the border in Guatemala Mervin Horst will also serve in agricultural extension work. Nelson Newcomer and Robert Noll went to La Ceiba, Honduras. Newcomer will assist local poultry farmers and will help develop poultry processing. Noll will work with the credit unions of the area.

Change of address: A. Lloyd Swartzentruber from Buckeye, Ariz., to 1520 College Ave., Harrisonburg, Va. 22801.

Readers Say

Submissions to Readers Say column should comment on printed articles.

I have just reread for the third time the article of "Conversation with Erna" in the Dec. 9, 1969, issue of the Gospel Herald and the reply of the metropolitan Jan. 6, 1970.

The article "Conversation with Erna" was a heart-warming and proper one for a Christian. It is disturbing to me to have our Christian people take the position that the group from Lancaster did. I did not believe that Maynard Shelly defended the right or the left despite their accusations in their letter. I believe he put himself squarely behind his faith in God and the power of Christ to change men and to change the world. I want to support his position one hundred percent. True, it is not always easy to know exactly where one should stand on many issues that face us, but God's Word is there to guide us.

I also understand that taking this position of trust in God doesn't guarantee that terrible consequences might not occur to my family and myself, but this I would gladly want to accept knowing that I am in the will of God.

It is difficult for me to see how anyone can be a follower of such men as Carl McIntire or the other right-wing extremists and do it in the name of God. This, in spite of what they all say, I cannot accept. I, as a Christian, am called only to live for Christ and to testify of His life. The consequences I am ready to leave in His hands.

— F. L. Rheinheimer, Milford, Ind.

I wish to express appreciation for the article "The Thousand Year Period" in the Jan. 27 Gospel Herald. For some time now I have felt there is much to be said for Bro. Schrock's viewpoint.

May I also point out that if the "1000" years began with the advent and work of Christ (immunual), during the gate period or to this, the nations were indeed "deceived," for the "gospel" of that day was confined to the Jews. In the age of grace, people of any nation are accepted of God as they are, without changing their national affiliation. It follows, of course, that there is yet coming a time of trouble when the nations will again be deceived (excluded from the work of Christ), and that before the end. Rev. 20:7-9.

While I wish to commend our brother, I am not quite agreeable to the evention that will not take place, among them, those related to Rom. 11:25-27, and 2 Thess. 2:3-10. And the fact that New Testament writers failed to explain certain Old Testament passages does not necessarily eliminate their future importance.

The most important thing in eschatology is an understanding of Acts 1:6, 7, where the Savior neither confirmed nor denied the disciples' question, but for the present there were more important things to be done.

In the meantime, Bro. Schrock's interpretation is of far more practical comfort to the saints, than to delegate all detail to the future.

— Allan W. Smith, Unionville, Ont.

In general I appreciate the Gospel Herald. I simply want to express special thanks publicly to very much of the fine Bible exposition in the Feb. 3 issue entitled, "God's Chosen People." It was well-reasoned and fully based upon God's Word. I was happy for the stress put upon the conditions demanded by God for His people's occupancy of the land.

God's warnings to Solomon is a strong one given in 2 Chronicles 7:19-22. Another such strong statement is in Deut. 1-3. However, I would agree even more with the major point of the article: God has one chosen people and the choosing is in Christ, and the final blessing and reward is eternal bliss, not a mere geographic location in this earth. I consider myself a true Jew (Rom. 2:28, 29), unworthy but very happy in being one of "God's Chosen People."

— Stanley Kreider, Lancaster, Pa.

The Paul Lederach suggestion (Feb. 17 issue) of a high level conference to determine whether or not the church is solvent, is a good one. I would like to see this meeting given some priority in schedules.

A meeting like this could have a uniting effect on the Church and to Amos Weaver for the fine Bible exposition in the Feb. 3 issue entitled, "God's Chosen People." It was well-reasoned and fully based upon God's Word. I was happy for the stress put upon the conditions demanded by God for His people's occupancy of the land.

The Feb. 10 issue has brought to a head several questions I've been pondering since 1967 when I began my Pax assignment in Congo. These questions are mainly within the realm of nonresistance. There are many honest questions raised by the society of this world. Let me first ask what you meant by communism in the editorial "What Brings Communism?" If you're talking about the Ku Klux Klan, I think I have an answer. In the minds of so many American people, then in my opinion you're talking about imperialism and exploitation of which we Americans are as much involved as the Russians, Chinese, etc., not Communism.

I question our preachers like Don Blosser in "What Did Jesus Say About Killing People?" who say nonresistance means getting involved and working to correct the ills of society and then after "Christians" are involved, say, "But Christ didn't mean that kind of physical involvement." The early church had room for a Roman army captain because nonresistance has made us unique as a church; are we better Christians because of this? Only God can be the final judge.

— John W. Miller, Mt. Pleasant, Mich.

I want to give you personal commendation on the Feb. 3 editorial. I many times have deeply appreciated editorials and frequently clip them, so when the one came out entitled, "What Are the Christians?" I would say praise the Lord! Reading it once is hardly often enough. Maybe you should keep reminding us how important it is by reprinting it once every six months! For many nonresistors the article has become more important than another, but I thought the next to the last one tells us something that is seldom told.

May God continue to give us such good things through the Gospel Herald. — Mrs. W. LaVerne Miller, Nampa, Idaho.

In the Feb. 10 issue 1 agree with Carl S. Keener, "Adaptability and Salty Christians," that the Mennonite Church needs pastors, not more preachers. But some preachers and persons don't know the meaning of the term "pastor." They equate "pastor" with authoritarian bishop. Bro. Keener was simply helpful in this, but we need more education on the meaning of the term "pastor," and to know how intensely we care for the spiritual life of the congregation, before some people will be able to speak of this gift as pastor and not as bishop.

Praiseworthy is the editorial "What Brings Communism?" We need more explanations (this was a good beginning) rather than so many "Communist" labels for those who disagree with us.

In the Feb. 17 issue, "Why I Don't Eat Grapes," I would like to ask Bro. Landes if the workers in California want to join the union. Why have they signed up in several years of grape boycottting? Since I live in Ohio, I favor of grape boycottting didn't leave a very good taste in the mouth of some people, it would be very helpful if Bro. Landes or someone else would write columns about what's going on among the issues involved on the side of the grape growers as well as the side of the farm workers. — Carl Smeltzer, Kalona, Iowa.

High Ground

by Esther Loewen Vogt

This is the story of Chris Anderson and some of the growing she is forced to do mentally and spiritually. Fresh out of high school with big college plans, Chris discovers that life does not always work out as planned. She learns that commitment to God's will and way is more than words.

The story takes place in a Midwestern farm community and on a Christian college campus. The fun, loves, jealousies, dreams, hopes, disappointments, discouragements, sadness, fears, and frustrations common to the teenager are all a part of this story. But through the story the author has portrayed the way of salvation in a manner that can be understood by the reader.

Surviving are 3 sons (Glenn R., Wayne M., and Orval J.), 3 daughters (Ferne — Mrs. Lloyd Zehr, Marjorie — Mrs. Evan Whitesell, and Marlene — Mrs. Marion Leichty), 15 grandchildren, 3 great-grandchildren, 4 brothers (John M., Joe M., Kores M., and Francis M.), and one sister (Ida — Mrs. Ferro Bender). He was preceded in death by one grandchild, and 2 brothers (Harvey and Will). He was a member of the Lower Deer Creek Church, where funeral services were held Sept. 10, with Robert K. Yoder and John Y. Swartzendruber officiating.

Zook, Martha, daughter of John C. and Elizabeth (Miller) Bender, was born in Johnson Co., Iowa, Oct. 13, 1894; died at Mercy Hospital, Iowa City, Iowa, Feb. 12, 1970; aged 75 y. 4 m. On Aug. 14, 1914, she was married to Edd Zook, who survives. Also surviving are 3 children (Raymond, Edith — Mrs. Gideon Yoder, and Mary — Mrs. Randal Davis), 2 grandsons that grew up in their home (Sheldon and Harlan Yoder), and 3 sisters (Mrs. Katie Swartz, Naomi Bender, and Mary — Mrs. Sam T. Miller). She was a member of the East Union Church, where funeral services were held Feb. 14, with J. John J. Miller officiating.

The Thrill of the Cross
The suffering, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ are still making their impact on the everyday life of mankind. Let us go back two thousand years to the exciting events of Holy Week. What a picture as we contemplate the happenings that touched the very heart and life of our Lord! We vividly see the palm branches waving and hear the shouts of hosanna and praise. But a few short days later, we visualize Jerusalem tense with hatred and murderous intentions. The people that were shouting glad hosannas are now actually planning to kill the One they had been praising.

We wonder why Jesus dreaded His death. It must be that He knew He was going to suffer something that men do not ordinarily suffer in death. Christ came out of eternity knowing the cross was at the end of the road. Yet He was a busy person. Every waking moment was spent in His important ministry, and occupied with service to others. He had a divine task to fulfill and nothing could stop Him. Suddenly, so quickly, He came to the end of the road and there stood the ghastly cross. And with this on His mind, even while the band of soldiers was approaching softly through the black night, Jesus prayed in bloody agony in the garden. Jesus was alone. The world was silent, unconcerned, and sleeping. The multitudes that had thronged around Him were nowhere to be found. Even the disciples who walked with Him through life lay sleeping.

Jesus fully realized that He could have called for help, even to the extent of twelve legions of angels. The sly band of soldiers that were stealing toward the garden would have looked mighty silly and helpless surrounded by twelve legions, more than 70,000, of angels. Praise God, His mind was set. Jesus was going to die for us. God’s plan of redemption had to be fulfilled and He was going to do it.

Crucifixion was Rome’s punishment for slaves, foreigners, and hardened criminals who were not Roman citizens. It was the most agonizing death a cruel age could devise. Nails were driven through the hands and feet of the victim, who was already stripped of most of his clothes, and scourged. The nailing process was very painful, but the results were even worse. The dying victim was left to hang in agony and excruciating pain. Burning fever and unbearable thirst were accompaniments of crucifixion.

We may readily ask the question, “Who crucified Christ?” Who was the instigator of this murderous plot that took the life of our Lord? It might have been Judas, the unfaithful disciple who betrayed Jesus with a kiss for the small material reward of 30 pieces of silver. It might have been the Jews. They, including the scribes and Pharisees, stirred up the multitudes to a mob spirit of hatred against this Man who threatened to expose their wicked hearts, neatly covered over with false pious actions. We might blame Pontius Pilate, the Roman provincial governor who turned Jesus over to the soldiers for execution. Then it might have been the soldiers, for they had the actual job of driving the nails. Yes, these people were all responsible, but there is someone else. That person is you. You helped crucify Christ. We all had a part. 1 Peter 2:24 says, “Who his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree.” Our sins had to be atoned for. Every Christian is saved by grace through this atoning work of Christ Jesus. Now we have redemption through His blood, by the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of His grace. Praise God for this wonderful redemption that is available to all mankind!

The next time you see a picture of the crucifixion, think how you share in the guilt. This is the price that had to be paid for your sins. The glorious thing is that God forgives and accepts us, forgetting what we have done. He never throws our sins up to us again. Someone said, “He forgives and buries our sins in the depth of the sea — then posts a sign — ‘No Fishing Allowed.’” This is the thrill of the cross, that we, exposed at our worst, can be and are accepted by God.

This doesn’t stop at the cross but goes on to the resurrection, the grand climax of the ages. Halley, the great Bible scholar, said, “The resurrection of Christ from the dead is the one most important item in the whole train of human knowledge and happenings. The grand event of the ages — the story of it has plowed through the centuries and changed the face of the earth.” Now, because He lives, we can live also! What a challenge for living! The very power that brought a crucified Christ forth to be the Redeemer and Savior of the world, lives in every follower of Him. A new, fresh experience with our Lord is ours daily, because of this plan of redemption, God’s way of bringing us back to Him for fellowship and service.

Railroads and Rockets

Nurture Lookout

Your grandfather back in the 1550s was one of the first to see the railroad. When he looked at the wheezing iron horse pulling a string of wagons on a track, he saw only a train. He may have been aed by it, may even have felt he was seeing the beginning of an era. But what he did not see was more momentous. He did not see what the railroad would do to the world — boys leaving the farms for city industrial centers created by the railroad, the opening of the West, the rise of hundreds of towns along the tracks, the rise of labor and the development of unions, the huge administrative systems, the coming of standard time and time zones so that you would know when to meet the train. Your grandfather could not see what would come following the 1850s. We cannot see what will follow the launching of Saturn V in the 1970s.

In the summer of ’69 two earthmen walked on the moon. They got there with a rocket generating 180 million horsepower on takeoff, twice the amount of power that could be generated by running all the rivers and streams of North America through one gigantic hydroelectric turbine. The fuel needed could have filled 98 railroad tank cars. The weight lifted was that of 13 Statues of Liberty. In 152 seconds the earthmen were 38 miles up and traveling 5,000 miles per hour. In six more minutes they were traveling 17,500 mph. When the rocket escaped earth’s gravity it was going 25,000 mph or five miles a second. On the drawing boards are rockets the same size but four times as powerful.

We are no better at seeing into the future than our grandfathers were. But if the railroads reshaped the world as it did, what will the rocket do? Already earth-orbiting sensor instruments are viewing the earth. In ten years, say the scientists, the following things will be done by orbiting spacecraft more efficiently than can now be done on the ground — classify soil, locate new mineral sources, make land use studies, identify crop diseases, detect forest fires, track migrating birds, make flood control surveys, and determine the depth of snow on mountains. Television broadcasts directly from orbiting spacecraft to your home without the use of ground networks in five years will erase all national communication boundaries.

The Apollo moon shot was probably the highest human achievement in interdisciplinary action. Every discipline one can name was involved and “fused” into the total project. This is one of the things to watch in the 70s, the unprecedented use of new interdisciplinary tools.

That the decade ahead will be a challenge to Christian educational strategists hardly needs saying.

By Still Waters

"The fear of man bringeth a snare" (Prov. 29:25). We will never know how many are turned aside from some noble purpose because of fear of man. Many times we value the favor of man too much. The secret of spiritual success is the fear of God which means that we value His favor, His blessing, His praise above everything else.

In Westminster Abbey there is a monument for Lord Lawrence. Only his name and date of death appear with this inscription, “He feared man so little, because he feared God so much.”

Whenever we shy away from known duty and right because we fear what someone will think, say, or do, we are not only caught in a trap which can mean death but we are also kept from doing that which would help shape the world for God.

The world is changed for God by those who do what is right regardless of the cost. Happy and honored are those who fear man little because they fear God much.

Go, labor on; ’tis not for naught;
Thy earthly loss is heav’nly gain;
Men heed thee, love thee, praise thee not;
The Master praises: what are men?

Anyone for Shortcuts?

A preacher friend of mine told me a story how he and another preacher were traveling from Scottsdale, Pa., to Harrisonburg, Va. There was a question about a storm which might hinder their arriving on time. My friend wanted to go by way of the turnpike and interstate routes, but his friend felt they would make better time cutting across country. Across the country they went. It began snowing, and the mountain roads became very slippery. Somehow, in the course of the trip, they lost the twenty miles they tried to save, and arrived a couple hours late.

Is the church spinning her wheels and struggling over mountains trying to accomplish her self-defined objectives?

Instead of faith, we use an intellectual scientific approach; instead of appropriating the Holy Spirit, we substitute organizations; instead of personal acquaintance with Jesus Christ, we promote denominational splinters; instead of obedience to the Word of God, we try the humanistic approach.

Is it any wonder that the church tends to skid at times? Maybe the interstate route of the Bible would prove to be the best route after all. Would we Mennonites dare try it?

Jesus or Barabbas?

Pilate found nothing in Jesus to substantiate the charges of the Jews that Jesus deserved to die. Looking for a way out of the thorny situation, Pilate decided to release Jesus since it was his custom to release a prisoner at Passover time anyway. However, Pilate’s proposal to release Jesus was turned down flat and the people, prompted by their leaders, called for Barabbas to be released instead.

Barabbas was a popular man even though he was guilty of crimes like robbery and murder. Barabbas was a man who stood for nationalism and liberation from the yoke of Rome. He was a man of action and was quite ready to resort to violence to accomplish his goals. His program fired the hearts of the people. Overthrow the political and economic structure and all will be well!

Jesus too was interested in change, but He had a depth of insight into the situation that Barabbas missed. Jesus knew evil was a problem. He also knew evil did not originate in Rome, but in the heart of man. Therefore, His program called not for violence but for repentance. Unfortunately, man does not like to think deeply. It is less painful to blame everything that is wrong on someone else than to face the problem of evil within oneself.

Just as Barabbas’s insight dealt only with surface externals, so the result of his violence could only offer superficialities. On the other hand, Jesus with much deeper insight into the situation is able to offer man a profound solution that gets to the heart of the matter.

Many years ago men made a choice between Barabbas and Jesus. Men are still making that same basic choice today. What shall it be, violence or repentance? — Don Nofziger

Is Preaching Out?

One of the predictions put forth by some regarding church life for the next few decades is that preaching will be out. It seems that some perspective is needed before such a statement is accepted.

First, I believe that every great time of renewal or revival was characterized by great preaching. There were, of course, other elements such as small groups which supplemented and helped give impetus to revival, but preaching to large numbers of people was emphasized, not depreciated.

So it would seem that in a day when much stress seems to be increasingly placed upon mass crowds, whether in youth rallies or to hear a vice-president speak, that preaching also has great potential. Billy Graham is still filling stadiums with larger crowds than sports events. Radical leadership usually strives to reach the microphone in one way or another. So the tone of our time is not necessarily against mass meetings or preaching to the entire congregation. A depreciation for preaching comes not because of a lack of appreciation for good preaching but because of a discontent with poor preaching.

One thing sure, people will demand that the preacher have something to say. Less and less people will attend a service in the days ahead simply out of loyalty. But I’m persuaded that when the gospel is preached in Holy Spirit power and people are fed spiritually there are enough burning hearts around to listen to such a preacher. I’m persuaded that, as important as small groups or cell groups, etc., may be, these can only supplement but not take the place of preaching.

Have We Lost the Glory?

Takashi Yamada, Mennonite pastor of Japan, was a churchman-in-residence in the theological center program of the Associated Mennonite Biblical Seminaries last fall. In his final chapel message Pastor Yamada shared some of his impressions and concerns on the North American Mennonite churches. He spoke with love and insight.

Our brother spoke of our country’s richness in things, yet deep inward groaning. He spoke of our country’s great thrust in modern science and achievements and our ambiguity and indifference in spiritual matters—seeking but not finding. He spoke of our difficult problems and how we tend to lose a simple trust in the lordship of Christ and try to solve these problems in a human way with our own wisdom and power.

In spite of our sending missionaries throughout the world, Yamada thought we tend to lose our mission in our own communities. We have lost the missionary zeal and spirit for non-Mennonites. He wondered if America needs us or if we need America.

When he spoke of the meaning of belonging to the church he mentioned something which also calls us up short. Under circumstances such as in America joining the church often may not mean much. He said, “It makes first-generation Christians in mission fields sad to see that sometimes such terms like ‘Savior,’ ‘Lord,’ ‘Salvation,’ ‘Forgiveness,’ ‘New Life in Christ,’ and ‘Commitment to Christ’ have lost their essential significance, while these words still have real meanings, even with deep emotional feeling attached, for the native Christians overseas, where missionaries from this country have been sent.”

Coming to Terms with the Volunteer

By Wilbert R. Shenk

The policy of employing persons on a short-term basis within regular mission structures overseas is a relatively new concept in missionary programming. This phenomenon is primarily a post-World War II development which has acknowledged the social responsibility of the affluent toward the dispossessed. Social idealism has fired up many sensitive Western young people. The aura that once surrounded the "missionary" has shifted in the popular mind to the "volunteer." This, then, is the era of the volunteer.

It is of intense interest to missionaries, mission boards, and the church as to the meaning, implications, and potential of this development. Several broad factors must be briefly identified to provide a context for understanding why such a movement has occurred since 1945 and to give clues why the short-term volunteer may relate or fail to relate to long-term missionary work and the new church overseas.

Changing World Mood

We are witnesses to profound change that is shaking the foundations of world society. The conflict of ideological and political systems since 1900—particularly since the installation of communism in Russia, a series of major wars, and an almost inconceivable chain of scientific and technological developments—has subjected them to new tests under great stress. The inadequacy of social, economic, and political institutions is being challenged. The intensity of unrest in this generation and the pervasiveness of criticism is an indication of the rigidity and inability of these institutions to respond in fresh ways to old and new problems.

The church also is no stranger to criticism. Because the church is organized and functions as one of many institutions in society, with no edge for being daring or offering a constant critique of society, she too is being subjected to searing questions. Missionary work is now a long-established part of church life and, therefore, faces hard questions as well.

A Look at Missionary History

The achievement of the church in extending the body of Christ into all the world is not viewed as an unqualified success by all sympathetic observers. The younger, mission-established churches are not deeply rooted into their societies. A feeling is often expressed that they are Western transplants—"cut flowers" placed on exhibit. An inauthenticity about the church saps her vitality and morale.

Another criticism of the missionary enterprise says that it has become ossified in methods. There is no longer an ability to flex in response to new demands. The derring-do of the pioneer has been replaced by a rigid insistence on continuing to follow old ways. Such uncritical reverence for the past lacks power to inspire creative enthusiasm.

In addition, Western missionaries of the past moved out from a secure position of world dominion. The gospel was not always presented without gimmickery and elements of coerciveness. The church will long suffer in the popular mind for being identified with colonialism and world conquest.

Limitations of Short-Term Personnel

In general there has been a growing awareness of the importance of a more adequately prepared and oriented missionary corps. Since the short-timer tends to be a bit younger than the person entering a long-term assignment, he will typically have less background, more limited professional experience, and less preparation for moving to an assignment in a new culture. Therefore, the need for orientation is proportionately greater for the short-term volunteer.

This must be weighed against the much shorter period of time the person will be able to contribute to the program. Some balance must be found between the need for more extensive preparation and the relatively briefer period of service.

Another limitation is that the short-term volunteer does require more structure in his assignment than a long-term person who is usually more mature and can carry greater responsibility. A very interesting analysis of this particular problem appeared in Reporter Magazine several years ago in an article written by a former Peace Corps volunteer who had served in West Africa.

The Peace Corps volunteers he had observed in West Africa who had been the most successful were those who had served in highly structured programs—in institutions such as schools and hospitals—in contrast to the volunteers who had been assigned to public health programs or community development projects. The latter were the ones who tended to be the most frustrated, the least productive, and who left the program disillusioned. Those who found the most job satisfaction were those who had had a rather clearly defined assignment where they could move right in, grab hold of the job, and carry it out.

Another aspect we have to acknowledge is that the short-term person may feel he is in a position to judge or assess a situation, whereas in fact he does not have sufficient background. He may be unrealistic about the problems being faced. I have sometimes heard a volunteer criticize some miseration colleague because he didn't move or adapt quickly enough to make changes or that he didn't give the church enough responsibility. The short-tomer was sure he had an adequate basis for evaluating the situation, when actually he didn't have knowledge of the ten or 15 years' history that may have thrown up the caution signs for the other people on the job. So there is a certain kind of unrealistic which can enter a person's judgment if he lacks a background of experience.

Another problem when short-termers are mixed with long-termers is that a kind of "pecking order" may develop. The short-term person may feel that he is a bit second-class; that he is not given quite as much respect or as much part in the decision-making process. There is a certain amount of validity to this. It is true that we have tended to not weigh as heavily the judgment of someone who is not there on a long-term basis. A built-in tension develops at that point.

Another point oftentimes is discussed is the matter of motivation. It is really very difficult to assess this one. Who does not have some ulterior motives or some secondary motives which become rather primary in wanting to serve? Some people are very candid about this—they are going into this more for what it will do for them rather than what they expect to contribute.

In fairness let it be said that this is a problem for long-term people as well. Some people need to be missionaries. Therefore, we should be careful at this point and yet it is very important that the candidate have a clear sense of response to the mandate of the gospel.

Adding a short-term program is certainly no panacea for changing the image of missions. People have been concerned about the image of missions the last 20 years and have tried to revolutionize, update, and modernize the popular image. It was hoped that by bringing in younger people as volunteers to churn up the waters a bit a new image of missions would emerge. I'm not convinced this has happened.

Strengths of the Short-term Person

What are some strengths a volunteer can bring to the program? Obviously, one is the mobility and adaptability that usually accompanies a person who serves a one-term stint. This is true geographically, socially, and economically. We hear repeatedly the testimony of young people who have been able to move in, make friends, adapt, and be accepted in the community in a very unusual way. In some cases being single has facilitated adaptation.

Second, there is the strength of the inquiring mind. The new person, whether he is a short-term volunteer or a first-term missionary, does not have some of the old hang ups and the history that goes with long experience. He is freer to test new assumptions, to experiment, to make mistakes and fail, to challenge the status quo. This is something we need and something we should value.

Third, we have to remember that today everyone is much more concerned for the condition of the world socially, economically, and politically. This has had a very direct impact on the attitude of young people. They are concerned for injustices, poverty, and other social ills. This sensitivity to the world is a strength the Christian must have.

Closely related to this is the matter of idealism. It is too easy to say that people today are idealistic and previous generations were not. That's overstating the case for this generation. But remember that this present generation of young people has known only affluence. They have not really known firsthand the horrors of the Second World War. They are people who have grown up in a time when economic power was readily available. This has had a very important impact on our entire psychological outlook. There is a certain kind of self-confidence and assuredness that one can go out and change the world very quickly. Idealism based on this kind of understanding is not adequate. Idealism built on such a foundation must be tempered by the hard experiences of the world as it is.

One more strength of the short-term person is the fact that he can be a kind of "deprofessionalized" witness. One of the stigmas attached to the career missionary is that he is a professional religious propagandist. He is a paid preacher. The short-tomer can escape being so labeled. It is never ideal for the church to be looked at as a kind of professional religious institution. It ought to be much more vital, much more real than that.

Relating Short-Term to Long-Term

Mennonite Central Committee recently calculated that the average age of all volunteers currently in MCC service is 26 1/2 years. In 1920 the average age was 26. This is only to say that volunteers typically are of a younger age. In the long-term program, of course, the average age of long-term staff will be considerably higher. This can create a kind of tension between the two groups. Not only because the short-tomer is frequently reminded of his inexperiences, but also because of the difference in outlook and expectations. It is very important both for the short-term person and for the long-term missionary to be aware of the problem.

Second, in a program which demands continuity, someone has to provide that continuity. A responsible program cannot be built on the basis of rapid personnel turnover every two or three years. This obviously is provided by the long-term or career person. And so the short-term volunteer has to fit into that kind of program. He has to work with a long-term person as his supervisor. At this point the greatest challenge goes to the long-term person who provides this kind of leadership. If he is worthy of giving supervisory leadership, he will be of a generous spirit and have a sense of humor and enthusiasm. Such a leader will inspire the volunteer by his own joy and vision in serving.

Another factor that must be taken seriously is that long-term people can be unrealistic in their expectations and demands of a short-term person. This happens particularly in cases of churches or missions without previous experience with short-term individuals. By overloading a newcomer with responsibility or work, he can quickly become frustrated and disillusioned.

What can be done to make short-term service more meaningful for the volunteer? Short-term assignments within the

Gospel Herald, March 17, 1970
One of the benefits arising from the short-term program is that a few new strategies have developed. One of these is the self-supporting missionary overseas. MCC now has over 150 teachers in Africa and the program is finally getting to the point of being almost self-supporting. There are also a number of persons serving with Mennonite Board of Missions who are fully self-supporting. So it can be done. This new venture in self-supporting service would likely not have happened without this period of preparation over the years.

Another idea which has not yet really been tested but which was placed in focus by John Howard Yoder's pamphlet, "As You Go," is the possibility of migration. This was only looked at seriously as a possible missionary strategy after we had sent out volunteers over a period of time.

Having sent as many people as we have overseas and into VS assignments stateside I am sure has had a considerable impact on the church in North America. Clearly our church has become internationalized in its outlook in the last generation in a new way. It certainly has been to a large extent due to the fact that every congregation by now has had or has someone in it with a record of service.

I am convinced we must discover how to better utilize the short-term person so that his service has integrity and meaning and at the same time it complements and supplements what is being attempted on a long-term basis. In a period when the missionary vision seems increasingly blurred, this innovation should open the way for young people to experience vital involvement in witness and service for Christ.

Our Sons and Daughters

By Laban Peachey

Our first grader came home last week greatly pleased with her newest rhyme:

I (ce) scream
You scream
We all scream
For ice scream

Her satisfaction was not diminished when I told her I learned the same jingle when I was a child. In fact, I could enjoy her discovery because it recalled when I first heard it.

So it is — not only with first grade discoveries — but all discoveries. As parents and adults we pass on to our sons and daughters what we have learned. This happens directly through teaching at home, church, and the curriculum in our schools. Much is passed on to our children indirectly, in many ways that we ourselves don’t think of, where they learn about life from living with parents.

Learning always includes information or subject matter. For example, "I (ce) scream. You scream," etc., are lines that can be learned by rote memory. The enjoyment of repeating the lines, the fun and relationships with family, friends, and the pun on words represent the meaning side of learning.

Our American educational system, elementary through college, tends to focus on content or subject matter, rather than on meanings and applications of subject matter. Biology, philosophy, Bible knowledge, and literature are important. Equally important are the human values, the spiritual implications, and the life meanings that emerge from these academic subjects.

Our present tempo of life, the increased amount of information and knowledge that is available, the exposure of our children to television — these and other influences require that our methods of education be adapted to fit the many influences shaping the lives of our sons and daughters. Our educational programs must become more concerned with the meanings of what we teach, along with the subject matter. The development of values and life goals in harmony with demands of the gospel can take place best in living interaction with teachers who live by such values. The purpose of education needs to focus on the harmonious development of the total person toward the model of humanity revealed in the teachings and actions of Jesus of Nazareth.

When the student reaches college age, it is important that his educational experience recognize his needs as a young adult and help him discover meaningful self-identity and such values and skills for living which will enable him to mature as a Christian. He will need to find constructive ways to relate to God, to other individuals, with the people of God, the material environment, and to society. With the college student’s exploration of knowledge there is a tendency toward fragmentation. He needs help in discovering how the many fragments fit together to make a whole.

Our church related institutions should help students to discover and apply the free church heritage, making creative applications of this heritage in personal life and society.

Hesston College is one of many attempts in our church to provide a suitable educational experience for our sons and daughters in the decade of the 70s. Because of what we see happening to students today, we are moving into the new decade with faith, courage, and enthusiasm. We recognize God’s leading in the lives of our faculty, the interest of our churches, and the experiences of our students.

Personal and spiritual growth in students, changed lives, and the continuing presence of God’s Spirit are some of the ways we can use to measure the quality of our work.
HESSTON COLLEGE

Faces the challenge of the seventies with faith and enthusiasm

Hesston College faces the challenge of the seventies with faith and enthusiasm. It continues to be vitally related to the church and to be counseled by its heritage; its educational patterns change to keep abreast of the needs of the world.

The sustaining purpose of the college is to lead young people into meaningful self-identity and the development of values and skills for living which will enable them to mature as Christians and to find constructive ways to relate to God, to other individuals, to the people of God, and to society.

An exciting new curriculum designed for life in the seventies accents the person-centered aspect of education. A new music building will provide a central facility for the music department.

How a student learns — the process he goes through in the experience of learning — is quite as important as what he learns.

Students responded enthusiastically to experience-centered opportunities for learning in the interterm — spending a month in Mexico, living and learning on an Indian reservation in Arizona, or studying urban sociology in cities like St. Louis and Wichita, and camping in the Rockies. This puts a practical element into learning.

All of this is being done at less than average cost of tuition, room, and board.

Involvement

By Marlene Daehlin as told to Levi Keidel

It was late at night. I, a white woman, was at a community center operated by "black militants" on Minneapolis' near north side. A strange black woman caught me by the arm and said, "I want to show you something."

I could see she had been crying and was unsteady on her feet. But by this time I had begun to see people in terms of their needs. She pulled me into a back room and showed me open sores which appeared to be the results of advanced syphilis.

"You've got to go to the hospital," I said.

"I can't. They'll kill me there."

"But the hospital can help you."

"All they think of is how to care for whites. They'll kill me there."

For twenty minutes, between her sobbing from fear and excruciating pain, I talked. Center leaders refused to permit me to go with her because of her bad reputation. But I felt so deeply for her that I went with her. She literally opened her soul to me, and I felt so powerless to help. Finally, she agreed to allow a man she knew to take her to the hospital. She died there about ten days later.

It hasn't been easy to establish this kind of identity with the black community. It all began very unexpectedly. What almost always is a horrible nightmare has brought us great blessing. It was a serious automobile accident.

Both cars were demolished. While recuperating in a hospital, my husband, Ted, and I came to the conclusion that God must have had a very special purpose in allowing us to live.

Had we really been using our lives as He wanted us to? Three years earlier we had adopted a mixed-blood Negro child. Had we done our best to help him find an identity in the world in which he would have to live? If we so risk our lives every time we get into a car to go somewhere, why shouldn't we be willing to risk our lives to do something really worthwhile?

At that point Ted and I were able to abandon ourselves without fear to whatever purpose God might have for us. And in really resolving the death problem, we were enabled by His Spirit to do things which we'd never dared do before.

Then Martin Luther King, Jr., was assassinated. Almost everybody was distressed. People in the churches were saying, "What can we do? How can we help?" Ted and I shared their feelings. We said, "If there is an opening for us to do something, we're going to do it."

Then it came. The Way Community Center on the city's near north side ministers to the more revolutionary type of blacks. Few other centers will admit these so-called "hard-core troublemakers." Way Center's leaders, who are referred to as "black militants," sent an invitation to the white community. "If you really want to do something, are you willing to give your lives?" they asked. "If so, we will meet with you."

This came as kind of a shock. People felt crusaderish, but weren't sure they wanted to go quite this far. Leaders at the Center set up dates for training sessions. About 300 whites showed up. Ted and I were among them.

Soon the group began to dwindle. They couldn't take sitting and waiting for an hour before the training sessions began and all that went with it. But some of us began to see that there was a lot to learn in this waiting thing. We began to absorb what was going on around us: the boisterous noise, the vindictive insults, the four-letter-word ghetto language, the nauseating stench of uncollected garbage, the frightening darkness, and intolerable oppression of night in the ghetto.

We learned that insults hurled at us were not meant to be personal. Blacks were lashing out against a system and a color — actually the kind of whiteness that had put them where they are. The ghetto language was shocking. But we discovered that by long use, these words had been drained of much of their ugly connotations, and had become simply their means of communication. It had become so much a part of them that knocking their language was taken as a personal attack against them.

Of the original 300, 30 of us determined to stick it out. They named us the "Soul Force."

The world we were introduced to at weekly training sessions was so different we couldn't believe it. When it came time for us to get our assignments, we understood why they had asked us if we were willing to give our lives. We were to stand watch on street corners during the late night and early morning hours when there is the greatest likelihood of violence. We were to report potential troublemakers by radio to Center headquarters, in an effort to rout them out of the ghetto area. Troublemakers don't like people who break up their plans. Because we could be shot at, some called our task "Operation Sitting Duck."

While we were quite ignorant about all that was going on... around us, we did want to show the blacks that we were with them. I developed a warm friendship with Eunice, a woman in her forties. To help better identify with her, I made their style of clothing and dressed like she did — in a bright-striped, long, and wide-legged one-piece jump suit and sandals. Later I wore a contemporary cross pendant with the word LIFE written across it as a sort of silent witness.

We were given black armbands with “Way Soul Force” imprinted in white. Each watch team was given a small transceiver. It was a little black box with a long antenna, and had a long strap so that we could carry it slung over the shoulder. Each team was given a different code number which had to be used if we wanted to contact Way Center headquarters.

Because of Ted’s first-aid training, he was given a Red Cross armband and was always stationed in front of Way Center to be on instant call. Each of us white women was assigned to a very stalwart man, and each team of two was assigned its street corner. Crisscrossing the area all night long was a Black Patrol of young men from the ghetto area keeping an eye on the corner teams, and tuned in on our wavelength. If there was threat or danger to any of us, they would come immediately to help us.

Then I discovered that we were not standing guard against troublemakers from within the ghetto community; most disturbances were provoked by intruders from the outside; white men from the suburbs coming into the ghetto to look for black flesh; suburban teenagers racing in their cars down the streets shooting at Negro kids for kicks; or the kind of policeman who seems to hunt an occasion to be brutal.

On the street corner we recorded the license number of every car coming into the area more than once. When that number appeared several times, we would turn the transceiver volume up high and broadcast this number. Oftentimes when they heard their license number reported they would turn tail and run.

Incidents greatly decreased on nights when the Soul Force was on duty. But violence and attacking the black community greatly increased on our off-duty nights. This indicated that outsiders had learned our schedule, and were planning their strategy accordingly.

So we would schedule solid night-duty over a whole weekend. Then trouble would erupt just hours before or after we regularly were on duty. So we staggered our hours to keep troublemakers off guard. Keeping irregular night schedules was rough, particularly for the white men on the Soul Force like Ted, who had their regular daytime jobs.

It took us awhile to absorb the reality of this whole thing. At first I thought the blacks were being overdramatic in their reaction to danger. One night there was gunfire. A shot came so close I heard the zing of the bullet. My teammate threw me against the wall and said, “Are you dumb? It ain’t fun to be shot at.” Another night Eunice grabbed me and pulled me down behind a car. The man driving by had made a slight move. Moments later the Black Patrol reported the police were looking for this man. The ghetto Negro has a sixth sense for danger which triggers a reflex of action for his survival. Soon I came to respect it.

Then came a traumatic experience which showed me that they really cared about me. Black leaders would often ask us to take young people home between 11:00 p.m. and morning. About 1:00 a.m. I was asked to take a girl to south Minneapolis. I had never driven alone in the city at night up to that time. As I went, I tried to make mental note of landmarks so I could find my way back again.

I started to return the same way, and hit a one-way street. In trying to bypass it, I ended up on the freeway and had no idea where I was. You don’t even stop at a gas station to ask directions that time of night.

Then I thought, “This is no problem; I have my transceiver. I’ll pull off the road and radio Way Center for directions.” I did, but couldn’t get my signal through for anything.

I heard the girl at headquarters checking everybody on patrol for my whereabouts. It was as if the whole group were in the car talking about how they were going to find me. I felt so helpless. Finally I heard the girl say, “I’ve checked all points, and can’t find her.”

I pulled onto the road and drove again, praying like everything. Finally, I mustered courage to stop at a gas station where there were some young people standing. When I got back to headquarters, the whole black force turned out to welcome me like I had returned from the dead.

When blacks showed such attitudes of caring for us, there was little condemnatory attitude left among the members of the Soul Force. We felt that by quiet love we could give these people something they were looking for, and something that would help them get out of this jungle. And we of the Soul Force who are deeply committed Christians knew that the most powerful force to help them was the love of Jesus.

But we also knew that we could talk Jesus with them until we were blue in the face, but it wouldn’t mean a thing unless they had first seen Him in our actions. And now, having risked their lives with us, and having been convinced of our sincerity, they began to ask questions. It happened again and again. Someone would ask me what the special thing was that I had in my life.

A 12-year-old girl who had spent most of her life in and out of reformatories asked me, “Do you go to church or sumpin’?”

“Yes.”

“How can you believe in a God you can’t see?”

“You can see Him in people who love Him.”

Later she came back to me and said, “I’ve been thinking a lot about what you said. I know what you mean now.”

One young man at the Center had grown up in Watts. Anytime a white person entered his presence, he showed an ugly mixture of fear and hate. I made it a point to say “Hi” to him every time I saw him, but he always replied with a stony glare.

I was determined to get through to this young man. Other times when I would pray to God for opportunity to reach someone, I’d find opportunities galore. But this man was a special problem. Finally, one evening when I was ready to go to the Center, I said, “God, this has got to be the night.
You've got to show me a way to get through to him."

I was in charge of the radio at the Center that night. When I arrived I smiled and greeted him by name. I got the same old stare. A little later he came, and for the first time said something to me.

"Where's my list?" he asked gruffly.

This was the roster list of those who were standing watch on the corners that night. The lady before me had forgotten to tell me about it. After a scrambling search, I said, "I'm sorry, but I just don't have it."

"You'd better get it," he said threateningly.

Afterward I found it, and laid it out for him; but he never did pick it up. Later that evening, when my replacement had come, I was in a back room watching kids play Ping-Pong. He came in with a sandwich, said to me, "Are you hungry?" stuffed the sandwich into my hand, and walked on. I looked at the sandwich unbelievingly and choked up.

One day I was working in the home of a young militant leader. I was on a ladder, painting a mural on their kitchen wall. His wife was watching me. We had gotten into intimate conversation. Finally she said, "I didn't know what it meant before, but now I know what this being Christlike means. It means the willingness to even lay down your life for another."

The Cross-Bearer  By Joyce Nelson

If anyone wants to be a follower of Mine, let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow Me. — Matthew 16:24, Living Gospels

Suffer?
I do not want to, Lord.
I have had it too good, too long.
And I like it, Lord.
I really like it.

Suffer?
Must I really, Lord?
My bed is big, it has a nice fat pillow.
Really, Lord, suffer?
I cannot, not now.

Suffer?
You can not mean it, Lord.
It seems You ask too much, too soon.
Suffer?
I do not want to, Lord.
I have forgotten how.
For I am nailed to the soft pillow of the American dream;
And I prefer suffocation to crucifixion.
I shall have it.
As You listen to the dying gasp of my smothered spirit,
Weep for me.
There are a few things worse than to carry a cross.
One is to be dying and no longer care.

VS Feels the Draft

By Roger Egli

Would fellows enter Voluntary Service if it weren't for Selective Service? I had never considered this question until I was actually in VS orientation, mainly because I didn't have a 1-O classification and I came of my own accord. Since then I've discovered, however, that the Relief and Service Office does depend on Uncle Sam more than it cares to admit.

I'm not here to argue for or refute the often-heard claim that fellows who go into VS are more dedicated than those in CPS. I feel that the dedication that carries most fellows into VS would be there even if Selective Service were not. Nevertheless, there might be a resulting slight drop in the number of male volunteers. This might be compensated by an increase in VS publicity and personal appeals to specialized audiences of potential volunteers over a wider age span.

The length of the assignment is a major consideration here. When a girl enters VS she will usually sign up for one year. How many single girls are presently in the VS program under Mennonite Board of Missions for two years? (13; actually not a bad percentage — ed.) On the other hand, might more fellows consider VS if Selective Service weren't a factor and one could choose the exact length of time he wanted to serve?

It's been suggested in a recent Gospel Herald article that perhaps the girls in the Mennonite Church are more committed to service than the fellows. Again I would refer to the number of girls who choose to serve for more than one year.

Let's assume that the VS office required fellows without active duty classifications — such as those who are 4-F and others such as Canadians — to serve for two years or else not at all. Would the number of fellows drop for sure? And if this were to happen, how many girls would choose VS if there were just a handful of fellows in the program?

Like it or not, Selective Service is a major factor for fellows serving two-year assignments. But it does not have to be the only reason.

General Douglas MacArthur, recognizing a spiritual awakening as imperative, said, as quoted by Moody Monthly: "History fails to record a single precedent in which nations subject to moral decay have not passed into political and economic decline. There has been either a spiritual awakening to overcome the moral lapse, or a progressive deterioration leading to ultimate national disaster." — Peniel Friends Church
Faith Which Worketh By Love

By Perry Nelson Spotloe

I recognized the man sitting at the counter in the restaurant as one with whom I had counseled when he came forward to receive Christ in an evangelistic service a few weeks before. I asked the waitress to invite him to my table. She picked up his coffee and escorted him over.

He appeared glad to see me again. When I inquired about his progress since he had found the Lord, he replied that he wasn't doing so well. He had been attending church, but had found no edifying spiritual fellowship. Added to this was the negative attitude of his wife toward his religion.

"She didn't think much of it in the first place," he said, "but she's more bitter than ever now, because I quit my job on account of it. I worked for a tobacco firm, and I felt that such a connection negated my testimony as a Christian. When I started to follow Christ, I made a clean break with every questionable association. Now I've been out of work for awhile, and we're finding the going rough. We can't even pay our rent or utility bills, and none of my friends will lend me money."

His voice broke. Slowly he raised his head, but the look of defeat and dejection I anticipated was missing from his countenance. With tears of joy in his eyes, he looked past me, as if almost unaware of my presence. "My only regret is what I've done to my wife," he spoke softly. "I don't understand the reason for the situation I'm in, but I wouldn't exchange the salvation of my Lord Jesus Christ for this world multiplied by a million."

While he had been speaking, I had been turning over in my mind the Scripture I would use to encourage him. One passage was Matthew 19:29, where Jesus said: "And every one that hath forsaken houses, or brethren . . . or lands, for my name's sake, shall receive an hundredfold. . . ."

Another was Matthew 6:33, another, Philippians 4:19. Oh, yes, I knew how to dispense Scriptures. I had not spent time in daily study of God's Word for nothing. I knew what promises to apply in this situation.

So did the Apostle James. "If a brother or sister be naked, and destitute of daily food, and one of you say unto them, Depart in peace . . . notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body; what doth it profit" (Jas. 2:15, 16)?

God could indeed deliver this good brother. He could provide him with a job; He could even save the wife, and I intended to pray to this end. But before doing so, I must invest myself in this need. Passive concern would bind on earth what I wanted loosed in heaven. I must step into the line of fire by shelling out the money this man needed to pay his immediate bills . . . then I would pray.

Satan was there with his fiery darts of temptation. "Why should this man be my responsibility? I didn't even know him. Besides, he had no means of income, and could not repay a loan, even if I could afford to make it."

This was a strong argument, but Luke had a better one: "But when thou makest a feast, call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind . . . for they cannot recompense thee" (Lk. 14:13, 14).

I asked him how much money he needed, wrote a check for it, read to him from my pocket Testament the Scriptures I had in mind, picked up the check for his lunch, promised to pray for him, and left.

I received a letter six weeks later, containing a check for the amount I had advanced him. It was from another city where he had been offered a job the day after we had met in the restaurant. He is making more money than he ever did in his life. His wife has been saved, and they are active in a Spirit-filled church.

How Foolish Can You Get?

The poet has written, "To err is human." Every one of us can verify that statement!

Some mistakes we make simply because we are not capable — our incapability does not erase the mistakes, but somehow we don't feel too badly about it.

Other failures come to us because we are thoughtless or a bit careless — we have more difficulty in forgiving ourselves in times like these.

But what should really hurt is when we know better and still don't. What could be more foolish than for a sick man to wait until he is well to go to see the doctor for medicine? Or, as Jesus put it, neither does a man wait until his personal life is good enough so that he can come to God and the church!

"Jesus . . . saith unto them, They that are whole have no need of the physician, but they that are sick: I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance" (Mk. 2:17).

Open Reply Letter

Paul Lederach
Scottdale, Pa. 15683

Dear Brother Paul:

This letter responds to yours addressed to me a few weeks ago. It was indeed a very disturbing letter in that you raised the question as to whether the Mennonite Church might be bankrupt and yet not know it. This was in reference to the financial situation as revealed in our budgets of the various church organizations.

However, your letter really presented nothing new to me in the situation from which I view it, and I do believe that your proposal is a good step toward a solution. I am ready to call the proposed meeting as you had suggested if I can get the cooperation. However, I would like to speak to some of the concerns you raised as I see them from my perspective.

First of all, I think the Mennonite Church may tend to overextend itself in a number of areas. We are a small denomination. We have relatively small congregations. Our average-size congregation in the Mennonite Church is much smaller than the average of most denominations. For instance, we have about twice the number of congregations in proportion to our membership as does the General Conference Mennonite Church. This has serious implications for us in our denominational programs. Proportionally, it requires a much greater portion of our giving dollars to operate and maintain our congregations than it would for the average denomination. However, that touches another very sensitive point. Because we have been trying to get around this last-mentioned problem, we are simply asking the local pastor and his family to pay a major portion of the cost of operating the local congregation. We have asked many of our ministers to give marginal time to the work of the church while carrying another major workload. In some cases we have asked men to live on poverty income.

Pardon me, Paul, but you have hit upon a subject which is of grave concern to me. I served for 22 years in pastorates in the Mennonite Church. These were the best of my years. I know whereof you speak when you talk about the pitiful situation of underpaid pastors. I moved from the pastorate into the district work, and then again from the district into general. I did so largely because I believed so deeply that problems in this area need the attention of the church. I found myself limited in trying to do much about it while working from the pastoral perspective.

As I moved into the responsibility of Executive Secretary of Mennonite General Conference, I told some of my colleagues regarding this problem, in the words of Abraham Lincoln as he was said to have early in life faced the slave question, "If I ever get a chance to hit that problem, I'll hit it hard." It is becoming increasingly difficult to secure church workers.

Our church agencies keep pressuring the pastors to secure financial support from their congregations for the churchwide ministries. It is no less difficult to secure funds for the local church program than it is for the denomination or the district. I know whereof I speak because I have served on all three levels. Therefore, I am saying, Paul, that if we are going to work at this problem we are going to have to work at it on all levels at the same time. We are going to have to join hands in demanding more consideration for the local congregational leadership. We can no longer ignore this phase of the kingdom work in our promotion.

When I first read your letter, Paul, I had no thought of giving such an extensive reply. But since you addressed yourself to me in an open letter, I take the occasion to reply in the same form. There are many other related problems suggested by your letter such as the evidences of rugged individualism in the midst of a group which confesses to be a brotherhood church. Then there is the problem of the construction of monumental buildings during this time of affluence that may become white elephants to the next generation.

Well, maybe I have said enough for now, and I had better come across the hall and discuss the matters with you at greater length. I am planning to call this meeting of executives of our various organizations and institutions, with a good sampling of pastors and laymen from across the church. I am not sure who is going to finance their expense accounts. Let's see how great the interest might really be.

Yours for Christ and the Church,

Howard J. Zehr

Religion — A Load or a Lift?

Is your religion a load or a lift? Do you carry it around on a chain or does it carry you through the day? This Easter season we should realize again the possibility of a fresh encounter with God for every man.

In the Garden of Eden there was God and man — man whom God had put there. Theirs was a person-to-person relationship — God to man. But man, Adam, wasn't satisfied. He wrestled — and although he was living with God, he wanted to be God. So he acted accordingly. He denied himself the God-man relationship. He left the garden because he had to. He hit the road. To this day man keeps going down that lonesome road, farther and farther from God, getting nowhere. This is every man's experience. We know Genesis one is true because of ourselves.

Then Jesus came.

Into another garden west of Eden, He also wrestled with God. But He answered differently from Adam by saying, "Not my will, but thine." So He hit the road, but went up to a cross. He knew His direction when He submitted to God.

The Christian who truly accepts Calvary and the resurrection follows the same direction Christ knew — "Not my will, but thine, be done." Too often we try to bridge the chasm caused by our wills against His will, but in trying for an Eden we produce a jungle. Every teacher wishes for that perfect day. Every Christian longs for Paradise. However, our world is between Eden and that other Gethsemane. We see all about us ritual and religious rigor. But the new reality for the road runner comes in meeting Christ west of Eden at the foot of the cross. This reality brings man the lift he needs. For Christ Himself said, "And I, if I be lifted up . . . will draw all men unto me" (Jn. 12:32). God not only saves and bears, but carries His followers. What a lift!
—Ruth Rudy.

The teacher asked a class, discussing the North American Indian, if anyone could tell what the leaders of the tribes were called.

"Chiefs," said a little girl.

"Correct," said the teacher. "And what were the women called?"

A sharp little lad answered promptly, "Mischief."

A first-grader came home from school one day and announced excitedly, "They've got a magic record player at our school."

"A magic record player?" asked his puzzled mother.

"Yes," explained the boy. "You don't have to plug it into the electricity. You don't even need electricity to make it play. All you do is wind up a crank!"

Wit and Wisdom

Teacher: "What is the difference between results and consequences?"

Bright Pupil: "Results are what you expect; consequences are what you get."

In a Kansas supermarket: "If you think the price of beef is high, cigarettes are $6.59 a pound."

Teacher: "We'll have to give little Charlie an aptitude test."

Mother: "Won't do any good. He's apt to do most anything."

No matter how small your lot in life, there's enough room on it for a service station.

Shaping Souls

Before teachers or preachers have any opportunity to mold the personalities of children, the mother has already largely determined the pattern of character her children will become. Through the stories she tells them, the guidance she gives them, she is shaping their souls. The principles needed in the training of youth do not change with the passing centuries. The same old Christian ideals rightly lived and taught produce the same fruits. The home and the church are still the hope of the nation and the Christian mother sees to it that her child is at home in the house of God.

The Widow's Mite

The young widow had little money, so she gave cleaning cloths to the church.

It was her custom to gather old sheets, pillowcases, and towels. She laundered them, hemmed the good parts, and tied them into neat easy-to-store-and-handle bundles.

The pastor, the janitor, the ladies on committees, the Sunday school teachers came to rely on these cloths, for they made work in the church easier.

A gift of great value!

The "Leisure revolution" has already subverted American institutions to the point that profound changes in society are inescapable, a church-sponsored conference on leisure was told in St. Paul.

Sebastian de Grazia, a professor of political science at Rutgers University, said leisure is an important hidden factor in producing unrest among today's youth. The conference was sponsored by the Minnesota Council of Churches, in conjunction with the U.S. Extension Service and the University of Minnesota, St. Paul.

While advertisers gloat over statistics that seem to show everyone has more time and money, Dr. de Grazia said, the American belief in the importance of work has been undermined among the present generation of youth who are the real "leisure industry" consumers, he said. "It's asking for trouble to keep a large number of post-puberty youth in a dependent status," Dr. de Grazia said.

"The mark of independence and taking your place in our society has always been the job. After puberty, youth become restless to take their place. When you spread out the interval of uncertainty about what their place will be, you find profound discontent arises.

An upsurge of evangelical Christianity is taking place in the Soviet Union, according to Sergei Timchenko, first vice-president of the All-Union Council of Evangelical Christians-Baptists.

Mr. Timchenko, pastor of a Moscow Baptist congregation, said his church baptized 182 persons in 1969 and that 13,000 baptisms were recorded by the All-Union Council.

The Russian Baptist leader spoke at the headquarters of the Southern Baptist Foreign Mission Board. He was accompanied by Ilia Orlove and Mrs. Klaudia Pillipuk, both officials of the All-Union Council, and came here under the auspices of the Baptist World Alliance.

Mr. Timchenko reported 13 newly registered Baptist congregations in Moscow, each with 2,000 to 3,000 members. But only his church has its own building, he said.

Paul points out in Ephesians that a mark of spiritual maturity is not to be "tossed to and fro and carried about with every wind of doctrine."

Culbert G. Rutember, well-known Baptist leader, in his presidential address, stated that it is "tragically that theology in the twentieth century, lacking the controls of empirical verification, gives the impression of having the stagers. It lurches from one fad to another, here moving to the left, then moving to the right. . . . Its fickle heart seems more bent on novelty than fidelity, on conformity rather than conviction."

Rutember went on to say "Professor Butler of Perkins School of Theology has accused the more avant-garde theologians of the 60s of playing the adolescent game of 'I can say more shocking things than you.' I like to label them theological short order cooks who will serve up a justification of anything from adultery to violence while you wait." As the absence of a doctor's degree in theology does not prove one is spiritually immature so the presence of a doctor's degree does not prove one is spiritually mature. But being carried about by every wind of doctrine does illustrate spiritual immaturity.

The penalty man pays for polluting his environment has been documented over and over. Fish are killed by the drain-off of pesticides used to kill crop insects. Familiar birds are disappearing, poisoned by the chemicals in the insects they eat. The air a Chicagoan breathes in a single day contains as much pollution as he'd get from two packs of cigarettes.

Now, from a scientist at a meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, comes another warning. It appears that man is creating a major change in his weather. Air pollution is causing the skies to become cloudier, and seems to be making the climate colder. The sun will be seen less and less. A clear blue sky may, in time, be a rarity.

Children exposed to tobacco smoke have almost twice as much respiratory illness as do children in nonsmoking families, according to a survey of 727 families conducted by Dr. Paul Cameron of Wayne State University, Detroit. "We also were able to correlate the amount of sickness with the amount of smoke in the household. The more smoke, the more respiratory illness," he said in an interview.

A shutdown of classes at Asbury College, resulting from a "marathon revival" started by students, continued into its third day with no end in sight as students and faculty continued their "testimony" for Christ.

The demonstration started spontaneously (Feb. 2) at a morning chapel service of the college and its sister institution, Asbury Theological Seminary.

It grew to include most of the 1,000 students at the nonsectarian school and many townspeople. The 1,500-seat Hughes Auditorium was almost filled at times.

The demonstration of faith started at a regular morning chapel session "as students stood up in their seats and spoke for Christ," Mrs. Reynolds reported. It just "grew and grew" and the townspeople joined in, she said.

Wilmore, the college town, is a tiny rural hamlet south of Lexington, Ky.

Spur-of-the-moment revivals are not unusual at Asbury, which started with a four-room building with five teachers in 1890. In 1958, a revival at the same college lasted three days, and one in 1950 continued from Feb. 23 to March 2.

The college and the seminary have turned out hundreds of Methodist ministers and missionaries.

Father Daniel Egan, "the junkie priest" from New York, has blamed television as a major reason for the rising rate of drug addiction among modern youth.

"The television-oriented kid is a drug-oriented kid," Father Egan told an audience of parents and high school students. "All they see on TV is that there is a drug for everyone."

He warned that Canada would make a grave error by legalizing the sale of marijuana, as advocated by some groups. Social problems created by its use would become more serious, he said.

In an interview several years ago, the gentle-mannered Graymoor priest noted that "the average addict gets hooked emotionally before he gets hooked physically. . . . The mere fact that this particular person would even look for the initial kick or run the risk of taking pot (marijuana) . . . shows an emotional disposition to addiction."

Dr. Pennybacker said Graham evangelism represents biblical "heresy" because it is too concerned with man "saving his own soul."

The Christianity Today editorial said Dr. Pennybacker deserves credit for "recognizing that there is such a thing as heresy." But it argued that evangelical views of salvation are not "egocentric" or based on selfish attempts to save one's soul.

The Disciples clergyman, of a Shaker Heights, Ohio, congregation, was challenged to demonstrate "positively the kind of evangelism that he considers biblically orthodox."
General Council Assesses Situation

Feb. 24 and 25 again marked two historic days in the life of the Mennonite Church. The General Council of Mennonite General Conference was opened with an address by Moderator John Drescher, in which he called upon the council members to ponder concerns of the church in light of the experiences of the sixties and the predictions of the seventies. This message will be printed in a later issue of the Gospel Herald.

Thirty-three of the 35 council members were present with several additional visitors. The council is constituted by representatives from each of our district conferences, from each of the three Boards, and from each of the committees of Mennonite General Conference.

Serious thought was given to ways and means of interpreting the church’s program to the constituency. It was realized that members need to be informed of the church’s activities and ways by which they may participate.

Considerable time was spent in reflecting upon the experience of the conference at Turner and evaluating its actions. District conferences reported their specific conference concerns. There was meaningful sharing. Special appreciation was expressed to the Publication Board and Publishing House for their genuine efforts to serve the brotherhood.

Reports were given on developing plans for the Mennonite World Conference to be held in 1972 in Brazil to which the Mennonite Church is invited to send 17 delegates. Likewise, report was made of the All-Mennonite North American Bible Congress planned for July 16-19 in Winnipeg to which we are invited to send 150 delegates. Delegates will be channelled through the district conferences.

More detailed plans were announced for the joint meeting of the three major Boards of the church and Mennonite General Conference delegates to review the proposed revisions for church structure. This meeting is to be held Oct. 20-22 in the Yellow Creek Church near Goshen, Ind.

Decision was made to hold an abbreviated session of Mennonite General Conference approximately a day and a half, in connection with the Constitutional Convention to be held in Ontario in August 1971.

Action was taken to accept the invitation of the South Central Conference to hold the 1972 general meeting in their conference area.

Committees and Boards reported their activities and projected plans. They were given further counsel and direction for their respective programs.

The sessions were chaired by Moderator John Drescher and Assistant A. Don Augsburger.

International Youth Team to Come

The Youth Ministries Office, Salunga, Pa., is working on plans for an International Youth Team which will visit youth groups and VS units related to Lancaster Conference July 16 to September 6. The team of six persons will be representative of various continents and cultural groups: Asia, Africa, Latin America, Puerto Rican New York, Black Florida, and White Pennsylvania Dutch. They will spend July 11-16 together in orientation to become acquainted and to prepare for their program.

Youth Looks at Christian Citizenship

A new venture in the church's ministry with youth occurred during the week of Feb. 15-21, 1970.

A Christian Citizenship Seminar sponsored jointly by the youth offices of the Mennonite Church and the General Conference Mennonite Church and the peace secretaries of the two Mennonite bodies convened in Washington, D.C., Ottawa, Ontario, and New York City.

From Sunday, Feb. 15, to Wednesday, Feb. 18, a group of a dozen Canadian Mennonite young people gathered in Ottawa to take a look firsthand at government-related issues and to discover together the Christian's responsibility in thinking about and speaking to those issues. At the same time, a group of approximately 40 Mennonite young people and several adults from the United States was meeting in Washington, D.C., for the same purpose.

Both groups were taking a look at the foreign policies of their nations and domestic policies relating to welfare programs, treatment of the Canadian Indian, and conscription in the United States. The young people visited legislative sessions of the respective governments and heard from both appointed and elected officials. Participants discussed together the biblical Christian response to the issues considered.

On Wednesday evening the two groups from Ottawa and Washington convened together in New York City for an experience in international understanding at the Church Center for the United Nations. Included here were a tour of the United Nations headquarters, visits with officials representing a number of nations to the U.N., and participation in a simulation game designed to deepen sensitivity to the economic problems faced by developing nations in the world. John Lapp from the MCC Peace Section led the group in a discussion of the implications of their experience.

This first seminar was held as a pilot project to determine the feasibility of conducting future seminars for high school juniors and seniors on a broader scale.

In evaluating the experience the 50 young people who participated were unanimously enthusiastic about the seminar.

Costs for the seminar were met largely by a $50 registration fee paid by each participant and a $2,500 grant for travel awarded by the Schowalter Foundation, Newton, Kansas.

Mennonite resource leaders for the seminar were Delton Franz of the MCC Washington Office; Ernie Dick of the MCC Ottawa Office; Walton Hackman and Darrell Fast, peace secretaries for the Mennonite Church and the General Conference Mennonite Church respectively; John Lapp, MCC Peace Section Executive Secretary; and Jake Pauls and Art Smoker, youth secretaries for the General Conference Mennonite Church and the Mennonite Church respectively.
Church School Day,
April 12

APRIL 12 is this year's Church School Day for the Mennonite Church, the day on which we take a concerted look at our church schools and their mission.

This year no special Church School Day brochure is being distributed in the congregations. Pastors will not get a general mailing from the Mennonite Board of Education office to announce Church School Day. This notice is your announcement.

Eastern Mennonite College, Goshen College, and the Mennonite Secondary Education Council are making presentations in the Gospel Herald, each with a full-page spread in various March and April issues. These may serve as background for your local Church School Day observance. Other schools may be distributing materials more locally in the churches.

Speakers from the various Mennonite elementary schools, high schools, and colleges are again available for Church School Day programs in the congregations. Each congregation is invited to write to one of the schools to request a speaker.

VS Personnel
Reach New High

With 23 persons entering Voluntary Service following the January 1970 orientation school, the number of personnel serving in Mennonite Board of Missions' VS has reached a new high of 340. This figure, which includes Canadian volunteers, proportions out to 149 women and 191 men ranging in age from 18 through senior adult. All but 25 of the 191 men are receiving I-W credit for their two-year assignment.

As of Jan. 1 there were 891 Mennonite and Conservative Mennonite men in some form of alternate service, such as VS, CPS, Pax, TAP, Overseas VS, or OMA. One year earlier, that figure stood at 1,067. Kenneth Seitz, Jr., of the Relief and Service Office in Elkhart, who tabulated these figures, believes that the current upheaval within the Selective Service System is a prime force behind the slowly decreasing number of service personnel.

Seitz points out, however, that the overall drop during the past year in the total number of Mennonite men from the United States in alternate service has not necessarily brought on a decrease in the number of male VS-ers during 1969. Jan. 1, 1969, found 186 men in domestic Voluntary Service assignments with Mennonite Board of Missions, the Eastern Board, and Mennonite Central Committee. This figure jumped to 212 by Jan. 1 this year.

Administrators with the various church agencies sense an increasing attitude among Mennonite Church members of "wanting to do something" by way of service. Says Seitz: "I feel this newly emerging sense of Christian responsibility primarily stems from three things—more awareness of world need, more reality of Christian experience, and some improved publicity on the part of church service agencies."

Forum on Peacemaking Scheduled

An interesting forum is being sponsored by the Laurelville Church Center for Apr. 3-5, 1970, titled "Peacemaking in Our Time."

This is another effort to help crystallize thought in regard to the relation of the church to the government and to the world in "times like these." The meeting is structured so that anyone may be able to participate in the discussion that will be spearheaded by four resource persons: Frank Epp, Douglas Hostetter, Emmet R. Lehman, and Sanford G. Shelter. The resource persons were chosen to represent varying points of view.

It is important that much time and thought be given to the matter of peace-making. What is the Christian's stance and mission? What is meant by "involvement" as it relates to the church and the state? In fact, what is the church, the state? What should be the Christian (Anabaptist) attitude on the present conflict in Vietnam? These and numerous other questions will come in for a full round of discussion, and hopefully, for some clarification—if no answers.

The public is invited to attend this forum, and those especially concerned on church-state relations should find it very rewarding. The Church Center staff and those who helped plan this event would be most happy to have a very good representation present Apr. 3-5. The total cost is $25. Reservations should be made immediately with the Laurelville Church Center, R. 2, Mount Pleasant, Pa. 15666.

Russian Broadcast
Receives High Rating

The Russian broadcast, Voice of a Friend, was given a high rating by various consultants for an evaluation concluded on Feb. 14 by the Board of Directors of Mennonite Broadcasts, Inc. In value and effectiveness, some rated it among the top three or four religious programs being broadcast to Russia and Eastern Europe.

Missions and individuals consulted agreed that the greatest need in Russian programming is for Bible exposition and Christian nurture. Even pastors in the Soviet Union receive little Bible training. Pastors attempt to visit all Christians, but so many believers scattered over a wide area make it impossible to visit everyone. Radio is the only contact and source of instruction for many isolated believers.

The Board directed several changes in light of the evaluation. Ivan Magal has served since 1960 as main speaker of the program, but recent demands upon his time because of his medical practice have forced him to become less actively involved in production. The Board expressed appreciation for his vision and initiative in establishing the broadcast and requested that he serve actively as consultant for the program.

Vasil Magal, brother of Ivan Magal, has been sharing the speaking responsibility recently, while at the same time serving as pastor for a group of Russian-speaking people in Belgium. He has now been appointed to serve as speaker for the broadcast and will also be in charge of Russian follow-up work.

Because of lack of funds the Board decided to discontinue support of the Russian program on HCJB in Ecuador, one of four stations which has beamed the program to Russia for several years.

Japanese Teacher
Graduates to Christ

A former Japanese kindergarten teacher, Miss Mieko Hoshiba, recently joined the full-time staff of the Bible Navigators in Tokyo to assist in Scripture memorization work. Miss Hoshiba, left the employ of a Buddhist kindergarten after she became a Christian. She told the principal: "Even though I've lived close to a temple here, I never saw the real way to live like I see it in Christianity."

Miss Hoshiba was baptized at the Yuai Mennonite Church on Oct. 10, 1969, by Yorifumi Yaguchi, assisted by Wesley Richard. Yorifumi-san talked about the meaning of baptism in his message. He said that water has many meanings in ancient folk thought. He mentioned its healing qualities in sickness, its use in cleansing sin, its centrality in Shinto ceremonies, and the belief that water contains... the power to resurrect the seeds that farmers plant in the springtime.

The use of water in the New Testament for baptism is not a process like that of washing vegetables, he said. We are cleansed first, then baptized. Baptism thus becomes a symbol of this inner cleansing. It has meaning for those in the church and is also a testimony to those outside the church. Yorifumi-san also warned against the attitude that once one is baptized he has completed all the requirements for Christian experience.

Following the baptismal service the congregation joined in a fellowship meal during which the members presented Miss Hoshiya with a new Bible.

Music Conference Schedule Set

Mary Oyer, head of Goshen College's Department of Music, has announced the schedule for the Church Music Conference, May 1-3, on the campus. Registration is set for 9:00 a.m. on May 1, and adjournment late Sunday afternoon, May 3.

Highlights of the conference will be a series of four addresses on hymns and a sermon on hymns during Sunday morning worship, by John Ruth, professor of English at Eastern Baptist College and a minister in the Franciscan Conference.

Other addresses will be by Philip Clemens, of the Eastern Mennonite College faculty, and Eleanor Kreider, of the Goshen College faculty, on the use of organ; also by Mary Oyer, "Music of the Mennonite Hymnal," and Orlando Schmidt, of Mennonite Biblical Seminary, "Contemporary Trends in Church Music."

A recital of new preludes for organ will be performed by Miriam Byler (of the Hesston College faculty), Philip Clemens, Eleanor Kreider, and a number of Goshen College students. These preludes for tunes in the new hymnal have been commissioned through the generosity of friends of the college.

Myron D. Casner will perform an organ recital of preludes from a variety of historical periods and based on tunes in the new hymnal.

The church music conference is part of a 3 1/2-week church music seminar, April 27 to May 19. The course, to be taught by Miss Oyer, will include an extensive study of The Mennonite Hymnal, examination of the use of organ in worship, a study of liturgies, and examination of the J. D. Hartzler collection of hymnals. A highlight of the seminar will be a master class in organ and an organ recital on May 16 and 17 by Rudolph Kremer, professor of music at the University of North Carolina and one of the nation's foremost organists. The seminar yields college credit for those who desire it, but previous college work is not a prerequisite.

More information and registration materials are available from Miss Oyer, at Goshen College, Goshen, Ind. 46526.

Inter-Mennonite Hymnal Workshop at Elkhart

Approximately 120 Mennonites, representing the General Conference Mennonite Church and the Mennonite Church, gathered at the Chapel of the Sermon on the Mount on Feb. 13 and 14, 1970, for a Mennonite Hymnal Workshop sponsored by the Associated Seminaries of Elkhart, Ind. Workshop leaders included Mary Oyer of Goshen College; J. Harold Moyer of Bethel College, Newton, Kan.; and Orlando Schmidt and Ed Stoltzfus of the Associated Seminaries faculties.

The workshop participants were helpfully introduced to the background of the new Mennonite Hymnal and were given much assistance in developing its use in congregational singing. Participants also had the opportunity of hearing the new Schlicker pipe organ which had been installed in the chapel in December 1969. This was the first inter-Mennonite workshop of its kind held on the Associated Seminaries campus.

The response was enthusiastic and gratifying to those who planned and sponsored it.

Bookrack Evangelism Reaches Jamaica

Not only has the Jamaica Mennonite Church been growing in size, but the outreach and diversity of projects supported by the congregation has been expanding as well. A significant development within the past two months is the beginning of a Bookrack Evangelism effort. Audrey Shank of the Way to Life follow-up office reported the replacement of two bookracks in Kingston supermarkets on Jan. 19.

Miss Shank was encouraged by the immediate enthusiastic response of both store managers and customers. Even as she installed a new rack people crowded around before she had even unpacked the books.

Before she and her helpers left the store, one lady had purchased ten books.

Another lady introduced herself as the manageress of a major downtown store and asked that her store be considered for the location of another bookrack. One supermar- ket manager is convinced that the books will sell, and the manager of the firm through which the books will be obtained in Jamaica called this a "major breakthrough."

Bookrack Evangelism is coordinated by Mennonite Broadcasts of Harrisonburg, Va. More than 15 district mission boards across the United States are supporting the project. Jamaican Mennonites will conduct their operation as a separate district.

Miss Shank believes that the possibilities for expansion are practically unlimited and has asked for many more racks and books. However, available funds only permit the addition of a few more at this time.

Russian Visitors Tour MBI

Visitors from the Soviet Union toured the facilities of Mennonite Broadcasts in Harrisonburg, Va., on Feb. 4 to acquaint themselves with yet another agency of the Mennonite Church. As representatives of the Union of Evangelical Christian Baptists in the USSR, Sergei Timchenko and Mrs. Klaudia Pillipiiq attended the 50th-anniversary celebration of the Mennonite Central Committee. Tour stops also included Brook Lane Psychiatric Center, Eastern Mennonite College, and the Mennonite Publishing House at Scottsdale, Pa.

At Mennonite Broadcasts they were introduced to Family Life TV spots and radio programs such as The Mennonite Hour and Choice. They learned about the extensive Spanish broadcasting and listened to a sample of the Russian broadcast, Voice of a Friend. Mrs. Pillipiiq was delighted to accept a copy of Ella May Miller's book of favorite recipes.

The staff at Mennonite Broadcasts appreciated the fellowship with the visitors. Once again they were made aware of the brotherhood Christ makes possible, in spite of lesser ideological differences. Before leaving, Mr. Timchenko admonished the staff to follow the leading of the Holy Spirit in reaching the people of the world with the news of God's great salvation.
New Principal for Lancaster Mennonite School

The director of teacher education at Eastern Mennonite College has resigned in order to accept a new position as principal of Lancaster (Pa.) Mennonite School.

J. Lester Brubaker, professor of education and a member of the EMC staff since 1957, announced that he will assume the principalship of LMS on a part-time basis beginning July 1. He will continue part time with EMC until July 1, 1971.

Consultant in curriculum development for the Rockingham County school system, Brubaker has also taught under the auspices of the University of Virginia and Madison College as a visiting professor.

"It is not easy to think of leaving EMC and the community," said Mr. Brubaker.

"These have been good years as I have seen young people prepare for service as teachers.

"My recent association with Rockingham County schools has also been personally rewarding and professionally enriching," added Brubaker.

Within the past ten years, 45 percent of EMC’s graduates have received teaching certificates. The total number of certificated teachers graduated during this time was 1,141, with slightly more than half of these preparing for careers in elementary education.

Brubaker is an authority on Mennonite education. His doctoral dissertation is entitled "A History of the Mennonite Elementary School Movement." He has also served with the Mennonite Board of Education. He is a member of the Board of overseers of Eastern Mennonite High School.

A former teacher at LMS and Hampfield High School in Lancaster County, Brubaker received undergraduate degrees both from EMC (Bible) and Franklin and Marshall College (English, Social Science) in Lancaster. He received his MA from the University of Michigan and his EdD from the University of Virginia.

Prior to his full-time service with the Education Department at EMC, Brubaker held administrative positions as acting dean of students and dean of men. He is currently director of teacher placement.

Bro. Brubaker has held offices with the Virginia Association for Student Teaching and the Association of Mennonite Elementary Schools. He also holds memberships in the National and Virginia Education Associations, Phi Delta Kappa honorary fraternity, and the National Association of Christian Schools.

VS to Continue in Mississippi

On Jan. 15, 1970, Mennonite Board of Missions received word that the Red Cross would terminate its services by the end of the month in the Gulf Coast area of Mississippi struck by Hurricane Camille. This decision, considered by some Mennonite officials involved in rehabilitation projects, was a premature move. Occurred only three months after a Voluntary Service unit had been established in Pass Christian, Miss., one of the hardest-hit communities.

The VS unit at Pass Christian officially began on Oct. 20, 1969, with the arrival of Don and Pauline Yoder, a couple transferred from Premont, Tex. The unit reached an 11-member capacity with the arrival of five VS men from the November orientation school.

From the start the unit attempted to work closely with Red Cross and Mennonite Disaster Service and was dependent upon Red Cross for job assignments and funds for material, board, tools, and transportation. The Red Cross decision to pull out left the VS unit with the need to seek its own identity and reason for being.

On Feb. 4 to 7, Ray Horst and Leonard Garber of the Relief and Service Office in Elkhart traveled to Pass Christian to help determine the future role of VS there in light of existing needs, resources for providing building materials, ability to do casework, and feelings of the unit, church, and community.

After evaluative consultations with local churches and civic leaders involved in the rehabilitation work, the decision was made for VS to remain in Pass Christian. The necessary finances for job materials will have to be provided through SBA loans, personal resources, limited MDS funds, and federal aid.

Garber said later that an evaluation of VS unit skills was made and the goals and purposes of the unit were restated. It was decided that unit members should help as many different families as possible rather than concentrating energies on a limited number of projects. VS-ers are to assist families to the point that they are again able to help themselves, he said.

"It was essential that the Voluntary Service unit at Pass Christian ‘paddle its own canoe’ after Red Cross pulled out and with the knowledge that MDS would soon pull out," Garber said. "We are now attempting this, and the prospects are good for a meaningful service experience for the volunteurs located there. VS should be able to stay at least a year or more as projected."

Mennonite Filmmakers Interviewed

"Pardon me, sir, can you tell me what’s happening here? We heard this film crew is from Hollywood! What movie are you making?"

"Well, first of all, the crew is not from Hollywood, and the movie we are making is a 60-weeked family Life TV Spot."

This conversation occurred on Jan. 31 near Nashville, Tenn., and led to a radio interview on station WIZO in Franklin, Tenn. The host of the interview was Charles Dibrell and his guests were James Fairfield, Harold Weaver, and J. Fred Rowles. Fairfield as creative director for Mennonite Broadcasts and Weaver as executive producer from the Mennonite Board of Missions were assisting at the filming of "A Childhood to Remember," one of the new spots soon to be released by the Mennonite Church. Mr. Rowles is director for TRACCO—the Television, Radio, and Film Commission for the United Methodist Church — with production headquarters in Nashville. TRACCO is producing the films for the Mennonites.

The interview took place at the McCampbell farm, the location for the filming. The farm was chosen because it retains much of the 1800’s atmosphere of pre-Civil War times. The number of antique furnishings and machinery preserved there made the site especially suitable for the setting dictated by the film script.

The new spots are a joint project of Mennonite Broadcasts of the Mennonite Church and Faith and Life Communications of the General Conference Mennonite Church. This year the Mennonite Brethren Church is also supporting the project.

Herr House to Be Restored

The Lancaster Mennonite Conference Historical Society is planning an openhouse program, April 18 and 19, for the 1719 Hans Herr dwelling-meetinghouse. The J. C. Wenger monograph on Hans Herr, the family, and the house is expected to be available with a cover reprint of the already famous Andrew Wyeth painting.

Keynote speaker for the April 19 afternoon program at the Willow Street Mennonite Church adjoining the historic site is Frederick S. Weiser, publications editor of the Pennsylvania German Society. Local and state historical societies will be represented.

The Wyeth painting will be displayed during the weekend activities.

LMCHS Chairman J. Paul Graybill and Secretary Ira D. Landis signed the purchase contract for the house, and the his-historical society has made the initial down payment of $4,000 to J. Mark Huber, former owner. Presently a $200,000 fund drive in charge of a 100-member advisory board is under way for architectural planning, restoration, and endowed costs. Liberal contributions are needed and may be paid over a three-year period.

The National Trust for Historic Preservation of Washington, D.C., has awarded LMCHS $800 for professional on-location consultants for preservation problems and opportunities. This grant money, matched by a local bank, may not be used for direct costs of preservation or restoration. Criteria for selecting grantees included evidence of commitment and previous achievements, types of services requested, and geographic distribution.

This well-built early example of German-Swiss architecture is one of few such buildings extant in America. The logs were cut from the surrounding woods and the stones quarried from the arable fields on the plantation. This site is being preserved as a monument to the nature of the faith of the pioneers of this area. LMCHS deeply appreciates the interest being aroused in the community, among the scattered Hans Herr descendants, and especially among non-Mennonites whose pioneers were in some cases neighbors to these Lamptier rusticos.

Genealogist Ira D. Landis has been named editor to update the 1908 Hans Herr genealogy at an indefinite point in the future. Descendants will be solicited to contribute family data.

He also plans to visit the MTS office in Nairobi, and to make a stopover on the return trip in London for consultation with the MTS representative in that city.

Lewis E. Weber, R. 2, Denver, Pa., was ordained to the ministry on Feb. 22 to serve as copastor at the Blainsport Mennonite Church. Luke Horst preached the sermon and H. Raymond Charles gave the charge.

David Powell writes from Aibonito, Puerto Rico: "The next few weeks are going to be busy, but we hope fruitful, for the Betania congregation. On Mar. 7 the workers' retreat was held to orient us spiritually for the Annual Assembly, March 12-15. Since it is in Aibonito our congregation will have opportunity to participate in the meetings quite easily. Following the assembly we will have an evangelistic campaign with Espada Mata during Good Friday-Easter Week. We pray that these will be opportunities for the congregation to grow."

Angel Luis and Lora Miranda and family arrived in Montevideo, Uruguay, from San Juan, P.R., on Feb. 26. Angel Luis has served as pastor of the Summit Hills congregation in San Juan for a number of years. The Puerto Rican Conference has given the Mirandas a study leave of two years, during which time they will be enrolled in the Mennonite Seminary at Montevideo.

Ross Goldfus, Salto, Argentina, writes: "On Sunday, Jan. 25, we had our first baptismal service here in Salto since our return. I baptized three youth and one elderly lady."

Don Blossey’s “What Did Jesus Say About Killing People?” not only deals with several valid answers to the nonpacifists’ questions and rebutts some of the false criticisms which we feel are not evident in our apparent answer as a nonresistant people to our government’s selective service machine—the I-W program. While I recognize this issue is important, I believe I have stated the following in certain individual cases to killing Viet Cong, I too support Don’s claims (not because they are Don’s but because they look biblical to me) that this program makes war and peace. We have nothing to say to a broken world about Christ’s sacrificial, nonresistant way of love—living until we match our counterparts in Vietnam with our willingness to live at the expense of our lives, and at the cost of religion and monetary rewards. I’m not inclined in all on the factors involved so out of ignorance I suggest the church scrap (or at least reconsider) this program as an alternative to not loving our enemy.

The Mennonite Central Committee report is both historically informative and excitingly challenging to the old for being a part of a brotherhood that is trying to implement the claims of Christ and to the young for being a part of this brotherhood that offers them so many opportunities for expressing their faith and philosophy of a Jesus-centered life to a world that needs just such a contribution.

These articles are not only worth reading but should also receive our undivided attention and consideration as laymen and leaders. — Keith E. Gingrich, Freeport, Ill.

With a disturbing regularity the Gospel Herald prints articles which are completely at odds with both the spirit and letter of the Bible. Two of these appeared this week’s issue.

The first of these is “Why I Don’t Eat Grapes.” While the author certainly has the right not to eat grapes I’m wondering why he doesn’t have the same sympathy for the considerable number of workers who are willing to work and might appreciate his purchase of the fruits of their labor. His approval of the efforts of an organization that has used us as intimidation and physical violence against those who wouldn’t follow them seems hardly in keeping with one who professes to believe in the Scripture, let alone one who would probably admit to being a member of a nonresistant faith.

In the same issue appeared “The Moratorium and Priorities.” Certainly as Christians we are concerned about peace but to suggest that Moratoriums, getting out of Vietnam, electing “liberal” candidates, spending billions at home etc., will bring about world peace or bring racial harmony and eliminate poverty at home indicates an arithmetical way of thinking. It is nothing short of tragic that those who profess to be Christians are either unable or unwilling to proclaim Christ as the answer to the world’s problems. In the past we as Mennonites have sometimes been accused of being too quiet. Perhaps if we have no better answers than these two articles imply we had better remain quiet. — Melvin I. Miller, South Bend, Ind.

Your editorial, “What Does God Say?” in the Feb. 3 issue is very good. God still speaks to us today to tell us how He wants His work done. He will grade us according to our “obedience” rather than on “our opinion” as to how it should be done. — Agnes Basinger, North Lima, Ohio.

I appreciate Don Blossey’s article, “What Did Jesus Say About Killing People?” which appeared in your February 10 issue.

I feel that many young people in society really don’t know where we stand, or what our Lord wants us to do. We have been given me, and I am sure many persons, food for thought. I also feel that he has very adequately pointed to what Jesus says. I am regarding of “passion but not passivism” is great!

As one who has known Jesus as my Savior for but a short while, I find much worth and support in the stand that this denomination takes against war. And the way the youth participate in alternative service.— Frank Gagnon, Home- stead, Fla.

Easter as I Experienced It

(Mary Magdalene)

By Winston J. Martin

It was impossible to sleep. The thoughts just kept racing through my mind. These last two days have been terribly tragic. How could it all end this way? We were expecting such great things; now He's dead. The way He died was a shame: no comfort; vinegar when He was thirsty; and the ridicule was disgusting. I hated to stay and watch it all but I loved Him so much I just had to stay to hear all He would say. Those words He spoke were incredible: "Father, forgive them." I would never have believed anyone could retain such an attitude amid such insults and agony, but coming from Him it was thrilling to hear. One can expect such compassion from Him when you think about it. He forgave me more than I could ever have hoped for. He cast out those seven demons and how different life is now.

We wept as we heard Him whisper, "It is finished." It happened so soon; usually it takes several days for the life to ebb but for Him it was but six hours. At least they didn't break His bones; but why they had to pierce His side when He was already dead seems hard to understand.

The burial was so strange. First, it was all so sudden; none of our group was there to care for His burial. How strange that Joseph should bury Him in his new tomb for He was a member of the Sanhedrin that had helped to condemn Christ. It must have taken courage for him to identify with Christ before Pilate and the Sanhedrin. What would they think of his loyalty to the man they had condemned?

It was very dark and my eyes were misty with tears as I followed Joseph at a distance to see where he would entomb my Master. I wonder if he gave Him a proper burial with spices for embalming? Nicodemus was with Joseph and had quite a load of supplies — it might have been the spices. Imagine! Nicodemus identified with Christ too; he had come by night to interview Christ awhile ago, but as far as I knew he left without becoming a follower. Perhaps he was a secret follower after all; too bad Christ couldn't have known before He died.

It's a shame these men had to bury our Lord. Where were all the disciples? Were all of them afraid to come and care for their Master whom they had followed through days of popularity and danger. They all scattered!

At least I saw where they buried Him. After the Sabbath I'll go to the tomb and get permission to embalm Him properly. It's the last thing I can do for the one I love so much.

But these thoughts and happenings kept mulling turbulently through my mind. I tossed and couldn't sleep because of my weeping for sorrow and disappointment. Why did it have to happen like this? Why couldn't He have established His kingdom like we all hoped He would? I couldn't find the answer. I couldn't sleep or pray. I would get up and go to the tomb. Maybe just being near His body would give me a sense of His presence and sustain me. It was early and very dark as I stepped into the street. The streets were deathly still; my footsteps on the cobblestones almost frightened me. I went my way with the spices in my arms. My heart was heavy; what would I tell the garden guard to explain my visit? I cared not, but came into the garden just as the first rays of sunrise rose in the skies.

As I quickened my steps I noticed no guard. As I came closer I gasped for the stone was gone! "Oh, no! They've stolen His body despite the seal. Who did it? Why would they do it? What did they do to Him?" I was so distraught I almost dropped my spices and wept. I set the spices down and decided to dash off to find Peter and John. It was early but I would awaken them if need be. As I came near where they stayed I saw Peter and John walking toward me. "They've taken Christ from the tomb. What will we do?" "Who did it?" asked Peter angrily. "I don't know. But I was just in the garden and saw the stone is gone so I came to tell you. How could they do this?"

Peter and John ran down the street to the garden. I came panting after them. John got there first and looked in. Peter rushed right in; he saw and wondered. John stepped in, saw, and believed that He was actually gone. Risen?? No! "For as yet they did not understand the Scripture that he must rise from the dead." They were perplexed and went home — home, where it was safe to think. If they stayed there they might be caught and accused of stealing His body. They had had enough trouble recently. They were at a loss to know what to do next. So they returned home to think, to wait for further revelation.

Many have heard the resurrection message and returned home to procrastinate, to await further evidence, to make excuses for themselves — refusing to believe in the risen Christ. They returned home—ashamed that they hadn't buried Christ and guarded Him themselves. Peter was further ashamed when he thought how he had denied Christ and then neglected to bury Him—the last good deed he might have done to show his repentance. He returned home further upset. Many similarly have gone home to brood over their past failures and regrets; they have refused to believe in the risen Lord who is near to reveal Himself.

How much better if they could have forgiven themselves and believed the word that He had indeed risen as He had foretold. How much better to believe than to think the world has ended and hopes are shattered. How much better to hope; to believe Christ's promises even when they don't make sense now.

I wept as they returned. I tried to pray through my sobs, but would God hear such a broken prayer? Would He hear such a prayer prayed in despair for some word of hope? God heard. Two angels appeared; they had not appeared previously but they came to comfort and assure. "Why are you weeping?" If I could have seen they were angels I might have asked, "Has Christ arisen?" But in my despair, with tears in my eyes, I couldn't see angels; I thought I spoke to the gardener. "Where did they put Him?" I demanded. Sorrow must not keep us from seeking Christ. Truly we have cause for sorrow when Christ is taken from us. My weeping reveals my devotion. I stayed at the tomb where tidings were most likely to come. I was weeping and praying and my prayers were answered. Eventually I noticed these were angels—but that experience didn't satisfy me. There was no honor for me in this unique privilege; it didn't bring me comfort. I wanted Christ and kept harping on the same string: they have taken away my Lord! If I had had a grain of faith I would not have had to endure such perplexity. I imagined needless difficulties because I failed to have faith in my Lord. But Christ came to me when my faith was nil. I wanted comfort so He came when my faith was shriveled. He stepped in to satisfy my inquiry and said, "Why are you weeping?" "Why do you weep, when I'm alive?"

Often Christ outdoes our expectations when we seek Him with our whole heart. I had longed to see the dead body of Christ and behold I saw Him alive! So God does for praying people "above what we could ask or think." I saw Jesus but did not recognize Him or believe my eyes. Those who seek Christ, though they do not see Him, must believe that He is "not far from any one of us." Christ is often near His people and they aren't aware because even in their prayers they weep in unbelief and self-pity. But Christ sees our griefs. He does not rebuke our unbelief; He rather inquires, "Why do you weep—when I'm here?" He dries our tears by His very presence.

Christ often manifests Himself to praying Christians, but He appears differently than they expect, so they fail to sense His nearness and find His comfort; that is, until Christ says, "Mary." He said it emphatically but in tones of kindness and I recognized, for "his sheep know His voice."

My prayers were answered beyond my highest expectations. I wanted to stay there and worship, but Christ said, "No, I have a mission for you. Go tell my disciples, and Peter, that I go before them into Galilee."

The disciples had forsaken Him and were discouraged, but He did not give them up as hopeless; "He loved them to the end";— even Peter! Peter particularly because he needed assurance of forgiveness for his denial.

I wanted to stay and worship, but I joyfully went bearing the tidings of what Christ had accomplished, and how Christ had answered my prayers in abundance. The least I could do was my duty: simply tell what Christ had done and how He still accepted His people who had defected. This was good news; good enough to dry my tears, with my unbelief, clear my eyes and mind, and enough to make me hopeful and happy. So, I, Mary Magdalene, for whom Christ had done so much, became the bearer of the resurrection message: the Lord is risen indeed! He had cast out seven demons, forgiven my sins, dispelled my unbelief, appeared to me alive instead of dead for embalming!

When one seeks Christ He always finds that He does "exceedingly abundantly above all we could ask or think." So He did for me, and still will do today for every earnest seeker.

Roses Have Thorns

By Merry Mary Yoder

It is almost impossible to cut and arrange a bouquet of roses without collecting a few scratches and pricks from the thorns. When the bouquet is finished, some will admire the beauty and thank God for it, others will only curse the thorns.

A Christian marriage is much like a bouquet of roses. Individuals often are scratched and bruised. Too many cry over the hurts, and never see the beauty.

Thorns left under the skin will fester into an ugly wound; they need to be removed promptly. When members of my family hurt me, I'd better face it honestly. If I deserved it, I'll need to admit it and ask forgiveness from that person. However, when I'm not guilty I'll need to talk to God; ask Him to help me forgive and forget. This is like washing a tiny scratch with soap and water. It will heal quickly and leave no scar.

Each scratch, if treated immediately will add to the enjoyment of the bouquet. When members of a family see each other growing sweeter through trials, they will see God's love in language they understand. This is the beauty of a Christian marriage: Christ's love glistening on the roses.

Are you enjoying your bouquet of roses (marriage), or are you more concerned about the thorns? Do you thank God for the beauty in your marriage, or does God only hear your complaints?
Can Anyone in the Ivory Towers Do Anything Right?

Yes! Even if we have to say so ourselves. Sometimes we feel that the church sees only our mistakes. When we do something right no one needs to be thanked because, "that's what we are paying those fellows for." When we are wrong we hear about it quickly because we have the unfortunate habit of printing our mistakes. So, will you forgive us if we report on several items that apparently were done right? This may make you feel as good as it does us.

1. Story of God and His People Uniform Lesson Series. The MCCE in cooperation with MPH put on a special drive through promotion and workshops to maximize the value of this series. Supplementary materials were prepared. Over $20,000 worth of these extras have already been ordered by congregations which we think is great.

2. Holy Now Youth Experience Materials. This is an entirely new multimedia, maximum involvement, total participation approach to youth nurture. Although the materials cost considerable, have a limited audience, and have barely been released, yet over half of the first printing is already in the hands of youth. Nearly 3,000 copies have been sold. We like that sort of enthusiasm for a new thing.

3. Let My People Choose is the title of a missions study which was released last fall. Obviously you felt it was helpful. Two printings, a total of 6,000 copies, were not enough. People are still ordering. So a third printing is needed. You can still get on board.

4. New Kindergarten Materials. It is a bit early to brag on this because many of you will not get to see this exciting, four-color package for small children until September. Everyone we have shown these preschool materials to have responded with childlike enthusiasm (of course, we are careful to show them to the right people).

5. New Mennonite Hymnal. The Worship Committee of Menno General Conference gets most of the credit for this one. But since the hymnal is central in a "gathered life" emphasis which MCCE is administering, we get in on the action. Thirty-nine thousand copies have been sold. A third printing has been ordered. Best of all most of what we hear about the hymnal is good.

6. Youth Convention. The problem will be how to keep the youth for whom there is no room away. Some are al-

"Fear not, little flock" (Lk. 12:32).

Did you ever think of the way Jesus referred to His followers? He seems so seldom to refer to us as strong or sufficient. Terms of weakness are usually used. Here it is again, "little flock." Why does He not use such words as lions, horses, or other beasts of strength? Sheep are so feeble in comparison. Sheep are frightened so easily. Sheep are very dependent.

But that is just the point. We are like sheep, not only in that we are inclined to stray, but even more, in that we are so dependent upon the Shepherd. We know we do not need to fear with the Shepherd watching over us. We have reason to be fearful if we are not within sound of the Shepherd’s voice. But in His flock and in His sight we are safe.

Geikie wrote years ago: "An undivided heart, which worships God above, and trusts Him as it should, is raised above all anxiety for earthly wants."

Busy or Restless?

"We are not always doing the most business when we seem to be the most busy. We may think we are truly busy when we are only restless, and a little studied retirement would greatly enrich our returns. We are great only as we are God-possessed." — J. H. Jowett.

Quoted by Ralph Turnbull in A Minister’s Obstacles, p. 102 ready asking, “If we are not included in the quota (of 2,400) can we come on our own?”

7. Couples’ Retreats. A model retreat bringing together leadership couples appointed by conferences was sponsored by MCCE and the WMSA last fall. Now a number of conferences are building on that experience and the number of people helped is being multiplied.

8. Sunday School Superintendents’ Seminars. Two were sponsored by MCCE this winter. Enrollment for both was 120. Many congregations sent a cluster of leaders which made decision-making more meaningful. We think this was right. Right?

Leadership-
Is It a Lost Art?

"As for the best leaders, the people do not notice their existence. The next best, the people honor and praise. The next, the people fear; and the next, the people hate. . . . When the best leader’s work is done the people say, ‘we did it ourselves.’"

This Chinese proverb by Lao-Tzu says something we need to hear. The best leader is not the one we are so often led to believe in — one with a strong ego, a stunning speaker, an intellectual giant, a person far out in front of everyone else. Such have often taken the wrong road themselves and when given leadership often destroy rather than build. Leadership is not for the enlargement of the leaders but for the enrichment of the followers. So a true leader inspires in often unnoticed little things. He helps his followers on rather than seeking to climb to the peak himself. He is not concerned for himself but for those whom he is called to lead.

One writer puts it this way, "How do you spot a leader? They come in all shapes, sizes, and conditions. One clue: since most people per se are mediocre, the true leader can be recognized because, somehow or other, his people consistently turn in superior performances."

I don’t know where we picked up the idea that a leader is one who is so far out front few can follow, so big and powerful no one can resist, and so wise he has all the answers.

No wonder we get into the fixes we do in our nation and churches. We will be in trouble until we realize that the call to leadership is not a call to position but to service, not the placing of one person on a pedestal of power or prestige but it is taking the stoop of servanthood. Leadership is not a privilege to treat others as personnel but a trust given to treat others as people with great possibilities and personal dignity.

Leadership is not evident when people say, "Look what he did" but rather when people say, "Look what we did together." — D.

I Become Fearful

I become fearful for my country when I hear one of its most prominent political leaders claim the cheers of large crowds by derogatory digs against segments of society, be they radical youth, Panthers, or pacifists. That’s only one step away from the crowd psychology which accompanied every great persecution.

I’m fearful for all persons with conviction when persons are disposed with a reproachable remark, a sarcastic sentence, or an oath because they may disagree with decisions of persons in political power. That’s only one step away from some Siberian disposition of all who challenge or threaten the power structure.

I’m fearful for my country when I hear a leader lump all dissenters together and label them as traitors, renegades, and dropouts. That’s only one step away from the death chambers of a dictatorship.

It’s good to be reminded that any political system can become demonic in a very short time and if the signs are not read it seems like it can happen overnight. In Germany it was while Hitler cried "law and order" and the crowds cheered that millions of those who appeared to be a threat were being disposed of. It’s good to remember that our forefathers were called traitors and killed because of their faith. And the spirit which allows one segment or person or society to be dropped by word or action is the same spirit which will destroy any other segment if it finds it a threat. — D.

Youth Team
Communicates Vital Faith

The Latin American Mennonite Youth Team visiting Mennonite churches, schools, and communities in North America Dec. 30 — Feb. 23, included Jaime Gardin, 24, Campinas, Brazil, member of the Valinhos congregation, assistant manager of the Mennonite Bookstore in Campinas, Teachers' College student; Ana Marlie Gencer, 21, member of the Lapa Mennonite Church, Sao Paulo, Brazil, a 1969 graduate of Teachers' College, now a psychology student; Hugo Moreira, 18, member of the Sauce congregation, Uruguay, premed student; Adriana Matteucci, 20, member of the Ramos Mejia congregation in Buenos Aires, Argentina, third grade teacher, medical student; and Hector Boyajian, 22, member of the La Falda congregation, Argentina, physical therapist, student at Cordoba Brethren Bible College.

The theme of the tour was "We've a story to tell to the nations." The youth represented a typical cross section of Latin American Mennonite youth — some first, others second-generation Christians. The youths' testimonies — and the theology that shone through their testimonies — reflects the frontier Christianity of Argentina, Uruguay, and Brazil, where 80 percent of the people have not yet been evangelized. The text that follows was part of a worship service conducted by the team during a February 12 staff chapel at Mennonite Board of Missions.

Ana Marlie Gencer: "I am 21 years old. As a Christian, I know I am a child because I am still growing. Actually, I accepted Christ as my Savior when I was baptized. That was last April on Easter day. Before that I went through a long struggle trying to find the reason for my existence.

"In February I had spent several days at a Christian camp where for the first time in my life I had an encounter with Christ. One day after coming home from camp I made my definite decision to accept Him. Something talked to my heart, something I could not explain. That day the greatest conflict of my youth had been resolved by Him I had believed did not exist.

"Our world depends on each youth. I know that what happened to me has happened to thousands of young people. But I regret that there are so many of our fellow students who do not meet Christ. What will become of our world if these leaders of tomorrow are wrong believers, without Christ in their hearts? We must pray for these our friends. We must give them our testimony and show them by our lives that Christ can give them reason for existence just as He did for me."

Hugo Moreira: "I start to attend in my church about two years ago. In Uruguay most of the people they are Catholic and so my family they are Catholic too. The nicest experience I had was when I accepted Jesus as my Savior. I have to say thank you for the time that I am a Christian and for the time that I have to serve Him. And I have to say thank you for the love that He has to everyone. So Christ, He help us and He forgives us and so now we are waiting for the time when He is coming again. John 14:6 says, 'I am the way, and the truth, and the life; no one comes to the Father, but by me.'"

Adriana Matteucci: "Just as Hugo and many of my friends, I was born and raised in a Roman Catholic home. When I was eight years old a friend invited me to Sunday school. From that time I began to attend regularly because I found the Lord and the understanding that God loves me and He loved everyone. This was very important for my life. I was so happy to know that Jesus loves the little children because I was a little child.

"When I was ten years old I began preparing for first communion in the Catholic Church. I went to two classes but didn't return. Something in my heart said that it wasn't what I should do. My mother was a Catholic but told me that if I wanted to join the evangelical church I had her permission. After two years I was baptized and my mother was baptized too. At that time I knew I had been born again. God guided me, teaching me what I should do. This is my most wonderful experience of my life."

Hector Boyajian. Hector was favorably impressed by North American youths' interest in spiritual matters, missionary work, and preaching the gospel, but he felt that doctrine is being neglected in favor of humanitarian and social concerns. The Bible did not appear to have the prominence he felt it should have in the life of the church. He guarded against generalizing by noting that differences exist within a single congregation, both in North and South America.

Jaime Gardin: "One thing I have to mention was an experience that we had in a church in Cleveland. The pastor was preaching and we could feel that God was with us that night. And really that night the congregation was weeping, the pastor and our group too.

"Everywhere we said how important it is to remember that Christ is talking with people all over the world. God called Abraham outside his tent and said to him, 'I'll make of you a great nation and that nation will be . . . '. Brazil, Argentina, Uruguay, or United States? What nation was it? The nation is when we accept Jesus as our Savior and we can feel in our heart that that is the nation. The day when we can say, 'Jesus' in Portuguese and Spanish or in other languages, 'Here I am and I want to serve You.' And how wonderful it is because He can understand my language, Portuguese and Spanish and English too.

"I would like to ask you that you still pray for us. Really, the time here in the States, we'll never forget it. We must work for this cause, for Christianity. It is our responsibility to preach and to tell our personal testimony. Sometimes I suggest here is my hand, so take it and let's go together and work.

"One thing is sure, that we are going to pray for the congregations here in the States and for the Mennonite people, I mean all the Christian people, because really in Christ there are no denominations."

The Compassion Fund Is ...

By John Powell

"The Compassion Fund is a communist conspiracy." "Who's going to control the money?" "The Mission Board is collecting money to give to the niggers." These statements have reverberated through the Mennonite brotherhood since the inception of the Compassion Fund idea at Kalona and at General Conference in 1969. I am not certain that this is a counter-reaction to becoming involved in societal ills or a basic mistrust of Mission Board personnel. I am writing in hopes of establishing some meaningful understanding regarding Compassion Funds.

The Compassion Fund grew out of concerns that motivated the Black Manifesto — racism, poverty, and oppression — but it is not a response to the Black Manifesto. The Mission Board is not collecting monies to eagerly turn over to every group that demands reparations, but this is rather an attempt to become personally and financially involved in Christ's ministry now. This is being done by promoting the idea of personal and financial involvement by the total brotherhood in healing society's cancer of racism and pride.

The Minority Ministries Council, formerly the Urban-Racial Council, is composed of blacks and browns who will decide project funding in cooperation with the executive committee of the Mission Board. It is hoped that we can rid ourselves of the idea of "control" and supplant it with the more biblical idea of "sharing." This is a basic message of Christ's ministry and the gospel. It is out of this sharing that we can understand the wholeness of man. We must show our faith in Christ by our compassion of sharing, and it is from this context that we want to lead our brotherhood to a theology of involvement.

Must there be a credibility gap in the brotherhood? As your brothers, blacks and browns have some basic concerns for the total brotherhood. Do not let $6.00 per member per year stand in the way of reconciliation; but rather, let $6.00 per member be the beginning of mutual involvement. It is when we begin to trust the minorities in the church that others can see the Mennonite Church moving toward a deeper Christian commitment to God and fellowmen.

There is $38,075 in the Compassion Fund as of February 16, 1970. It is hoped that as the brotherhood catches the necessary vision we will not stop at giving only money toward reconciliation but we will also become personally involved to the point that we give one year or more in Christian service.

This is the kind of compassion that the Mennonite Church's minorities really want and need. Let each of us pray that God will give the compassion needed to respond positively, creatively, and immediately to needs which exist in the world today.
We Adopted a Negro Child

By Marlene Daehlin as told to Levi Keidel

My husband Ted and I had struggled with the decision for months. Every night we would put our 6-year-old Faith to bed, then together quietly weigh and ponder the issues. We had been asked to adopt a mixed-blood Negro child. Tonight the battle inside me was raging again.

Why should we be making such a big thing out of it, I asked myself. When it became clear that we would never have another child biologically, Ted and I decided to pursue another avenue. We'd prayed a lot about it. We were certain that we were to share our lives with another child. We called Social Service; they said mixed-race children have the hardest time finding homes; would we like a Negro-white child? Hadn't Ted and I been praying for a child? Why should we get so hung up on its color?

But this thing of skin color is so loaded these days. Minneapolis is just another big problem-plagued American city. The trend toward racial polarization is frightening. How naive of us to think that our little interracial family would make any difference! Why bring racial conflict into our home? We could well be jeopardizing the future of our family by accepting a Negro child.

Yet if God had prompted us to call Social Service, He knew they would offer us this child. And our daughter Faith had to have a companion. Our overattractiveness to her was making us picky about little things. Alone, how could she grow up to be the normal full-orbed person God wanted her to be?

But in the intimate home situation, what would it mean for her to grow up with a Negro brother? We live in a typical middle-class suburb; what would the neighbors say? Ted and I both came from close-knit families; how would they react? What if, say, just before Christmas we got a note saying, "Unless you get rid of this idea, we won't contact you anymore"?

Finally, deep down within me I heard a voice break through the conflict and say, "You've analyzed this thing to death. This is My direction. Simply put your trust in Me." I looked at Ted. Our eyes met. We nodded simultaneously. We would adopt the child.

The social worker came and left him. I can't say I felt any real parental love reaching out to him. Here suddenly this little 3-year-old stranger was standing in our house, his pants too small, his hair too long, like a waif off the streets.

But we got busy, and love followed. What he needed most was the security of a family he could really call his own. When the phone rang, he didn't have to worry anymore about someone coming to take him away. Soon he was calling us "mommy" and "daddy" like he really believed it. His asthma, bronchitis, and tonsillitis were soon replaced by a resistance that defies almost any bug. By the time he started kindergarten he was fully ours. When I saw him coming down the sidewalk, I wouldn't think of him as a stranger or a Negro; I thought, "There's John! I wonder if he's had a good day?"

We experienced little controversy with relatives; and the response of our neighbors was great. They gave us a big shower right after John came. Some told us they thought it was a privilege to have John growing up in their neighborhood; their own children would have a truer picture of what the world is all about.

People would ask from time to time, "How is it working out?" Really it was working out amazingly well. John's adjustment took a remarkably short time. It appeared that our family life was going to again become very humdrum and ordinary. Then something happened which helped us realize our family could never be the same.

One day John said something which showed much about his former neighborhood.

"I can't play at that neighbor's house over there."

"John, you can play anywhere you want to," I said.

"No I can't. They don't like Negroes."

At this point we were no longer thinking about his color; he is only partly Negro. Yet this experience jarred us to recognize that the very nature of our society would someday force him to find his primary identity with the black race. If we never mentioned his color, he could very well come to feel that we were ashamed of it. This could only undermine his sense of security in our home and destroy what we were trying to do for him.

If he grew up ashamed of his race, he could never become satisfactorily integrated into American society. Thus to help give him a sense of security and pride in his race, we no longer ignored his blackness; we began teaching him of its beauty.

Marlene Daehlin, suburban Minneapolis housewife, mother of three children, two of them adopted mixed-blood Negroes, member of Shepherd of the Hills Lutheran Church, author of Hearts Aflame, a prayer autobiography (St. Paul Pioneer Press, 1966).

Levi Keidel, served 12 years as an evangelism-journalism missionary in the Congo. Ordained under the General Conference Mennonite Church. Author of Footsteps to Freedom (Moody Press, 1961). Currently free-lance writing and managing denominational headquarters bookstore at Newton, Kansas, while awaiting return to Congo.
Growing racial turmoil in our country brought his problem of identity crisis to a head. He saw on television the dogs and water hoses and faces contorted with high-pitched prejudice. Then Martin Luther King, Jr., was assassinated. Ted and I came to see that we could never fulfill our obligation to John unless we ourselves bridged across the racial gap to identify meaningfully with the black people.

After escaping death in a serious car accident, we decided to go all the way with this thing. By this time we have entered deeply into a world which to us was once forbidding and strange: the world of the black ghetto. There we have developed deep and meaningful friendships with wonderful people. There I've seen myriads of children whose lives are hopelessly disintegrating because they have never really experienced love.

One day in the ghetto I found a small boy seated on a park bench crying. This is something you seldom see; ghetto kids are taught to cover up any emotion lest it be used against them. He said his name was Terry. I asked him what was wrong.

"Have you ever had a friend that you thought was your friend, and when you was gettin' beat up, he ran away and didn't even help you?"

Hunting for the right words I said, "Well, I've had friends that haven't stood by when I needed them; maybe not very many. But Terry, I know a friend who will never leave you; He will always be your friend no matter what. You can always talk to Him, no matter where you are or what you are doing."

His eyes opened wide as he looked up at me and said, "Really? Who is it?"

"His name is Jesus."

"Jesus who?"

This was all new to him. I had the opportunity of telling him the story of Jesus' love. I hope that for a moment I lifted his sights above the ghetto sump to see a glimpse of something he'd never seen before.

Then there was the teenager I'll call Spike. When he was young, his IQ was measured as being just above moron level. So for most of his school years he was simply under people's feet. From year to year he became increasingly incorrigible. Then when he was a junior in high school, a black lady teacher took him under her wing. Under her patience and love he blossomed incredibly. He demonstrated real creativity and leadership. His IQ shot up to well over 100. His conduct became controlled.

Then a traumatic experience shook him personally. Also, he began recognizing injustices suffered by those around him. The hopelessness of the whole ghetto structure so oppressed him that his security was shattered. He went on dope and fell to pieces. The last we heard he was studying somewhere in Africa.

There are hundreds of Terrys and Spikes in every sizable ghetto. To me they are little Johns whose environment robs them of the hope of ever realizing their potentials.

John has really taken to his black identity. Every summer he and his dad have a contest to see who can get the darkest. A black woman gives me insights into matters of personal attention such as hair care, with which white people have had no experience. He is so sold on the greatness of his race that he convinced kids in his class to write "Black is beautiful" on their tennis shoes.

When people rave about what sacrifices we are making to have this poor little boy in our home, I get shook and embarrassed. They are reading it all wrong. John has brought us a wealth of blessing.

He has opened to us doors to an unbelievable world with a rich culture and a truly great people. Experiences of identifying with deep need and sharing imminent danger have so bonded friendships that our whole family has grown in understanding what life is all about. All this has so enhanced our relationship to God that we are coming to see every daily encounter with others as an opportunity to let God's love flow out through us.

Five years have passed since that evening when Ted and I made our decision. Now we wonder why we got so hung up on it. I wouldn't want to have missed all that that decision has brought us for anything.

Wit and Wisdom

Little Eldon, fretting at the teacher's assignment, asked skeptically, "Do you get paid for teaching us?"

The teacher smiled. "Yes."

Puzzled, the boy exclaimed, "That's funny! We do all the work!"

If Moses had been a committee, the Israelites would still be in Egypt.

It never occurs to a teenage boy that he will someday be as dumb as his father.

Instant Maturity

By David Augsburger

"I can't wait."
"I won't wait."
"I demand satisfaction now, right now!"

These are the cries of our impatient age. We are a generation of instant people. We wake up with instant coffee, breakfast with instant cereals, shave with instant lathers, offer instant credit, float instant loans, expect instant success, demand instant performance from others, then go home to our instant precooked frozen dinners, and relax for instant entertainment in front of instant transistorized TV's.

If our innermost wishes were fulfilled, what would we have next?
Instant transportation—any destination as close as a thought?
Instant gratification—any favorite pleasure as quick as a thought?
Instant health, wealth, beauty, or immortality, any desire at the call of a thought?
Instant everything.

We've come to expect it from our mechanized, computerized society. Why not? We can work miracles with any problem if it can be programmed into the machine. A problem that took an hour to solve on a 1950 model computer now takes three seconds. Now a man has the power to do in a few minutes something a pre-computer person couldn't have done in a lifetime.

If we value anything in our modern time, it's speed, crash projects, rush jobs, and instant action.

This "instantism," as sociologist Max Lerner calls it, affects and afflicts our total society, molding our thought patterns, raising impossible expectations, and breeding uncontrollable impatience. It begins in pampered infancy—the spoiled little brat screaming, "I want what I want when I want it just because I want it." It accelerates in youth to the tune of 'live it up, now. Let it happen, now. Whatever it is, let it be real, let it be vivid, let it be now.'

"Instantism" has made its impact on every age level, and every individual in our society. "Do it now. Say it now, buy it now, try it now! Why wait? The future's a thing of the past." This is the language of instant people.

Why? Dr. Robert E. Fitch, of Berkeley, Calif., prominent American educator and minister, answers:

"When an affluent society reaches the point where the good things of life are abundant and available to a lot of people without much apparent effort, they begin to wonder why they shouldn't have whatever they want immediately. It can be expressed in a variety of demands, such as: 'I want instant sex—I don't want to wait for it. I want to be able to walk into the girls' dormitory and help myself.' Or, 'I want instant racial justice.' Or, 'I want instant peace in Vietnam tomorrow morning at 6:00 a.m.'"

As our affluence increases—so do the impatient voices demanding instant everything. There's such a din of shouts and threats that it's almost impossible to sort out the justified demands from irresponsible ones.

There's the tired impatience of the discriminated, demanding instant equality—which is long overdue.
There's the hungry impatience of the deprived, demanding instant opportunity—which is certainly justified.
There's the angry impatience of the downtrodden, demanding instant justice—which is obviously deserved, or demanding instant revenge—which is inevitably self-defeating.
There's the lazy impatience of the pampered, demanding instant success, prestige, and prosperity—which is obviously undeserved.
There's the ignorant impatience of the lawless and irresponsible demanding ease, leisure, pleasure with no responsibility—which breeds disaster.
They all say the same thing. "We can't wait. We won't wait, for either our rights or our wants. We want action. We want it now!"

In the ghetto, a young Negro leader shouts out in anger against his elders. "They're too slow! They talk about walking two miles to school. I don't want to walk no two miles. I want the school right next door, man. Man, I want a taxi to take me to school."

David Augsburger, Harrisonburg, Va., delivered this message over the Mennonite Hour radio broadcast.

Gospel Herald, March 24, 1970
In the white "snuburb" a young college student shows identical impatience when he sneers at his elders' superficial, success-oriented lives. "You can have your start-at-the-bottom-rung-of-the-business-ladder routine. Why should I have to work for success? You can give me everything now, and I mean now. Why wait for success? I am one already."

Impatience has always been characteristic of youth. Now, affluence and permissiveness have combined to produce high expectations for instant change, instant success, instant justice, and instant pleasure. But instead it's producing instant impatience, instant anger, and instant violence.

Dr. Bruno Bettelheim, of the University of Chicago, one of our leading psychiatrists, connects affluence, instantism, and violence with these words:

There's a lawlessness at large. Up to World War II, what was glorified was the respectable hardworking citizen. Now there is the attitude that "everybody owes me a living—I have to get what I want right now, or I'll burn the house down, and if I have no roof, then the government has to give me another roof."

One thing must be said, We've got to learn to wait.

One word must be relearned, Wait. I say this not in defense of the status quo. Where it is good, it is its own defense. Where it is evil, it must change. And there are changes that should—that must—happen now. There are decisions to be made now, deeds to be done now, words to be said now.

But that doesn't include everything. Some things can only be gotten by working and waiting. Sometimes that will demand working hard and waiting long. It will demand patience and perseverance.

And some values can only be gained by waiting. You can't manufacture instant maturity. You can't build instant character.

You can't buy instant happiness. You can't find instant meaning in life by grabbing an instant cause. You can't achieve instant insight into problems or instant understanding of people.

Insight, meaning, joy, happiness, character, and maturity come only to those with the perseverance to work and earn them, the patience to wait and truly discover them.

Every great ethical system in Europe, China, India, every great thinker, every great man of spiritual insight has believed and taught the principle of deferred gratification—put simply, that's putting off immediate satisfaction for greater returns later on. It's a law of life. Immediate satisfaction sells out the greater fulfillment only tomorrow can bring.

If you settle for instant promiscuous sex, you never know what what a tremendous thing sex is when it's celebrated with the right person, at the right time in marriage.

If you settle for the instant joys of spending all your money at the moment, you never enjoy the values of investment, business, or property ownership.

Eat your cake now—and you have a crumby tomorrow.

Shortsighted living brings long, long regrets. If we want and demand today what only tomorrow can give, we will grasp for it today and miss out on it both today and tomorrow. Break off the bud, and you destroy both flower and fruit.

I know, tomorrow seems as if it will never come. We want to get there as fast as we can to make the most of life. There's a lot of living to be done and so few years to do it in.

But we can't do it all at once!

In our rush to find an instant escape from our boredom, to discover instant meaning for our monotony, we grab the only instant replacements available—the glittering substitutes of instant pleasure, instant kicks, instant trips to nowhere.

Live for the moment, and the moment is all you will have. Live impatiently burning up your tomorrow today, and tomorrow will never come.

If we settle for instant pleasures to fill our leisure; instant narcotics to silence our problems; instant anger to release frustration; instant violence to right our wrongs—we sell out the future.

The only lasting solutions to human problems this world has ever seen came through those men who invested their lives in working and waiting. Men who sacrificed for the moment to build for the future.

Men who lived not just for time, but for eternity. Not just for things, but for principles of truth, justice, and love. Not just for self, but for God.

"Seek first the kingdom of God [God's kingly rule] and his righteousness," said Jesus Christ, "and all these things shall be added to you" (Mt. 6:33, paraphrased). For whoever would save his life will lose it; and whoever loses his life for my sake and the gospel's will save it. For what does it profit a man, to gain the whole world and forfeit his life" (Mk. 8:35-37, RSV)?
The Patched-Up Religion

By Ira D. Landis

"And, behold, the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom. . . ." — Matthew 27:51

After the human sigh of relief and the holy cry of triumph, the temple was no longer God's dwelling place. The high priest rent his garments; God rent the veil that covered the place where He entered into communion with His people. This rending of the veil has been called the "strangest, swiftest, and most dramatic of all comments on Jesus' death." There was no holy of holies, no holy place, no court, no altar, no accepted sacrifices. God respected henceforth another blood, another altar, another priesthood. Jesus told the Jews, "Put me to death and you destroy this temple" (Jn. 2:19).

Jerome says the large beam above the gate of the temple snapped. Josephus, as well as the Talmud, records the opening of the gates of their own accord 40 years before AD 70. Johanan Ben Zacckai then said, "Temple, wherefore dost thou open of thyself? I see thereby that the end is near, for it is written, "Open thy doors, O Lebanon, that the fire may devour thy cedars" (Zech. 11:1). Doddridge suggests that Caiaphas, the high priest, could have been offering incense before the veil at the time when the veil was rent from top to bottom, Luke 23:45, opening the way into the holiest of all, revealing the official passing of the divine economy of the Jewish dispensation and the entering of the Christian Church for all humanity.

The sun was veiled as the veiled Son of Righteousness gave His life for this sinful nation but opened the way for all mankind to enjoy the Light of the World. He discharged the debt guilty sinners owed God. There was no more need of an earthly high priest, a mercy seat, the sprinkling of blood, offering of incense, and a day of atonement. Hebrews 10:18. Jesus said, "It is finished." The antitype fulfilled the type in the Old Testament economy. Paul says he takes away the first testament to establish the second. Hebrews 10:9.

Jesus was the mediator for real fellowship with God, Colossians 1:19; 2:9, for the establishing of a large, glorious, and firmly founded church. Ephesians 2:20-22. Heaven is the abode of the Most High, Revelation 7:15; Psalm 11:4, and no temple shall be found therein. Revelation 21:22. Our bodies, while on earth, are the temples for the service of the King. 1 Corinthians 3:16, 17.

This is confirmed by Tacitus, the Talmud, a few other writers, and Josephus. Josephus, the only historian eyewitness to the destruction of Jerusalem after 40 years of grace, notes the following: "Round about the altar lay dead bodies heaped one upon another. The holy house was burned down without Caesar's approbation. . . . God had for certain long ago doomed it to the fire, and now that fatal day was come. . . . These flames took their rise from Jews themselves. . . . The holy house was perishing. [Titus rose in consternation to save it]."

Once for all people and times, Hebrews 10:10; John 14:6, all man-made, patched-up religions, whether Jewish or Gentile, will be of no avail before God, for as Paul says to the legalistic Galatians, "Though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed" (Gal. 1:8).

Princes and rulers of the darkness of this world have been vanquished, "for by one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified" (Heb. 10:14; Rev. 5:9). No more need for the sacrifices of the Old Testament economy, for the mass, for salvation by works, Romans 4:2; 6; Ephesians 2:8, 9; Titus 3:5, for salvation without works, James 2:14, 17, 18, 20, 26, for Jewish or Gentile priesthoods nor for the thousands of rams, Micah 6:7, used for sacrifices that really availed nothing and that were imposed until the coming of Christ. Hebrews 9:10; 7:19.

To understand this approach better, we might dig further into the teachings of Jesus and the New Testament. Paul, a Jew by birth but a Christian by conversion, encouraged others with him to look away from earth unto Jesus, the Author and Finisher of our faith who endured the cross of Jews and Gentiles, despising the shame of both. Hebrews 12:2. Paul's desire and prayer to God for Israel is that they might be saved. Romans 10:1. To be saved, they need to be "grafted in," Romans 11:23, and so (an adverb of manner) "all Israel shall be saved" (Rom. 11:26).

Ira D. Landis, Leola, Pa., is a minister at the Landis Valley Mennonite Church and secretary of the Lancaster Mennonite Conference Historical Society.

Gospel Herald, March 24, 1970
Jesus was no Jewish patriot, no Jewish zealot. That would have been an ambition far too small for the Son of God, the Savior of the wide, wide world. On the crucial political issue of their day, “Is it lawful to give tribute unto Caesar, or not” (Mt. 22:17)? Jesus replied: “Render therefore unto Caesar the things which are Caesar’s; and unto God the things that are God’s” (Mt. 22:21). Yet they falsely charged Him with “preventing the nation,” Luke 23:2, and being nonnationalistic and, therefore, a traitor to the nationalistic cause. He asks us to follow Him. He was the savior of their souls, their greater liability, than the liberator of their bodies from the suzerainty of the Roman world power. The Anabaptist fathers were neither Jewish zealots nor Swiss, German, or Dutch nationalists. They followed the international Lord to glory via the rent veil of Calvary.

Jesus separated church and state, for Israel proved that these could not be “a holy nation” (Ex. 19:6). Jesus concluded, “My kingdom is not of this world” (Jn. 18:36). His followers will not fight for national prestige. Israel as a militaristic nation is so political that a very small minority in the government are orthodox Jews as such. The greatest catastrophe on the international scene has been this nation’s treatment of the Arabs for two decades.

Jesus, as we all believe, was a real example of nonresistance. If in the six-day war in Jerusalem (1967) any nonresistant Christian who believed in helping God had done so by taking a sword, a grenade, or anything else “to stick a feller thru,” as James Russell Lowell termed it, he would soon have lost his nonresistance.

A patch-up veil telling their people and the world that Jesus has not come has blinded them and many other sympathizers.

Some say Christ has not yet appeared. Others now say He appeared in 1914. God announced by breaking the beam and shattering the veil that Christ has appeared and ascended to heaven as the genuine sacrifice, eliminating all shams for those that follow Him. A patch-up religion will never do for this generation. It is antiquated by 1900-plus years. Now we have Christ and His message alone for all time. Hebrews 1:1, 2. To return to Judaism with a patch-up veil Paul says is to “crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame” (Heb. 6:6).

Just as God cannot recognize the people behind a patched-up veil, so the church must ever follow the heaven-approved method, John 14:6, the way of the rent veil.

Communique

You will recall that in the last report I touched on the reluctance of human beings to acknowledge their inadequacies. This matter of insecurity can lead people to do all sorts of ridiculous things as they try to prove their superiority to those about them—and to themselves.

It’s a great destroyer of domestic serenity. In one of my congregations is a couple which provides an excellent illustration. The husband, a handsome but insecure man, secretly doubts that he really measures up to the great-lover image he has built for himself. He keeps testing his irresistibility on the girls at the office, and many are only too willing to accommodate. The wife—a beauty who is equally insecure—tries out her charm on the deliveryman, her hairdresser, her doctor, or anyone who happens to be available. What she can’t actually acquire in the way of compliments or propositions, she imagines. To her bridge club she spins story after story of her resistance to masculine advances. Thus this attractive, supposedly well-matched couple, instead of being the happy combination they appear to be, are among the most dissatisfied. Rather than building each other’s ego they seek reassurance elsewhere. They don’t have to fight over finances or in-laws or the usual marital menaces to spoil their relationship. Without fighting at all they can dissolve it long before they reach their tenth anniversary.

Insecurity in college can lead to cheating and nervous breakdowns. The student who has to make A’s—for either personal or parental gratification—can be counted on to step over the line of good conduct or good sense at some point. When he gets out of college and into the business world, the same old drive can cause him to lie, steal, or grow ulcers.

Some of the hardest to tempt of all earthlings are the average-looking, unaggressive, unpretentious people who demand little of life and—paradoxically—often give the most to it without even realizing what they are doing. These are my real challenges. I must concentrate on finding a way of getting to them if I ever expect to make a name for myself in the infernal hierarchy.
Joseph—A Man of Integrity

By Willis L. Breckbill

Jacob, on his deathbed, said of his son:

"Joseph is a fruitful bough,
a fruitful bough by a spring;
his branches run over the wall.
The archers fiercely attacked him,shot at him, and harassed him sorely;
yet his bow remained unmoved,
his arms were made agile
by the hands of the Mighty One of Jacob."

Joseph was a man of integrity. His father said he was unmoved. The word integrity carries the thought of soundness of moral principle. But beyond this, the state of being whole, or integrated. During three important phases of Joseph’s life he maintained his integrity.

There was rivalry among Joseph’s siblings because of the honor Jacob gave his favorite son. His brothers schemed and sold him to merchants who carried him to Egypt. The father was made to believe that Joseph was killed by a wild beast. He was heartbroken. His sons remained impenitent. In Egypt Joseph was bought by the captain of the guard as a servant. He worked well and soon became the overseer in the officer’s house. One day while Joseph was about his work he was invited to immorality by the officer’s wife. But Joseph said, “How then can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God?” The woman was insulted and infuriated so that she falsely accused Joseph. He was sentenced to prison.

Joseph took suffering on the chin. “The Lord was with Joseph and showed him steadfast love.” Soon he was promoted in the prison. All the other prisoners were committed to his care. The Lord was with him and gave him the correct interpretation to the dreams of two of his fellow prisoners. The one was the butler of the king who was restored to his position. But he forgot to give a good word for Joseph. Two long years later when the king had a dream the butler remembered Joseph. On hearing of him the king called for him. When Joseph heard the dream it became clear to him that God would give seven years of plenty, followed by seven years of famine. The king was astonished at the interpretation. He needed someone to manage for him so that the year of famine would not find his nation starving. Joseph was the man.

Joseph was given complete authority over the situation. Visitors from other nations came seeking food. Hunger compelled Joseph’s brothers to seek for food in Egypt. When Joseph saw them he was deeply moved. He helped his brothers face their own sinful scheme of years past. When they recognized him as their brother they were overcome. In Joseph’s integrity he said, “you meant evil against me; but God meant it for good.”

Joseph remained honest
when he faced temptation
when he was afflicted with suffering and when placed in a position of authority.

He was honest with himself,
honest with his brothers and neighbors,
and, most of all, honest with God.
Jesus said in essence, “If your eye is singly focused on God, your whole body will be filled with light, but if your eye is distorted, not focused on God, your life will be filled with darkness.”

By Ernest D. Martin

The prosperity of a certain American Mennonite mushroomed beyond his fondest dreams. He never had it so good, to say nothing of the comparison with his forebears. But, what’s more, the standard of living in his community and church kept climbing and the mass media seduced him to keep buying even more.

One day he thought to himself, “What shall I do about all this? I could live on less than I do, but since I’m making more we will be able to get some of the finer things of life, like a bigger and fancier car, and the latest color TV; and we can eat a little better and take more trips.

“I suppose I could invest more in the mission of the church if I would cut back a little, but I think I’ll put more money in some of these high return investments, even though I hear some of the companies are war oriented and unscrupulous in ethics. That way I will be able to give a little more to the Lord’s work and have more for myself and my family besides. I just can’t forget my family.

“I like the secure feeling of knowing I don’t need to worry about having plenty to take care of our needs; and we just need so much more these days to live decently. I like the good feeling of dressing just as well as the next fellow and letting it show just a little that I’ve made it in this economic rat race. Since I have it I may as well enjoy some of it, I say.”

But the Lord said, “You selfish fool! Such unfaithful stewardship makes you unfit to live. You act as if the blessings I have given you are for your private consumption. You could well afford to invest increasing percentages of your income in My work, but no, you spend it on yourself while My work gets cut back. You think in terms of the comforts of this life rather than of eternal values. You congratulate yourself on what you give, but it has not been at any sacrifice whatsoever to your ease.”

So it is with those who think they are children of God, but have in reality sold out to the materialism of this age.

If you want to find out how good a memory you have, try to remember what you were worrying about a year ago today.—Carl Yoder.

Christianity Today magazine has advised a Disciples of Christ agency to weigh carefully the arguments against participation in a 1973 national evangelistic crusade lest it be forced to begin "posthumous excommunication proceedings" against the denomination's founder.

The evangelical fortnightly responded editorially to a decision of the United Christian Missionary Society to postpone until March a decision on an evangelism campaign launched by Dr. Carl F. H. Henry and others.

A request for endorsement of the project was made to the society, a major program unit, by the Board of Evangelism of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ).

In Holland: The Dutch hierarchy has, with finality, rejected all efforts of the Vatican to impose its discipline on the Netherlands. The immediate question happens to be the celibacy of the priesthood as imposed by Vatican decree, which the Dutch Pastoral Council of bishops, priests, and elected laymen rejected by a vote of 93 to 2, despite the pleas of Pope Paul.

This vote was so overwhelming and defendant there are predictions that the Dutch Catholic Church may break away from Rome completely and establish itself as an independent branch of the "Universal Church." According to dogma, the Vatican must then declare the Dutch church to be guilty of heresy. Can the Vatican afford this, with dissent so vigorous and open elsewhere? If Pope Paul relents, then what of his authority?

In a recent article in Christianity Today (Sept. 12), Dr. John A. Mackay takes current ecumenical leaders to task for losing missionary vision as they pursue global Christianity. He feels that the original ecumenical movement stressed both mission and unity but that "now unity is not for mission. Unity is for unity. This obsession with unity for its own sake, this movement towards sentiment in structure with no clear understanding of or commitment to the task of a united church locally or in the world, is what I call ecumenicalism." It is his opinion, that "the ecumenical movement tends to be less and less motion outwards and onwards towards frontiers. It becomes instead increasingly motion towards the realization of an ordered, ecclesiastical structure. In a subtle manner, dedication to mission becomes merely the pursuit of harmony."

Let us go on to quote four of his points to see how this concentration on unity has veered from the objectives of mission outreach and church growth:

"One: In view of the religious nominalism that marks the lives of the majority of the men and women who have been baptized and confirmed in churches of the Protestant tradition, should not priority be given to a united movement toward spiritual awakening in these churches rather than to a top-level, ecclesiastical effort to merge church denominations and confessions in a single organizational structure?

"Two: When Christian unity is equated with institutional oneness and episcopal control and when both of these are regarded as indispensable for real unity, let this not be forgotten — the most unified ecclesiastical structure in Christian history was the Hispanic Catholic Church, which was also the most spiritually sterile and the most disastrously fanatical.

"Three: Would it not be wise to consider the fact that in the Roman Catholic Church there are more than 600 orders that do not function under the jurisdiction of the Vatican or of a local bishop, and many of which have had a history of dynamic and creative activity?

"Four: Dare the phenomenon be ignored that many of the most dynamic, creative, and cooperative Christian enterprises of our time are being carried on in this nation and around the world by men and women who, while loyal to their own denomination, work in a truly ecumenical spirit with Christians of other denominations to achieve important Christian objectives?"

Increasing numbers of men in uniform are finding that their consciences will not let them continue in the armed forces as combatants.

There are provisions for the reassignment and discharge of conscientious objectors, but the agonies of claiming exemption from combatant or military duty are many.

There is a great need for draft counselors, pastors, and others to share in the struggles of these young men who conclude, after becoming a part of the armed forces, that their participation in war is morally wrong.

Dropping a nonactive member from the congregation's rolls sometimes develops into a form of evangelism.

That's the claim of the pastor of Ascension Lutheran Church in Charlotte, N.C. The congregation's inactive members were notified last fall that they would be dropped from membership rolls if they did not respond to messages and visits from the minister and the church elders.

The move to oust "completely inactive members" has proved that "excommunication is actually a form of evangelism," said Dr. Leslie F. Frerking, pastor.

He said about 112 members were contacted personally and privately by the church's clergymen and part of this group later were approached by the elders and reminded of their church vows in a letter that also went to the rest of the congregation.

The series of letters and personal calls to the 112 dropouts "has already brought 49 back into the church" and "they have resumed attendance and participation," Dr. Frerking reported.

A special "litany of confession" intoned as mourning for New York's tragic addicts on dope was prepared and observed by the Good Shepherd Faith Presbyterian Church.

"We would rather have the police confront addicts than to confront them ourselves," the parishioners admitted. "Forgive us, Lord. We have not cried out at injustice or proclaimed the acceptable day of the Lord. We buy that myth about solving our problems by taking the right pill. Forgive our foolishness."

The February 3 chapel period had begun as many others before it, with several of Asbury College's 1,000 students selected to offer a word of testimony in Hughes Auditorium.

When the 50-minute service ended many students still were on their feet waiting to speak. A faculty member walked to the microphone and suggested the singing of a hymn of dedication. Approximately half the student body moved to the altar during the hymn, and the marathon 185-hour spiritual revival was on.

Students from the Wilmore, Kentucky, school traveled across the country to share the blessings and the fire began to spread. In Azusa Pacific College, Azusa, Calif., an Asbury student simply shared with the school what was happening in Kentucky and suddenly the 850 undergraduate students felt the strange conviction that Holy Spirit power had gripped their campus.

February 9 was the start of spiritual emphasis week at Wheaton (Ill.) College. Pastor Raymond C. Ortlund of Lake Avenue Congregational Church of Pasadena, Calif., was the guest speaker and again heaven touched earth as students poured out their hearts from 7:00 p.m. to 7:00 a.m. in an all-night prayer and witness in Edman Chapel.
Yoder Elected Seminary Head

John H. Yoder, professor of theology at Goshen Biblical Seminary, has been elected its president by the Mennonite Board of Education.

Yoder, 42, will assume the presidency on July 1, will be the first president to be responsible solely for the seminary’s affairs. Paul Mininger has served since 1954 as president of Goshen College and Biblical Seminary, which existed as one institution in the past.

The president-elect is considered a leader in Mennonite theological and mission efforts and a spokesman of the Mennonites and of the concept of the free church in the wider Christian brotherhood in evangelical and ecumenical circles in this country and abroad. He has written two books and numerous pamphlets, papers, and reviews, and translated two Dutch works. Two books on war and peace and one on Anabaptist origins are currently ready for publishing. In addition, he has had extensive experience in overseas mission, relief, and service efforts and has been a participant in two Mennonite World Conferences.

John E. Lapp, of Lansdale, Pa., a member of the Seminary Board of Overseers, said, “God has men who are prepared for the tasks of the hour. John H. Yoder is such a man for today. In these days when the Mennonite Church is recovering and experiencing the renewal of its heritage, an Anabaptist is needed to interpret this faith. Students preparing for the ministry need the leadership of one who has not only pioneered in the background of our historic faith but also can relate it and its biblical applications to today.”

Walter Hochstetler, a seminary senior and the student representative on the Presidential Selection Committee, is enthusiastic about the choice of John Yoder as the next president.

He said, “The deep questions of the meaning of faithful Christian discipleship today demand the most brilliant, charismatic, pioneering leadership available. J. H. Yoder is eminently qualified to continue and expand his leadership to the church, and particularly in the preparation of future congregational leaders.”

Because Goshen Biblical Seminary is a partner in Associated Mennonite Biblical Seminaries, John H. Yoder will be one member of a team of administrators. He will serve with Erland Wattner, president of Mennonite Biblical Seminary, the other partner in the Association, and Ross T. Bender, the dean shared by both seminaries, in carrying out their common academic program. In addition to presidential duties, John H. Yoder will continue his research and teaching, as will the other two administrators.

The choice of Professor Yoder came after meetings and consultations by a selection committee, which began its work last September. In the seven-member group were Harvey Bauman and Orrin Smucker, representing the Mennonite Board of Education Executive Board; Richard Yordy and James Kratz, Seminary Board of Overseers; Millard C. Lind, faculty; Walter Hochstetler, students; and Ronald Kennel, alumni.

The group received counsel from many bodies, including the staffs of both seminaries, Goshen College faculty, executive committees of conferences supporting the seminary, alumni, and the Board of Trustees of Mennonite Biblical Seminary.

Relations with Churches Emphasized

With its presidential recommendation, the selection committee proposed the appointment of a staff person to “relate to the churches, giving theological leadership in the direction of our clarified vision.” This person is to be a man with substantial experience in congregational leadership to work with congregations and conferences in fulfilling their leadership needs and help them face critical issues in life today. He would also help channel the gifts of the faculty to the church.

In a business session in mid-March, and partly in response to John Yoder’s recommendation, the Seminary Board of Overseers acted to call such a staff person to complement the leadership of the new president.

Seminary Separate from College

The Goshen Biblical Seminary has been a graduate seminary since 1946. In 1958 it entered into a cooperative relationship with Mennonite Biblical Seminary, in which library facilities were shared and the academic program coordinated to avoid costly duplication.

Last fall, after more than a decade of congenial experience, the Goshen Biblical Seminary moved to the campus of the Associated Mennonite Biblical Seminaries, 3003 Benham Avenue, Elkhart, which is also the campus of Mennonite Biblical Seminary. Goshen Biblical Seminary (earlier known as Goshen College Biblical Seminary) now has its own Board of Overseers (since last summer), and continues to have its own faculty, registration requirements, degree-granting responsibilities, and financial needs.

Native of Ohio

The president-elect is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Howard C. Yoder, of Gasche Street, Wooster, Ohio. He is a great-grandson of C. Z. Yoder, of Wooster, Ohio, a pioneer leader in the work of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities.

By special arrangement John H. Yoder has accepted an assignment under the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities and the Evangelical Mennonite Theological Seminary, of Montevideo, Uruguay, to teach at the interdenominational Institute of Higher Theological Studies of Buenos Aires for the academic year 1970-71.

Richard Yordy, chairman of the seminary Board, said, “It is workable for John Yoder to carry out this mission without calling an acting president. Indeed, this is part of the flexibility of an administrative team, which can provide for continuity of leadership while a member may have a special assignment in the church or be on leave.”

In South America, John Yoder will exemplify the seminary’s role as servant to the church to help prepare persons and develop their skills in communicating theology to all parts of the world in the current day.

Mrs. Yoder is the former Anne-Marie Guth, of France. The Yoders have six children.

Consultation on Church-State Concerns

Since the autumn of 1967 a special committee of eight brethren who were appointed by the Committee on Peace and Social Concerns has held five meetings for discussion of church-state concerns. These persons — Edward B. Stoltzfus, chairman; George R. Brunk, J. Richard Burkholder, Paul G. Landis, John A. Lapp, Sanford G. Schetler, John H. Yoder, and John Otis Yoder — have looked at many of the concerns which face the church in the seventies. The theological basis and the historical background of witness to government have been debated and discussed. They are now ready for the church to become involved in a larger consultation.

The Committee on Peace and Social Concerns is therefore calling such a consultation to be held in the Central Church, Archbold, Ohio, April 15-17, 1970. The meetings will begin at noon on Wednesday and close at noon on Friday. It is open to all persons who are interested, and they are invited to become actively involved in the discussions. Special efforts will be made for proper representation of all the district conferences through their officers and/or peace committees. Students from the three church colleges and the two seminaries, editors and writers for church publications, as well as representatives of the WMSA, are urged to attend and participate.

There are two particular topics which will be discussed: Forms of the Church's Witness to Government and Forms of the Church's Obedience and Disobedience to Government. The meeting will be introduced by the Chairman of the Committee on Peace and Social Concerns, and the chairman of the subcommittee will be in charge of the discussions. Speakers include: John E. Lapp, John A. Lapp, Sanford G. Shetler, John H. Yoder, George R. Brunk, J. Richard Burkholder, and Clayton Beyler.

Christopher Dock to Host Mission ’70

Activity continues to accelerate among the 18 committees responsible for local arrangements for Mission ’70, according to Ivan Kauffmann, secretary for Information Services at Mennonite Board of Missions. Kauffmann is serving as the Board liaison to members of Franconia Mennonite Conference in Eastern Pennsylvania who are working behind the scenes to help make the General Board’s 64th annual meeting become reality.

Mission ’70, scheduled for July 1-7, will be held on the campus of Christopher Dock High School, located off Forty-Foot Road between Kulpsville and Hatfield, Pa. The campus, founded in 1954, has five buildings, including a more recently constructed auditorium-cafeteria. Kauffmann pointed out that action is being taken to secure additional portable facilities to accommodate the large crowds expected for the public sessions of July 2-4.

The Mennonite Yearbook lists more than 30 Mennonite congregations situated within a 20-mile radius of Christopher Dock. This should serve as an indication that adequate housing will be available for out-of-town guests, Kauffmann said. Persons living a good distance from the meeting site are encouraged to make plans now to attend with the assurance that they will be lodged in area homes.

Christopher Dock School is conveniently located two miles east of the Northeast Extension of the Pennsylvania Turnpike (Lansdale exit).

Mission ’70, a convention that will spotlight every member of the family, is being constructed upon the biblical foundation, “The Spirit of the Lord upon Me” from Luke 4:18, 19.

SST Students Do the Unexpected

Some SST students find themselves doing tasks they never dreamed they would do.

Ronnie Lee Yoder, 23, at the beginning of his seven-week service assignment last fall, ran routine errands in the Grecia (Costa Rica) Hospital and helped as he could in the emergency room. He brought to the assignment several years of experience as an orderly and operating-room technician, experience gained during high school and service.

He lived in the home of Edgar Chaveri, director of the hospital and also a surgeon. When he found out how much “Papa Yoyo” (as he was affectionately known) knew about routine procedures, he gave Yoder additional responsibilities in the understaffed emergency room and requested him to help as needed elsewhere in the hospital.

As a result, Yoder, a college sophomore aiming for a career in medicine, had the chance to observe and gain unusual experience which is withheld, except in... very special cases, until students are in the second or even later years of medical school.

He was on hand to assist in the delivery of three babies, and in surgery, including hernia repairs, Cesarean section, gastrectomy, appendectomy, tonsillectomy, and minor operations. In the emergency room, for example, he treated boils, cuts, and bruises, and prescribed certain medicines under the supervision of the doctor.

The Junior Chamber of Commerce of Grecia dubbed him an honorary member because he gave a pint of blood for a patient suffering from a bleeding ulcer who was to submit to surgery.

College physician Willard S. Krabill visited Grecia while Yoder was serving at the hospital and was very pleased with the work Ronnie was doing. He said, "It was apparent that Ronnie’s service in the hospital was a needed and valuable service, and that a mutual regard and rapport had developed between Ronnie and his associates (and supervisors) at the hospital which exemplified the goal of the SST experience."

Yoder is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Yoder, of Tuttle Avenue, Sarasota, Fla.

It is interesting to note that last summer, also in Grecia, another SST'er helped save a child’s life. The hospital had ordered an oxygen tent, but when it arrived, no one could read the English instructions. And to make matters worse, a small boy with breathing difficulties required the use of such an apparatus.

Rita Conrad, then a college senior, put the tent together and began its operation in time to help relieve the child's problem.

Miss Conrad is a native of Wakuras, Ind. She received the BA degree in biology last August. She is now studying medical technology in Colorado Springs, Colo.

Semarang Church Ordains Pastor

Ordination services were held for Samuel Setianto, pastor of the Semarang Mennonite Church (G.K.M.I. — Muria Synod), on Dec. 2, 1969. A graduate of the Evangelical Institute of Indonesia in Batu, East Java, Samuel had already served the Semarang congregation as acting pastor since 1966 when he was ordained as an evangelist.

Semarang, the capital of Central Java and the third largest city of Indonesia, is also important as the headquarters of the Muria (Chinese) Mennonite Church. While the Javanese Mennonite Church is predominantly rural, the Muria synod is strongly urban. The Semarang congregation illustrates this well.

Started in 1958 as an outpost of the Djepara (Japara) congregation, which was concerned about providing a spiritual home for the many young people of its denomination studying in Semarang, it met during the first two years as a house church. By 1960 the first baptism was held, with five couples joining the church. By this time the group which met for worship was too large for the house in which meetings were held, so an arrangement was made with the Reformed Church (G.P.I.B.) to use its large, old Immanuel Church building for Sunday afternoon worship services.

In spite of the fact that the congregation did not have the services of a full-time pastor, growth was rapid. During the period 1965-68 a total of 98 persons were baptized, plus 40 more in three outposts.

The coming of Samuel Setianto in 1966 and the acquisition of a building of its own in 1967 enabled the congregation to intensify its ministry and outreach. Sunday school teachers, mostly students, have a midweek preparation meeting with the pastor and then spread out over the city on Sunday morning to some ten locations. By 1969 house churches had begun in four locations, including the university town of Salatiga, about 40 miles south of Semarang.

In addition to this local ministry, the congregation has opened an amateur radio station, "Ionthu," to extend its outreach via a new medium, and at the request of the synod, has been responsible for editing and publishing the church’s monthly magazine, G.K.M.I. News. Its choir, "Mazmur Ria," is well known in Semarang Church and civic circles and around the Muria area outside of Semarang.

At the time of the ordination of this first pastor, the Semarang congregation numbered 204 adult members, with 44 additional members in three outposts/house churches. By this time also the building acquired in 1967 had been sufficiently remodeled to be adequate for all of the congregation’s activities, including the Sunday worship.

Javanese Mennonites Open New School

Official opening services for a new school to train teachers of religion were held recently by the Javanese Mennonite Church. Twenty-six students from junior high schools had been accepted by opening day, Feb. 7, for the three-year program.

Although sponsored by the church, the school is an integral part of the government’s education program which requires the teaching of religion in all schools beginning with the elementary level. Students at the new school will receive instruction in general high school subjects and pedagogy, in addition to the specific Christian subjects. On graduation they receive a government diploma qualifying them to become teachers of Christian religion at the elementary school level. In public schools, they are paid by the government.

The first clause of Indonesia’s Pancasila concept is belief in the one God. After the abortive 1965 communist coup, the government has intensified its emphasis on religious and moral training, since it was the atheistic element which was held responsible for the 1965-66 political chaos. The present stress on teaching of religion in the schools is seen by the church as an opportunity for evangelism and a civic responsibility to which it should give full attention. Before it can begin supplying schools with fully qualified teachers, the church’s Commission on Christian Education has placed more than 200 part-time temporary teachers in schools in the Muria area.

During its first year, the new school is operating in a rented building with a staff of 16 part-time teachers, including several faculty members of AKWW, the Mennonite seminary in Pati, and a number of local ministers. Acting principal is the pastor of the Pali congregation, Mrs. Esther Santianto. The Pali school is only the fourth of its kind to be opened in the province of Central Java, which has a population of over 25 million people.

Words of Comfort in Toba

"But we would not have you ignorant, brethren, concerning those who are asleep. . . . And so we shall always be with the Lord. Therefore comfort one another with these words” (1 Thess. 4:13-18).

On Feb. 22 missionary Bible translator Albert Buckwalter had occasion to read this passage at the funeral of the 24-year-old son of Toba church leader Juan Acosta. His attendance at the funeral was providential, since Toba Indian funerals are generally restricted to the immediate families.

On a routine visit to a local Toba church the Buckwalders overtook three men in a farm wagon hauling a crude coffin. The Indians were acquaintances and told of the sudden death of the youth the previous day. Juan Acosta, father of the deceased, has been an active leader in the Argentine Chaco for over a decade.

In a letter received Mar. 12 at Mennonite Board of Missions, Buckwalter commented on some of the entrenched Indian beliefs: "We wonder how much Christian faith has altered the basic beliefs handed down from past generations. One mother was overheard warning her child to never again mention the name of the deceased, for it is believed the dead one's spirit will overhear and come to do harm. A house in which a death occurs cannot be used until it is dismantled and moved or drastically remodeled. Death is accompanied by fear and foreboding.

"Alongside these primitive beliefs the declaration can be heard that the loved one has gone to be with the Lord," he continued. "At the request of the family, I read from 1 Thessalonians 4. How thankful I was that I had Scripture in Toba to read for such an occasion."

Buckwalter and his associate Orlando Sanchez recently completed the translation of 1 Thessalonians into the Toba language. First and Second Timothy, Acts, and Titus have also been translated, as have 80 manuscript pages of Old Testament stories. The reactions of readers to the tentative edition of the books of Timothy and Titus will help to iron out rough spots in translation and help to minimize dialect variations.

The Buckwalters request prayers that the problems of dialect variations and selection of adequate vocabulary will not distract attention from the message which the translation into Toba is intended to clarify. The family has served in South America with Mennonite Board of Missions since 1950.

Inter-Mennonite Meeting Planned for Winnipeg

A special Mennonite gathering is being planned for July 16-19, 1970. The idea for this meeting emerged out of former Inter-Mennonite Ministers' Fellowship meetings. A third such meeting was held in Chicago in the spring of 1968. At that time a very meaningful fellowship developed, and there was a growing conviction that such opportunities ought to be shared on a broader basis, giving laymen, as well as ministers, opportunity for such fellowship and sharing.

The Interchurch Relations Committee of Mennonite General Conference then recommended to the General Council that consideration be given to the development of such a conference. The General Council then asked the North American Presidium members of Mennonite World Conference to call a representative meeting to explore this possibility. These representatives met and, in turn, appointed a Planning Committee with representation from the major Mennonite bodies.

The meeting is to be held in Winnipeg July 16-19. It will be an invitational conference. Each Mennonite group has been given a quota of delegates in proportion to its total membership. Our group may have a total of 150 delegates. The invitations are being extended through the district conferences which have been assigned quotas in proportion to their conference membership. Invitations have not been issued to institutions or organizations as such. It is not intended that this should be a gathering of persons representing institutions or organizations. We will expect to have a sufficient number of these present to give the participants of the Mennonite family opportunity to become acquainted with some of the Mennonite leaders, but the primary purpose is to give occasion for members of our churches to engage in a common search of what the Bible has to say to us. For this reason it has been suggested that there be a distribution of delegates with only about 20 percent of the participants being ministers, 40 percent laymen, and about 40 percent youth. It is also recommended that the last two categories be divided equally between men and women.

The day sessions will focus upon small-group Bible studies. The evening sessions will be of an inspirational nature and will be open to the general membership and the Winnipeg community, in particular.

Even though a total quota of 600 delegates has been established for the day sessions, this is not considered a rigid figure. Additional persons who may wish to participate are free to write to the Chairman of the Planning Committee, Alleghenone North American Bible Congress, Mennonite Building, Scottdale, Pa. 15683, and express their interest in participating in this meeting. It is expected that persons registering for the meeting will participate in all sessions.

Serving on the Planning Committee are: Howard J. Zehr of the Mennonite Church (chairman); Dennis Becker, Mennonite Brethren Church; Jake Pauls, General Conference Mennonite Church; Alvin Burkholder, Brethren in Christ; Reuben Short, Evangelical Mennonite Church; and Ernie Isaac, representing the Winnipeg area pastors.

Herald Press Books in Other Tongues

The Finnish publisher of Christian literature Ristin Voitto/ry, located in the town of Tikkurila, Finland, has entered into an agreement with the Mennonite Publishing House to translate The Bible Smuggler by Louise A. Vernon and Search to Belong by Christmas Carol Kauffman for serialization in their children's paper, Hyoa Paumen (The Good Shepherd). At the same time Ristin Voitto requested copies of Lucy Winchester and Night Preacher for possible publication in Finnish at a later date.

The appearance of these publications in Finnish is but the latest chapter in a long history of translations and adaptations of Herald Press editions in other languages. In addition there have been reprints in other English-speaking parts of the world, such as Australia, adaptations for radio programs and at least one reworking of a book into a play. Four Herald Press books have been translated twice: Alpha and Omega by Paul Erb, in Japanese (1957) and Spanish (1960); Search to Belong by Christmas Carol Kauffman, in Norwegian (1963) and now in Finnish; Meditations for the New Mother by Helen Good Brenneman, in Japanese (1961) and in Portuguese (1963). Henry's Red Sea by Barbara Smucker was published in German (1961) and in Hindi (1961).

In addition, parts or all of the summer Bible school materials, Bible correspondence materials, and nearly all of the Mennonite books, statements, and pamphlets on war, peace, and nonresistance have been translated and/or adapted into so many languages that it becomes difficult to keep track of them. The languages range from the traditional Western tongues, with German and Spanish heading the list, to Swahili, Arabic, Somali, Amharic; plus the tribal dialects of Bulu and Basa spoken in Cameroun, and Tshiluba, a Bantu language, in all Africa; and Hindi, Chinese, Korean, and Japanese in Asia. And six years ago the Bible correspondence course, God's Great Salvation, was produced in braille in Sierra Leone.

As publishers go Herald Press, a division of the Mennonite Publishing House, is small in the world of printing and publishing, but that does not limit the extent to which their books are circulated or their influence.

With the large influx of new members into the church here, the need for trained workers remains acute, both for the task of evangelism and the longer job of teaching the new converts.

Cecil Ashley writes from Lapa, S.P., Brazil: “We want to send a special note of thanks for the extraordinary efforts made in caring and providing for the Latin America Youth Team. These young people have been enriched as they have felt the pulse of the Mennonite Church on both sides of the border, and they have seen the risen Lord in the lives of numerous of His youthful servants. I had never participated in such a reception as we had at the airport. Yet the reception was more than Brazilian; it was distinctly Christian, as quiet expressions of ‘thanks be to God’ filled the air as we listened to Jaime and Marlie give us an exclusive interview. Together they are being scheduled to appear in each of our churches during the coming weeks. Pray with us that these lives may count for the kingdom of our God.”

Mario Snyder, Moron, Argentina, submits some current prayer requests: “For leadership training courses (May-June) in a suburb called Castillo, four miles south; for the kindergarten, that it will open new doors and people’s hearts; for a pastor/missionary, who will go to Rio Negro province and help the Siebers in the new work there; for the building programs in Cordoba and La Plata churches, where much money is needed to go ahead; for a moving of the Spirit of God that will move church and community people to worship and serve Christ our Lord.”

Mrs. Lawrence Greaser writes from Albonito, Puerto Rico: “There was a short ceremony the afternoon of Mar. 8 at the entrance of our street with various speakers participating, the cutting of a ribbon and the placing of a street sign which reads George D. Troyer Street. The activity was organized and carried through by a group of active Catholic laymen who wish to bring a spiritual consciousness to the community. The speakers were members of the community — the mayor, Adonna Nissley (representing the Mennonite conference), a local doctor, the Catholic priest, Lester Hershey, and finally Lawrence, speaking for the family.”

Marie Moyer, Jhansi, U.P., India, reports: “Work is going well here. I’ve been giving time to 1970 promotion for vacation Bible school throughout India in coordination with the VBS supply office in Bangalore. We also produce a quarterly Christian education bulletin in Hindi which 1 edit.”

Readers Say

Submissions to Readers Say column should comment on printed articles.

Due to distance, we get our Gospel Herald late, and sometimes in reverse order. Having just read your article on tongues—Sign of the Spirit?—it was quite a disappointment to read the comments in the following issue regarding this manifestation of the Holy Spirit. In the church in which I am a member, there is not an easy one. I want to commend you for the integrity with which you have conducted yourself in your position.

While bedfast with flu, I’ve been trying to catch up on my reading. Yesterday, Christianity Today came. In the column “A Layman and His Faith” by L. Nelson Bell, the article “Another Gospel” seemed to me like a voice in the wilderness. I was wondering if the Holy Spirit could’ve been involved in the Gospel Herald for the benefit of the many who don’t subscribe to the magazine? This morning, while I hovered between sleep and wakefulness (was I dreaming or thinking?) I was writing. My article had no title but the burden was our willingness to spend and even borrow to obtain luxuries which by some strange metamorphosis have become necessities. Twenty or so years ago there was a question in the minds of many as to whether it was right for us to have deep-freezes (a luxury then) in view of world need. I recall reading an article (in Christian Living) written by a mother who was saving up to buy a living room rug. But a vision of greater needs caused her to forget that luxury (or is it a necessity?) and contribute over $20 to the need she saw.

Hertzel also says that the woman in Revelation 12 is evidently the church. Israel bore a son to the world but when did the church?

Time and space do not permit me to go on, but after studying the article I find it more puzzling and confusing than the puzzling passages of Ezekiel and the other prophets.—Orvil Crossgrove, International Falls, Minn.

No Business as Usual

By John M. Drescher

Sometimes we understand a present situation better by reflection on the past. At the start of a new decade it may do us good to review. We have emerged from a decade some describe as the sick-sixties. Others see the sixties as full of striking accomplishments. It was much of both.

It was a decade of action and reaction. Nationally, four presidents served in so short a time. One was slain, making our country one who killed more leaders of state than any other nation in so short a time. Kennedy’s successor, although elected by the largest landslide vote ever, lost the confidence of the country in a few years.

It was a decade of social and racial conflict. Violence and bloodshed spread like a grass fire from city to city. We began what has become the longest war in our history. Something new, no doubt to all political history, was the protesting in large scale, of youth and population against military solutions while at war. America has become the country to escape from, with more than 60,000 youth having left our land to escape the draft.

Scientifically, we shot men to the moon while we continued to snuff out life on earth with smog and cigarette smoke.

It was a decade of the gap, the credibility gap, the performance gap, the generation gap. It was a decade of drugs and dropouts, revolution and reformation, utter poverty and unbelievable affluence.

Religiously, the years were turbulent. Theology was in a flux with teenagers and many of their teachers turning from long-held traditions. There was the rapid growth of church alumni with many preachers and priests going a-fishing or a-marrying. There was a rapid rise of old and new religions. Anglican bishop Ralph Dean, speaking of the church, diagnosed the illness of the church as terminal when he voiced the feelings of many, “I give the institutional church . . . ten years of life.”

We could say that in the sixties, theologians seemed to rival one another in bringing up one new fad after another. And each one who said, “I can say something more startling than you” found plenty of faithful followers and defenders.

In the sixties we saw the renewal of the old liberal-conservative debate focusing on evangelism vs social gospel.

A moral upheaval ushered us into the era of the looser ethic. All were compelled to reassess old norms — the reasons we held them, and the church did a lot of overhauling and restating.

In the midst of a great ecumenical push we saw a taking of sides on the right and the left — with the same spirit governing those on opposite poles. Each showed the same arrogance, the same judgmentalism, the same bigotry, the same pigeonholing, and the same labeling.

The sixties saw a weakening of denominationalism with decreasing denominational differences. This weakening began with the ecumenical thrust at the top level. Now with a dissipation of the ecumenical thrust on the national and world level it is at the local level where members find fellowship across denominational lines. Here less and less stress is put upon structural and denominational differences.

The sixties saw rapid change also in the Mennonite Church. All of the above has had its effect on our church. It was a decade of relating to other groups. Whereas a few years ago we were searching for solutions in how to relate to the ecumenical councils, today we need guidance in how we relate on the local level to the neighboring congregation or Full Gospel Business Men’s Fellowship.

With this we experienced a decreasing denominational loyalty. It became clear that the church cannot claim allegiance merely because people are Mennonites. Church loyalty by itself will no longer claim attendance, bring in funds, or subscriptions. Our people want to know our product and program and they compare them with others. We must admit we lived in a large part in the past on the loyalty of our people. The impact of the mass media has yet to be evaluated but all of us share a part of the brainwashing which has gained tremendous expertise the last decade. All of us purchase and evaluate too much with a mass media mind.

During the last decade we saw a loosening of control as we searched for new methods and meanings of discipline and discernment. Members are less inclined to be bound in belief or conduct on the basis of church authority alone. Overall conference and denominational structures mean less and less at the local level. Indeed many such are suspect. Certainly this is not all bad. Perhaps the church has taken our preaching seriously when we point to the local body as the place where the work of the church must be done.

The sixties was a service decade. Youth and many middle-aged and retired persons scattered over the globe to serve in all kinds of situations.

Much more could be mentioned about the sixties — the problem and potential of affluence, the opportunities for building relationships, the new freedom. Not all was bad by any means. A new kind of freedom and commitment emerged during the decade. Despairing of the old securities, particularly on the part of youth, may open the door to a costly commitment which the church has always pleaded for. Today youth will be committed to some cause. Can the church capture this commitment?

The freedom introduced has opened the minds of many to all kinds of currents of concern but also to the wind of the Spirit. And if the church seizes this opportunity of openness it might find in it the fulfillment of the prophecy of Joel. For only a mighty movement of a supernatural character will crack the crust of deadness in what is a cold and calloused Christianity. Many times in the sixties it seemed that God was shaking the things which can be shaken so that we could better see the things which remain.

Predictions

Perspectives of the sixties provided plenty of predictions for the days ahead. Speaking to the Religious Publishers group the Associate Religious Book Editor of Westminster Press listed twenty-five changes and trends which he sees ahead for churches. Speaking to the publishers was Roland W. Tapp. The following is a condensation of these anticipated changes. These are presented not as a position but for thought stimulation.

1. "The church is going to have to go through the fundamentalist-liberal fight of 50 years ago all over again," and with sharper polarization.
2. There will be a growing trend towards merger with Catholics at practical levels; but the cooperation will be between fundamentalists of both groups, and between liberals of both groups.
3. The church will interest only people whose "psychological age" is about 45 years, and up.
4. Total church membership will decrease, but those remaining will be more knowledgeable and committed.
5. More people — not all necessarily Christians — will believe that "the Christian’s primary concern is with social action."
6. Most church school teachers will see their function as "fellow-seekers" with their students.
7. The Consultation on Church Union proposals will be adopted.
8. There will be no more denominational Christian education programs.
9. There will be no more projects for building huge church "plants."
10. Integration of all minorities will become a fact in the churches.
11. The church will give up their tax-exempt status.
12. Foreign missions will be less emphasized, probably replaced by Peace Corps types of action.
13. "Lay academics" will rise in number.
14. Denominational theological seminaries "operating without reference to university level education" will decline.
15. Theology will shift from transcendence and immanance to pantheism (which holds that God is in everything).

16. Along with mergers, boards within denominations will coalesce.
17. "Sermons are out" and so is the Sunday morning worship service.
18. College students and young adults will show increasing interest in religion and specifically in Christianity.
19. "Fellowship" devices will be less help in attracting new members to local churches.
20. There will be "less interest in separate men’s and women’s programs." And "some people will belong to more than one church."
21. TV will be used in church school teaching by clusters of churches in an area.
22. Breakdown of authority, both personal and doctrinal, will be more evident.
23. "The church stands in very great danger of losing the intellectual elite of this country."
24. Resurgent interest in formal worship "is only momentary."
25. The church of AD 2000 will not be recognizable by anyone today.

In addition to these may I add several. There will likely be a continuing psychological schism. That is, divisions will take place more along lines of reaction, likes and dislikes, than along doctrinal or denominational lines. With this the equating of nationalism and Christianity will grow and bring sharper division. There will be sharper distinctions between church and state.

A religious recession will continue before growth will again be seen. For those who stick it out Christianity will become more meaningful. Most Christians have lost the experience of being pilgrims and strangers. In the years ahead the test of discipleship will become increasingly severe. 1 Peter may again become a favorite book to read. We will need to be courageous confessors of the name Christian outside the safe walls of the sanctuary. We will need to be persons who not only know the way, and show the way but also go the way.

Under secular attack the word will need to become flesh as never before. Only one translation of the Scripture will satisfy — the exemplified version.

The coming church will not be Sunday orientated. It will be a church aware that the commission calls not only to be a church at camp on Sunday but also on the march on Monday — that is in work and play, on the seashore and in the factory.

A new openness to the Spirit will be experienced. More emotion will be desired and allowed. A negative approach will give way to a more positive expression of the Christian life. The external will give way to the internal which may do away with a kind of Pharisaism but may also open the door to mere pietism or mysticism. The church will be judged not by its fidelity to religious forms but by the quality of its response to the claims of Christ Himself.

Points for Us

What does all this say for us? I’m not sure. I have a few starters.

It means that we will need to pick our priorities with utmost precision. We cannot do everything. Perhaps now is the time to do our own thing. More than ever a message of re-demptive love, peace, and discipleship is needed. The church is increasingly confronted with people longing for a sense of identity and personal acceptance. We must major in relationships.

With the present youth generation revolting against the security in things a return to the teaching and practice of the simple life seems absolutely essential. With the nation's number one social problem listed as the breakdown of the family, we have a job to do here.

The years ahead will demand a pure and simple faith in the Scripture which does not stagger at the promises of God.
It will call for a clear message of conversion through Christ and growth in Christ. We must beware of becoming expert in activities of all kinds while our spiritual life withers and wilts away. Time magazine, Dec. 19, 1969 says, "The most significant trend of the seventies may well be a religious revival." The seventies will demand faithfulness in speaking out on the serious moral issues of today — war, slaughter on highways, fast death in the ghettos, hunger, the peril of plenty, etc. It will demand moral involvement in the life of man in society. Here I do not speak of political positions or pressures etc. I refer to what stabbed the hearts of those who heard Jesus say, "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the brokenhearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord."

His hearers were so severely stabbed they took Him to the top of a hill and tried to throw Him headlong over the cliffs because He dared to place Himself on the side of the needs of the people rather than the needs of institutions.

The church will need to do some serious weight watching.
Boards and committees have a secret way of multiplying.
There is going to be increasing criticism for all it takes to keep the machine going. We need to weigh whether General Conference can expect an increasing budget or even maintain the present one. Practically all boards of the large denominations have already drawn back on programs and budgets.

Does this say anything to us?

When our Russian brethren were in the U.S. several years ago some of us asked them what they can do if there is no
Sunday school, no this and that. The reply was worth repeating. "It is true we do not have many such programs. But we can do all we need to do to be the church." We need to discern what being the church is in our situation.

Even though the church as we know it may not be recognizable in 2000, yet the church will be around. History records that few had faith at the time of Wesley, few had faith in the frontier days of America. Many predicted that Christianity would join the other dead religions by 1900. But Christ has not forsaken His church. The church shall overcome. He shall reign for ever and ever. Paul prays a prayer important for us all. It gives good guidance for discussion.

"And this I pray, that your love may abound yet more and more in knowledge and in all judgment; that ye may approve things that are excellent; that ye may be sincere and without offence till the day of Christ" (Phil. 1:9, 10).
Here are four norms for Christian decision making: a prayerful reliance upon God's grace; the law of love, consideration of the consequences of a decision, and judgment with responsibility in humility.

Holy What?

Several experiences recently indicate clearly that we must be much more creative than we have been in developing study materials for youth. Occasionally the unusual breaks through as in holy now, the pre-Youth Convention, total involvement, experience-related, action-oriented, multimedia material. This only serves to contrast what we can do with what is usually done. It points out also that when we succeed in reaching the "now generation" where it is, we will have no difficulty generating interest in Bible study.

We need to put our most creative and courageous efforts into a regular youth Bible study series. Some have said that the Uniform Lesson format can no longer catch the imagination of young people; it is too print-media-oriented, too stiff, too dry, and much too conservative simply because it is "Uniform." But the problem is not with Uniform curricu-

Nurture Lookout

It is possible to do much better in approach, in format, content, and in keying in to the needs of youth. But then we face another problem. The people in our congregations who decide what should be ordered for youth are not youth. Many are afraid of the issues youth face, or they want answers for today's youth that fitted a past generation. How do we prepare curriculum for youth in our churches that can be understood and appreciated by the older generation who lead in the congregation and who order the material?

The distance between many youth and congregational leaders is vast. We must have a larger vision, one which connects nurture to life where youth live it. That means some rather substantial risks for those who grew up on old style "Uniform." But the other risk, the risk of inculcrating youth with antipathy to any kind of relevant Bible study, is greater if we don't.

Mission Through Education

The operation of schools is one way the Mennonite Church uses to carry out its mission. Education of various kinds and at various age levels is one tool used by the church for transmitting God’s wisdom and for inspiring and equipping people to carry on God’s work in the world.

From their original founding, our Mennonite high schools and colleges have been used to prepare young people for service in the church’s mission. The students’ preparation has consisted partly of direct training in the knowledge and skills required in their work of mission and service, but more particularly the Mennonite schools have provided an acquaintance with Mennonite thought and have stimulated interest and concern for Mennonite goals.

Mission outreach and the operation of schools have developed together in the Mennonite Church. A large proportion of all persons used by the church in mission programs, as well as those in congregational leadership, have had experience in a Mennonite school. Mission board leaders report that at least some experience in a Mennonite high school or college is important if their appointees are to serve effectively in their assignments.

In recent years, Mennonite schools have begun to give students experiences in foreign cultures, and particularly in situations where there are great human needs, to give them a world view and to inspire them and to help get them ready to serve in places of great need.

But schools serve also a direct mission function. Our foreign missions have used education very effectively in their mission outreach. Our schools and other educational efforts at home perform a similar function both for our own children and for others who attend. They are an effective resource in giving young people the knowledge they need to choose Christ and His goals for the investment of their own lives, and they provide a setting for interaction with Christian teachers and students as they develop their aspirations and loyalties.

Mennonite schools, at the elementary, secondary, and higher levels, have been used in the past primarily for the benefit of children and youth from Mennonite homes and congregations, but more and more these schools are serving also others, in order to bring these also to a knowledge of God and His wisdom and to equip them to do God’s work in the world.

The Mennonite colleges have always welcomed any students interested in the Christian emphasis of their programs. They have for many years served international students. In more recent years the colleges have invited students from minority groups in this country to share in the educational services available on the college campuses.

Mennonite high schools are finding ways to serve both minority group students and international students, as well as other community young people interested in the Christian character of these high schools.

Mennonite elementary schools are inviting patronage by non-Mennonite families who wish to use these Christian day school resources.

Mennonite churches have long used summer Bible schools in their own communities, and mission Sunday schools in neighboring communities, as educational tools for reaching children and their families with the gospel. More recently some have administered Head Start programs or have operated day care centers as ways for helping children.

The Mennonite Student Services Committee has concerned itself with the Christian witness on university campuses by Mennonite students, both in the undergraduate and the graduate levels. And Mennonite and related groups are operating subcolleges on university campuses at two locations — Waterloo, Ontario, and Temple University in Philadelphia — designed to make a Christian impact in the university setting.

Is it time for the church to take a serious and concerted look at these and other new possibilities for mission through education? Perhaps we should work more systematically at providing better education for minority groups in our midst.

Perhaps the church could show the way in our secularized society with Christian interpretations of human relations through such subjects as social studies, literature and the arts, as well as in Bible knowledge. Our own schools could be models of an excellence which springs in part from their insights into Christian values; and released time programs in public schools may well serve as a channel for Christian interpretations. The Christian presence in the university through the Mennonite faculty and students on the campus can well help to point to the way of Christ for the intellectual world.

Our world is sick for want of Christ and His values. An important approach to that sickness can be through schools and educational efforts which know and present Christ.

The Minority Ministries Council:

A Call to Action

By John Powell

We are constantly being made aware that the problems involved in the reconciliation of the races are two-sided. White people do not feel committed to understanding black people and their problems. Black people are critical of the whites' negative attitude toward them. As a result, many blacks feel that there aren't any "good" white people. Further, we are aware that the black man is beginning to find an identity within himself, and is rejecting the "white" way of living. In this process, he is "doing his thing."

Black people, in their search for identity, are beginning to reject Christendom. This is further evidenced in the Black Manifesto, which says, with validity, that Christianity has been used by whites to keep blacks enslaved for 400 years. How accurate! A student of history will indeed find that Christianity has been used as the motive for seizure of power in the United States from its beginning. It has also been used as an excuse for the exploitation of Africans brought here as slaves. In fact, the reason given for bringing Africans here was to Christianize them.

Black people have been made to feel, even through the practices of Christianity and the terminology used, that everything white is pure and beautiful and that everything black is bad. This is very clear if one sets down a list of synonyms for white and another for black. Those things which we relate to black are negative; those which we relate to white have a positive connotation. At this point, the majority of black people feel that everything related to Christianity belongs to the white culture, and is therefore to be rejected.

If, then, Christianity has been used falsely to keep black people enslaved, then why should not Christianity, in its truest sense as demonstrated by Christ, be the religion to shake the shackles of bondage for the black man now? It can and must be. If one would look realistically at Christ, he would see a Man who was most violent in a nonviolent way. He was an uncompromising Man who became involved in the crises of His time. He did not tolerate any lowering of morality or the principles of love. He was a Man who spoke of the kingdom of God as the answer to the world's problems. He was not a pacifist, but a pacifist-activist.

I am a Mennonite because I believe we have the basic theological concepts of love and nonresistance to solve the injustices which exist in our world, particularly in the urban situation. However, I must be a realist. Mennonites are not going to respond with full commitment as long as they remain suspicious, isolationist, and worldly (in the sense that when we look at the race problem we view it just as the world does). We are victims of many of the same social ills that plague the rest of "Christian" America. We say that we don't believe in power, yet we possess power and refuse to give it up or share it with those who have none. We revel in our thriftiness and refuse to understand why the disadvantaged can't be like us.

During my nine years in the civil rights struggle, I have come to appreciate Mennonites for at least "trying" to accept blacks. However, let's not put ourselves on the back for a job well done. The job hasn't even begun. There are many turbulent days ahead for white Christians. Blacks and browns are beginning to see the "light" and are challenging white Christians to practice what they so long taught the slaves: "Trust in God; be patient, tolerant, understanding, and nonviolent, and you shall receive your reward in heaven."

The Minority Ministries Council, under the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, has been formed to help us understand and act relevantly as we attempt to cope with the present situation. We are, indeed, involved in a "revolution," one in which the slave is becoming master of his mind and destiny. No longer can we sing "We Shall Overcome" and expect it to happen. All people must respond quickly and relevantly. The end result of this revolution can be a freeing experience. For the black man it can mean becoming equal in society. For the white man it can mean placing his burdens at the feet of his brother in an honest experience of love.

I call on all Christians to be creative and honest in an immediate response. The Minority Ministries Council stands ready and willing to assist in any way possible to see that the Mennonite Church deals with this problem honestly and openly, and responds accordingly.

John Powell is executive secretary of the Minority Ministries Council working with Mennonite Board of Missions. His article was reprinted by permission from the September 1969 Missionary Messenger, the official organ of the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions in Salunga, Pa.
They’re Only Human

By Dorsa J. Mishler

In a treatise on “Thy Holy Spirit in an Age of Administration,” Dr. Wayne E. Oates said that administration is a taboo word among many churchmen. In his circles Oates has observed the tendency of ministers to shy away from church administration, with some gravitating to church institutions. They prefer “to work with people” and not have too much administrative responsibility, only to learn they have moved from the frying pan into the fire.

Taboo or not, administration is often misunderstood. This may be partly due to confusion about the meaning of administration. Or it may come from questioning why a central administration is necessary for church programs. Achieving proper understanding is a justifiable concern, even among the office workers themselves, in order to adequately represent the cause and the constituency.

What do you know about workers in church offices such as mission or service headquarters? Do you have close contact with persons who are serving in this way? Do you know them well enough to realize their concerns, their burdens, their limitations, their visions, their failures and their heartfelt commitments? Learning to know them is an important factor in discovering the purpose of a given church agency because of their involvement with the decision making and program processes. In addition, learning to know them is to discover how human they are.

The church worker is human! He needs to have an awareness of his own limited insights and wisdom. He must realize that Christ’s kingdom is not of this world and right decisions cannot be reached by himself. He needs to learn the possible difference between “what seems right to us” and “what seems good to the Holy Spirit and us,” and then how to apply that difference.

The church worker is not immune to the usual human frailties simply because he is in so-called full-time service. He has weaknesses and strengths, aspirations and discouragements. He has his great moments—the times when right courses are established and the cause is enhanced. He sometimes has a ringside seat while God is at work. But he also experiences the humiliation of failure or the defeat of his own efforts.

He is human, so he experiences human temptations: the temptation of emotional control in decision making, the misuse of power, or feelings of insecurity. There is a need to achieve balance in the use of his time. Family needs must be met and there are often too frequent separations. There may be misunderstandings and needs for reconciliation and healing. He may find himself in the limelight and sense the empty honor of this, when he prefers to be a person.

There are also the joys of seeing things happen. He

Vignette of Love and Sorrow

By J. Mark Stauffer

It was a beautiful Sunday morning; the young father was sitting in a lawn chair by his rented house—a can of beer in his hand, listening to The Mennonite Hour. He was a lovable fellow—courteous, smiling, and with a sparkle in his eye. He had a lovely wife and three vigorous children. But beside the tragedy of his basic estrangement from God, he had one other problem—alcohol!

My friend was addicted; not mildly, but wholly! His health was at stake, his family was frightened and humiliated, and his job was in jeopardy. Seemingly no method or appeal could shake him from the grip of alcoholism. It involved him with the law on numerous occasions, but no permanent change seemed possible.

There was the night, when under the influence, he shot and slightly wounded a man who brought his wife home from work; he hospitalized his wife by knocking her unconscious; he was imprisoned, but not for long. His life seemed one big, long, continuous tragedy, punctuated by incidents of love and sorrow—mostly sorrow!

There was also that certain morning when I found myself standing with my friend and his wife before the judge in the courtroom; the marriage was on the rocks and the judge asked me, in their presence, what I thought about the marital prospects for this relationship.

On one occasion, I walked into the house and was met by the mother-in-law. She said, “Mark, you’re walking into hell” and indeed it seemed so. He had been drinking and was verbally blasting his wife, his mother-in-law, and a visiting friend. This was the time that his wife left him, but that is another story.

I am happy to have met this friend of whom I write; I regret that I was not able to help him more. He wanted, at times, to turn, but he was weak and undisciplined—woefully so! He had never been able to take the first step which Alcoholics Anonymous demands—a confession that states, “We admitted we were powerless over alcohol—that our lives had become unmanageable.”

I don’t know where he is now, but my heart still bleeds—bleeds for one who was told about the saving Christ, but, for some demonic reason, was unable to surrender himself.

Oh God, for those who are so heavily fettered by the imposing power of drink, we pray for the bursting of these chains. We pray for their disheartened companions and their brave little children. May the salvation that comes alone from Thy Son bring freedom and healing. Through Jesus Christ, our loving Lord. Amen.
A Holy Hope

By Willis L. Breckbill

Sometimes Christians are accused of talking about pie in the sky by and by. The accusation has been made that they are of little earthly good because they hardly have their feet on the ground. But the man with an eternal hope brings greater resources to the present-day problems that the one who sees life as only an immediate or passing event. Men important to this world have died in deep despair because their only hope was temporal and humanitarian. Life after death is an unexplainable mystery. But that hardly means that it doesn’t exist.

A professor incessantly brought into his lectures his atheistic position. One day a student asked how much of the world’s knowledge he thought he knew. The professor reluctantly said, “Well, maybe about 3 percent.” The student replied, “Did you ever stop to think that God could be in the other 97 percent?” Elton Trueblood writes, “Absolute proof is something which the human being does not have and cannot have. This follows necessarily from the twin facts that deductive reasoning cannot have certainty about its premises and that inductive reasoning cannot have certainty about its conclusions.” Blaise Pascal asked his fellow scientists, “Who has demonstrated that there will be a tomorrow, and that we shall die?” He knew that all science depends upon assumptions which are incapable of proof.

Having said this, where is hope? Hope is born out of experience. The fruit of faith is evidence of a God who provides. “For through the Spirit, by faith, we wait for the hope of righteousness.”

Hope brings heavenly resources to earthly events. The man with a hope finds the security he needs to deal with the changing present, with the revolutionary forces. God is not changed. Man can hold onto the changelessness of God. His life is lived on earth while his hope is eternal. His power is expressed among men, but received from God. His body grows weaker, but his hope is secure.

Hope purifies a life. The Scripture reports that all must appear before the judgment seat of Christ to give a report of our deeds and misdeeds. God can forgive all sins but He overlooks none. The forgiven man’s hope is not judgment but salvation.

God plants the hope of glory in His servants. Paul said this transcendent power belongs to God. “We are afflicted in every way, but not crushed; perplexed, but not driven to despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; struck down, but not destroyed; always carrying in the body the death of Jesus, so that the life of Jesus may also be manifested in our bodies. . . . So we do not lose heart. Though our outer nature is wasting away, our inner nature is being renewed every day.”

This may be the last day of the week, but it is the first day of the rest of your life. You can begin again. Begin by a faith in God that finds forgiveness of the past; a faith with a purpose; a faith that lets the love of God in and lets it flow out to others; a hope that is holy and purifies your life and motives. Don’t live in the defeats of yesterday. Claim the right to be a son of God with power for right living.

“Begin again! Today is the first day of the rest of your life.”

To Reap the Stars

By Emily Sargent Councilman

A mother, busy as she moves, making home for those she loves—She must cook and clean and mend; she knows of washing without end dirty hands and little faces, of putting things in rightful places, yet ever lovingly alert to ways of healing every hurt . . . her children’s, yes, but often others’; for she sees all men as brothers. No matter creed or color of skin, but is there urgency within to free oppressor or oppressed from hidden hurts, wrongs unconfessed? All who come with mispent will, the lonely, the hungry, the sad, and ill—all find a home within her heart, compassionate, a place apart from where no one is sent unfed.

Life’s miracle, this healing bread! With heaven’s touch for human scars, she reaches out to reap the stars.
The overseas missionary directory appears twice each year—in the last issues of Gospel Herald for March and September. Included on this list are missionaries of all boards of the Mennonite Church—approximately 500 of them.

For your convenience the directory may be lifted off the staples and inserted in your personal devotional material, or in your correspondence folder.

Postage rates are included on the last page. Write to your missionaries, and above all, pray for them.

With the sizable number of overseas missionaries and constant movement of missionary personnel, it may happen that these addresses will be changed toward the end of this list’s use. Gospel Herald attempts to keep these changes clear in its Church News pages.

The numerous names make it difficult to pray meaningfully for them, but if you keep the directory handy as you read mission news or prayer requests in Gospel Herald, you will be able to pray for those in the country and circumstances you are reading about, and by name. Perhaps more than anything else, those whom we send out as a church appreciate our prayer support.

Additional copies of this list are available at no charge from Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, Elkhart, Indiana 46514.

Mennonite Central Committee

A Christian resource for meeting human need

Wretched housing, illiteracy, meager diet and precarious health conditions combine to put these Latin American boys on the marginal list — or in other words, in poverty. They could also be boys in Vietnam, Jordan, Nigeria, in the ghettos of urban America or on the forgotten slopes of Appalachia. Dedicated to a ministry of reconciliation “in the name of Christ,” MCC serves the needs of such boys as these. MCC seeks to witness and serve so that the nature of the inner-man may be freed from the grasp of Evil to respond to God’s love in Christ. You can have a part in channeling Christian compassion to a suffering world. Contribute regularly through your congregational offerings.

Thirty-three Minneapolis-St. Paul area clergymen and professional people have purchased stock in Honeywell, Inc., so that they can attend the corporation's annual meeting and protest its production of weapons.

The procedure follows a similar one earlier by Honeywell Project, an antirwar group.

"We cannot believe Honeywell's stockholders prefer their corporation to devote its expertise to making war materials," said Rev. Delwyn Rayson, staff official of the United Church of Christ's Minnesota Conference and spokesman for the clergy group.

For the first time in history, says a Harvard professor, there's something like social evolution going on.

The opinion is that of Dr. Lawrence Kohlberg who told Israel Shenker of the New York Times: "There seems to be a radical increase in the proportion reaching principled morality."

A century ago nobody would have raised an issue over the Song My massacre, Professor Kohlberg said. "And indeed," he added, "conventional morality produces lots of reasons why it's right: 'we're at war and war is war'; it's for the country; 'they do it to us.'

"The very fact that today, in the U.S., some people are raising the Song My issue and trying to impose principles on a society which isn't principled makes me optimistic," he said.

Churchmen should start talking about "money" instead of "stewardship," the Commission on Stewardship of the Lutheran Church in America was told.

Rev. Richard L. Peterman of Summit, N.J., addressed the Commission and its closely related Lutheran Laymen's Movement for Stewardship. He said the "Stewardship" is a "hedge" which 90 percent of the people do not understand. He implied that the word "money" has a clearer meaning.

The Christian faith lives on in China despite renewed efforts by the communist government to root out "reactionary religion."

This observation was made by Chinese journalist Paan Ming-To in an article published by Christianity Today (Feb. 27 issue).
The veteran news reporter said pressures against Christians on the mainland are rising.

He found, however, that Chinese Christians—largely people over age 25—continue to cling tenaciously to their underground "home congregations" or "cell-structure" church groups.

"These Christian 'cells' are meeting in villages, towns, and cities all over China, and are particularly strong in Shanghai," the writer noted. "Meeting together in small cell groups, these believers are able to support a Christian worker among them . . . This underground shepherd travels from group to group, leading Bible studies and encouraging and comforting the Christian flock."

Because of the dangers involved, cell meetings are limited to groups of eight to ten—in larger cities, from three to four.

Half a section of the 1969 Tax Reform Bill provides a block against business enterprise operated by tax-exempt congregations.

Singled out as an example in the Akron Beacon, which reported the little-publicized measure, was that city's Cathedral of Tomorrow. The church, pastored by the Rev. Rex Humbard, has six years to shed its business enterprises before the government passes its hat for a share in the profit.

The church is known throughout the nation for its radio and television programs. It is also known as the owner of the Real Form Girdle Co. in Brooklyn, N.Y.

The decision to sell its holdings has not been made yet but the pastor and his board are aware of the ultimatum.

Besides owning the girdle company the Cathedral holds Unity Electronics Co. and Nassau Plastics & Wire Co., both in Brooklyn.

Two United Methodist publishing facilities in Harrisburg, Pa., and one in Dayton, Ohio, are being sold in a move to consolidate denominational printing at Nashville.

All three plants involved came into the church from the Evangelical United Brethren Church when the EUB and Methodist denominations merged in 1968.

Negotiations to sell the plants to employee investment units were reported and confirmed by a Methodist Publishing House spokesman in Nashville. The three facilities are now largely engaged in commercial printing.

The problem for Indonesian Christians is to cooperate with other citizens in national development while continuing to preach the gospel, according to an Indonesian church leader.

Christian preaching creates "tension and alienation" among the predominantly Muslim population, General Tahi B. Simatupang said, and some churches and Christian schools have been burned. Church growth, though not rapid, has brought the conversion of some Muslims and the presence of Christians where there were none before, he explained, and thereby has created resentment.

"Some people have said the tensions would be eased if we quit getting people to change their religion," said the retired general who is now chairman of the country's national council of churches. "But we must preach the gospel."

A lay-led, ecumenical effort to make "good neighbors" out of churchgoing people is budding in many American cities. The program is called "The Fish," taken from the symbol used by early Christians.

"The Fish" originated in St. Andrew's Anglican Church, Oxford, England, in 1961 when people who needed help placed a Fish card in a window.

The idea was brought to the U.S. and the first American Fish unit was organized in West Springfield, Mass., through an Episcopal congregation.

By late 1969, there were 200 Fish chapters in 30 states, and groups in West Germany, Belgium, the Netherlands, Switzerland, South Africa, Japan, and the Cameroons.

In some cases, denominational groups have given a hand. For example, the Episcopal Diocese of Chicago, especially through its men's and women's organizations, is backing the local Fish program.

Two main purposes of the effort can be identified. First is the task of providing neighborly services to persons: driving the ailing to outpatient clinics, emergency baby-sitting, reading to the blind, housework for the sick, companionship for the elderly and referral service when professional assistance is needed.

Another aim is to give church members opportunities to put their faith into action without becoming involved in organization-heavy, meeting-filled procedures.

Of course, a Fish card in one's window will not work as a signal in sparse rural areas or in crowded cities. The Fish uses a telephone-answering service to receive calls. Needs are transmitted to volunteers, each of whom works one day a month. There is no charge, and the volunteers remain anonymous.
Seminar to Be Held on Peacemaking

Several hundred students at Eastern Mennonite College will be studying "Peacemaking in a World of Revolution" in a two-week seminar June 15-26.

Experts on race relations, the political struggle, economic development, cultural change, church growth, and evangelism will discuss "peacemaking" in morning plenary sessions and afternoon sectional seminars.

The lineup of lecturers includes social scientists and theologians from many parts of the United States, most of whom have had overseas experiences.

"While we haven't finalized the commitments of a few prospective participants, said Myron S. Augsburger, EMC's president, "the idea for this seminar has captured the imagination of everyone we've invited."

Guest scholars during the first week include black evangelist Tom Skinner from New York, on race relations; John A. Lapp, historian and executive secretary of the Mennonite Central Committee's peace section, on the political struggle; Frank Epp, Canadian journalist, on economic development; Daniel Yutzy, sociologist from the State University of New York at Buffalo, on cultural change; and Donald R. Jacobs, missionary-anthropologist from East Africa, on church growth.

The annual two-week evangelism institute conducted at EMC will run concurrently with the peacemaking seminar under the direction of George R. Brunk, dean of Eastern Mennonite Seminary; Myron Augsburger, Donald Jacobs, and Paul M. Miller, professor of practical theology at Goshen (Ind.) College.

Speakers during the second week are Vincent Harding of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, Atlanta; John W. Miller, theology professor at Conrad Grebel College, Waterloo, Ont.; John H. Yoder, professor of theology at Goshen College; and Quaker philosopher D. Elton Trueblood, professor at large of Earlham (Ind.) College.

"The disquieting issue in today's world is not that there is revolution, but that man has not reconciled himself to God and his brothers," commented Augsburger. "EMC has designed this seminar so that together as students and faculty we can explore 'peacemaking' as a viable alternative for some of our most pressing problems."

Philip K. Clemens, chairman of the seminar planning committee and assistant professor of music at EMC, said, "We anticipate that this seminar will attract students from a wide spectrum of backgrounds concerned about peace in the world.

"We are not only interested in voicing the historical Anabaptist emphasis on peace and brotherhood but also in discovering new ways in which the message of reconciliation could be more meaningful to man's present situation," added Clemens.

Following the plenary session each morning, students and faculty will have the opportunity to question the speaker either directly or via panel. The lecturers will serve as guest resources in the afternoon sectional seminars staffed by a team of three professors. Students will elect one of the seminars for the entire two-week period.

"While we will divide the participants into smaller special-interest groups for the afternoon discussions," said Mr. Clemens, "all of us will essentially examine the same proposition — peacemaking is possible."

The sectional seminars will achieve their focus from one of six areas: race relations, economics, politics, cultural change, the church, and evangelism.

Guest staff members include Elvin Byler, attorney from Lancaster, Pa.; Darrell Fast, political scientist from Bethel (Kan.) College; and Ray Horst, director of the Mennonite Church's voluntary service programs in the inner city and poverty-stricken rural areas.

Evening plenary sessions, including films and arts programs, will be open to the public. Some of the guest lecturers will also speak during the evenings.

Students may register for "Peacemaking in a World of Revolution" for two semester hours (one-half course for EMC students) of credit in religion or sociology. Required readings will form the core of the seminar with grading on a pass-fail basis.

Inclusive fees for the two-week session amount to $145. This breaks down into tuition, $85; board, $28; room, $22; and fees, $10. Deadlines for application are Apr. 1 for EMC students and May 15 for non-EMC registrants.

All the sectional seminars will meet in EMC's climate-controlled facilities.

Registration Open for Convention 70

Registrations are now being accepted for Convention 70, a churchwide youth gathering to be held Aug. 16-21 at Lake Junaluska, N.C. Deadline for registration is May 1.

Approximately 2,000 youth and 200 adult leaders are expected to attend Convention 70 this summer. The five days together includes worship, Bible study, discussion, workshops, recreation, and lots of informal activity.

Speakers for Convention 70 include Don Jacobs, missionary in Nairobi, Kenya; David Augsburger, Harrisonburg, Va.; Mennonite Hour speaker; and Tom Skinner, evangelist from Brooklyn, N.Y.

Don Kraybill, Salunga, Pa., will be moderator for the public sessions. In charge of Talk-It-Over groups for discussion and dorm living will be John Lederach, Hesston, Kan. Art Smoker, Scottdale, Pa., is convention coordinator.

Theme of Convention 70 is commitment for mission. The convention's aim is to demonstrate the idea "that persons in a commitment relationship with Jesus Christ are automatically caught up with persons..." and the contemporary issues with which they are involved,” according to Smoker.

Cost of the week will be $65 for registration with no more than $50 additional for travel if the transportation pool being arranged by each district conference is used.

Members of the high school classes of 1972, 1971, 1970, and 1969, or age equivalents, are eligible to participate in Convention 70. Persons interested should contact their pastor or youth group adviser for registration materials and information.

Adults who would like to be TIO dorm leaders should get in touch with their conference youth secretaries.

Mortgage Is Burned At Christopher Dock

Approximately 250 persons attended a building debt liquidation ceremony held on Monday, February 9, 1970, at the Christopher Dock High School, Landsdale, Pa.

The mortgage-burning ceremony included an invocation by Rev. Donald Schaeffer, president of the Parent-Teacher Committee. School superintendent, Lee M. Yoder, introduced the participants for the mortgage-burning ceremony and program, including Detweiler; J. Silas Graybill, Board president; and Ralph B. Hedrick, Board treasurer. The congregational hymn, “To God Be the Glory,” was led by Ralph C. Alderfer, music director and president of the Alumni Association.

Future school perspectives were presented by the superintendent commenting on the development committee’s land-use planning study, which has been in progress during the recent months. This study will eventually lead to the development of a campus master plan to guide future expansion and development at Christopher Dock.

Meanwhile, the updating of faculty and staff salary and benefits will be the first item taken under consideration before any more capital improvement plans are outlined and implemented. To do this, the school continues to look to its constituents for its fine financial support.

Christopher Dock School was founded in 1954-55 and has graduated 728 students. There are 293 students, grades nine through twelve, enrolled this year.

Evangelistic Campaign Held in Ghana

Lanterns strung on mud houses, a semi-circle of chairs and benches under the open sky, visitation, keenly interested communities—all memorable factors in a weekend evangelistic campaign held in Pimpinsu-Bososo, Ghana, Jan. 2-5.

For operation visitation-evangelism, two groups, including nationals and Mennonite Board of Missions workers, led by S. T. Okrah and Samuel Tetteh, climbed the steep mountains to visit each compound in the Pimpinsu-Bososo area. One group played a gospel message on a portable record player, discussed the message, and prayed. The second contingent led in Bible reading, discussion, and prayer. In one compound three adults made decisions for Christ.

Each evening the group gathered in a compound for a service of singing, flannel- graph Bible stories, and evangelistic messages, the latter led by missionary-pastor Laurence Horst. The story of the Good Samaritan was reenacted, and Willard Roth led a discussion on the contemporary meaning of the story. A study from Revelation chapters one and three led to consideration of two questions: What is the “Open door” in Ghana? What is the “little strength” in the Ghana Mennonite Church?

While no one responded to the invitation to become a Christian or to gain church membership, an invitation to come forward for prayer for special needs met with a wide response. Horst suggested several reasons for people’s responding in this way: “Perhaps the implications of what it means to be a Christian have not been made perfectly clear,” he said. “Did people respond to the prayer invitation because they understood this, but did not make decisions to accept Christ because this invitation was not clear?”

“Attendance was excellent,” Horst added, “and perhaps a longer series of meetings would make it possible for the Spirit to work with more lives in a significant way.”

Participants commented on the strengths and needs of the campaign in the context... of a Bible study and evaluation session. Responses included: “Power to understand the gospel, to love, to spread the good news ... the need to cooperate with other Christians, to set up a training program ... we need prayer, without it we cannot do God’s work.”

Mennonite Board of Missions currently has five long-term missionaries and six Overseas Missions Associates serving in Accra, Amasaman, or Bawku, Ghana.

Bible Study Finds Inroad in Spain

Finding a copy of the New Testament in the mailbox is unusual, but for a resident of Spain it is especially unlikely. However, that has been happening in several Spanish communities because of the enthusiasm of Angel Abrodos.

Abrodos is in charge of follow-up for Mennonite Broadcasts’ Luz y Verdad program in Spain. He is working with Spanish director Lester Hershey in expanding the Bible correspondence course project in that country. Recently he has been sending printed Gospels with the mailings introducing the Bible studies.

Abrodos and four helpers compile mailing lists by random selection of addresses from telephone directories. They send introductory material to each address, which has resulted in an increase in the number of correspondence course students.

Much of the project financing is supplied from the personal funds of the workers themselves. To reduce printing costs they are buying a printing machine at personal expense.

The results of the project are encouraging to the group of workers. Several Bible students have accepted Christ because of the lessons. One student has even requested that a Christian service be held in her home.

As director of the Luz y Verdad broadcast, Lester Hershey is helping with the cost of printing, but any extensive support is impossible because of limited funds. But with or without more support Abrodos plans to continue because of the need in his country and his dedication to doing something to improve the situation.

Cleveland Church Has New Facility

Since its founding eight years ago, the University-Euclid Community Church in Cleveland, Ohio, has met in homes or rented quarters, the location for the past five years being the Charles Orr Elementary School in the Hough area of the city.

In January of this year the University-Euclid congregation moved into new facilities at East 85th and Chester, located several blocks from the school. The fireproof building is a 52 by 65 ft. multi-use structure with an auditorium that seats 125 persons and can be partitioned into three classroom areas. It also features a kitchen area, an office, and another partitioned classroom.

The contractor is Eugene Jackson, brother of University-Euclid pastor Warner Jackson. The congregation, the Ohio Conference Mission Board, and Mennonite Board of Missions are financing construction.

The budding congregation, having an average weekly attendance of 35, is an outgrowth of Lee Heights Community Church pastored by Vern Miller. The present programs include regular Sunday services, a Sunday evening fellowship, and a strong midweek Bible study and prayer service. Eventually the congregation wants to start a day care center using the church facility.

The University-Euclid congregation is jointly sponsored by Ohio and Eastern Conference and the Home Missions Division of Mennonite Board of Missions. The three-member East Cleveland Voluntary Service unit attends and supports the program of University-Euclid.

The article entitled, "Don't Beat Me on the Head with Your Heart, Brother Yoder," and written by Albie Derstine (Mar. 3 issue), brought to my attention certain important matters.

Much is being said these days about the "generation gap." Personally, I dislike the expression. The generation gap, so-called, is just as big and wide as your logic, your insight and sympathy. Is the younger generation in one world, and we of the older generation, in another entirely different world? The common saying, "Your friends are as close as your telephone, call them," applies here. To me, the younger generation is even closer, they are right here with us. Expressing our gripes, dissatisfaction, and complaints in a generous and verbose way is one method to unload our mind.

The text in 2 Cor. 10:12 is a case in point here. Might we not do better by conforming to the image of Christ in precept, principle, and example? — Clark B. Eberly, Kalona, Iowa.

Since letters are mutually two-way communications, I assume Paul M. Lederach's letter of February 17 on Mennonite bankruptcy was to provoke discussion.

I couldn't agree more with his plea for a candid picture of our institutional indebtedness and goals. Coordination of our programs has never really gotten out of the lip-service stage; certainly there is more efficient way to keep the church machinery running and a more effective way to promote the Kingdom of God.

But I think he is oversimplifying the problem to think that a high-level meeting will solve the deficit problem.

First, when one talks of bankruptcy he is dealing with a symptom rather than a cause. Those acquainted with the field of public relations know that you cannot touch a man's pocketbook before you reach his head and heart. It is as Conrad Teitel, one of the nation's top tax experts, recently told a group of college administrators: "You cannot count on tax benefits as incentives for gifts; the donor must like your institution first, then he will consider the angles."

Second, I have serious doubts that anything new would transpire at such a meeting because the same people will get together to hash over the same old problems, share similar outlooks, bring the same orientation, and come up with the same solutions (and probably a study committee to investigate the problem).

Which leads me to the second possible root cause for bankruptcy—the autocratic organization of those agency structures. It is surprising how many of the same people serve on many of the church boards and committees, a situation not unlike the concentration of wealth and power in U.S. today (85 percent of the stock being owned by 4.9 percent of the population). Not only should Lederach ask what is a realistic budget for 100,000 people, he might also ask how well those people are represented in determining that budget.

And his plea for the proposed meeting, Lederach admits by his own outline one of the key problems—lack of specific goals and the subsequent lack of articulation to the congregation. If the agencies could not come to such a meeting with points a through g already decided, forget it. If we as agency leaders do not have our needs and goals as "second nature," I can conceive of only a Babel attempt a collective decision about them. To even suggest such an agenda is to admit that most of our programs have come about by default rather than design. In my estimation, such a meeting would not only be sobering, it would be ridiculous. To assume we would, while our constituency accepts with blind loyalty even the most traditional of our programs. Too little have we told them "why," from "whence," and "where to."

Fourth, Lederach implies in his concluding paragraph that we are about to fall prey to a powerful and sophisticated fund drives, as if sophistication in communication is bad. I have often in education, Christian nurture, the pastorate, our businesses, professions, and every other vocation and avocation, is "good." I'm afraid that's an inconsistency I can't buy.

Last, the suggestion that we must limit our programs because of our small numbers (100,000) is not quite to the point. The point in planning our financial resources is the per capita wealth. While Mennonites have not been a wealthy group, they now find themselves in "pleasant places."

A man sitting on 400 acres of land that he or his predecessors paid $25 an acre for and is today offered $240,000 is not exactly poor!

Many of our Mennonite communities are located on the edge of exploding metropolises where industry and land developers have put them (the quiet of the land) in the upper middle-class overnight.

Let me suggest, as an alternative to Lederach's high-level meeting, that (1) we employ for the same money it would take to convene and invest in such a meeting to hire a consultant who couples Christian commitment with professional counsel as an "outsider"; (2) launch a "grass-roots" promotion of our institutional needs on the congregational level and do away with or curtail the conventions, conferences, study committees, and the like; and (3) do with the church what it was created and commissioned to do—introduce a continuous Christ revitalized to the inner man, and concentrate on "restoring our souls."

The article on "Why I Don't Eat Grapes" (2/17/70) is quite interesting and Bro. Landes' refusal to eat grapes because he would offend the people whom he works with is both commendable and scriptural. But to suggest everyone quite eating grapes is something else.

What saith the Scriptures?

Among the exceptions to the wording of the parable Jesus gave in Matthew 20:1-16 God is on the side of the grape growers. The man who owns the vineyard should set the wages, not the labor union.

Of course, if he takes unfair advantage of his workers he will need to give an account to God someday for his actions. For we are our brother's keeper.

Let's remember Jesus gives a principle that is hard to get around when He says, "Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own?" All those in the church of Philemon and Onesimus — Onesimus still belongs to Philemon even though he had now become a Christian, he still belonged to Philemon. And Philemon could do whatever he wanted to do with him even though Paul said he would do what he asked him to do. Philippians 2:1

I hope my brother will forgive me but we are still eating grapes.

Let's tip our hat to the editorial "Affirmations of Conviction." It is very timely in this day of shallow convictions and compromise. Keep up your good work, Bro. Drescher. — Paul R. Metzger, Springville, Ala.

The article, "An Open Letter" in the Feb. 17 issue of the Gospel Herald to Howard J. Zehr, by Paul M. Lederach may well be the most prophetic message to the church we have had for a long time. We have too many people pulling different directions at the expense of the church's ministry in a world full of bruises and sores.

I again would ask that we define our priorities and do a few things well. It is immoral for one agency in the church to solicit the brotherhood for money to set an example to plan to do it before the other agency does.

I would suggest immediately a moratorium on all church agencies to halt solicitation of funds that are already committed, until a representative body of our brotherhood discovers what God would be saying to us. Let's take Paul's concerns seriously and watch God work in our midst. — Hubert Schwartzentruber, St. Louis, Mo.

I feel a response to Paul Landes' "Why I Don't Eat Grapes" is in order after reading his article and reading other material on this matter as he suggested. It seems quite shallow thinking to present some problems of one side and not the other and then try to use this to lure us into a certain train of thought and action. After reading about some of the problems faced by the growers I find the issue is not as clear-cut as Mr. Landes presents it.

From a strictly economical standpoint the grape growers are also in a dilemma. A great many are family operated and have worked hard to make the ground productive. They were already facing with lower prices and demand of grapes before the boycott. This coupled along with higher taxes, overhead, and production costs are making hard times for the grower without a way out.

Mr. Landes uses the example of the Apostle Paul not eating meat to keep from offending his "brother" to emphasize his point. This however, could also be applied to the grower. What kind of offense are we presenting to the grower by boycotting? To have the attitude that because the growers might own their vineyards they become the "haves" is ridiculous. All too often the "haves" are those who do not having any needs but all too many of them are in a great need of salvation to be forced to close their hearts by our "involvement" in their economical problems in the way he supported.

I respect Mr. Landes' feeling of offending his friends by eating grapes but to ask for mass in-volvedment from the church must be questioned. To sit back in the comfort we have and force a group into something which is disastrous is not the Christian's calling. We can be positive in our approach by helping to increase the price and demand for grapes thereby making room for the grower and having a Spirit-directed people presenting Christ as the answer to any ill feelings and other needs involved.

Also I would like to express a hearty "Amen" to Paul M. Lederach's views in "An Open Letter."

Let God Have a Chance

By Marlene Y. Kropf

No one could have predicted what happened. Our small congregation of 90 members and a sizable number of attenders was facing September 30, the end of the fiscal year, and we were $4,500 short of meeting our budget. Now that may not sound like a great deal of money to some churches, but to our struggling congregation, it looked enormous, even impossible. Most of the people in our church are under 35 — young couples of modest income with families, buying homes, and working hard to make ends meet. Many of us were already in the habit of tithing, so we knew we would never meet the budget just by giving our usual offerings. It was clear that a large amount of money had to come from somewhere in a special way if we were to meet our budget.

Our pastor pondered over the problem. The church council sat in perplexed bewilderment and wondered what to do. The stewardship committee was just as baffled. No one wanted to cut items from the budget. In addition to supporting our minister and contributing to missions and schools, we were supporting a young woman who worked full time with teenage girls in the inner city, the location of our church. All the causes which we supported were worthwhile and needed our contributions. We remembered that when we had adopted this larger-than-ever budget the previous year we had pledged faithfully that we would meet it. The time had come to act on that promise.

In a small, quiet way the momentum began that was to reach its climax a little over a month later. Two persons, independent of each other, contacted the church treasurer and expressed a special personal concern for the unhappy state of affairs. One of the two, a young chemist, volunteered that he and his wife would pledge a given amount beyond their usual offering and then would visit other couples in the congregation and urge them to match their contribution. The other person, a homemaker, suggested that each person in the congregation work for a day at an extra job or work overtime at regular jobs and then contribute their earnings.

Anyone who has worked with fund drives knows that between the conception of an idea and its fulfillment lies a large gap. Who can say what motivates a group to unite and successfully reach a goal in one case and fall flat in failure in another case?

The two people with whom the concern originated were willing to work hard and enthusiastically to sell their plans. They began by phoning people in the congregation or talking to them informally. They met head on with skeptics who said the congregation would never unite in such a task. After all, there were no wealthy people in the church; it seemed difficult for most people even to tithe. So where would the money come from? But gradually the mood changed. A few people began saying they would try to find a way to contribute if others in the congregation would also try. It had to be an all or none effort.

The stewardship committee first formally entered the drive by presenting the fiscal situation to the congregation on the first Sunday in September. The church treasurer, a man of few words with a droll sense of humor, made his appeal in a quietly confident, matter-of-fact manner. A chart had been constructed on which to record progress through the month. Each member and attender had received a letter which began:

"Do you remember the time you frowned in desperation over a stack of bills? Being a responsible person, you decided something must be done. And you found a way to work it out."

Following was a clear statement of the giving record of the church and a list of the items which would be hurt if the budget were not met. The letter concluded:

"Some persons may need to review their actual giving and make up some debts to God in their tithes and offerings. Then, if each wage earner will contribute two days’ wages above his regular giving, the budget will be met. Everyone’s cooperation will be needed to make this plan work. Some people already are planning to give extra from their normal wages. Others are planning to work extra or overtime to contribute their share."

"Sound difficult? Not really. In our day we all have ways of getting a little extra for ourselves when it’s really necessary. This time it’s necessary for the church if we are to meet our obligations. We are convinced it can be done."

"Wouldn’t you like to be part of a congregation that can face a huge challenge and win?"

On succeeding Sundays individuals from the congregation spoke of the way they were planning to earn extra money or of their belief that the budget could be met. But then a strange thing happened. When we committed ourselves to meeting the goal, God moved in and had the drive right out of our hands.

Not coincidentally, we now think, our pastor had recently preached several sermons on the power of God and its availability to those who would accept it. He had used striking examples from Norman Vincent Peale's book, The Tough-Minded Optimist. Gradually the conviction began circulating in our group that perhaps God wanted to display His power among us. We had been willing to try to meet the goal by our own sweat and effort, but the likelihood of reaching it that way was remote. Could we claim the promises of God's faithfulness in providing for our needs?

It was an exciting experience to tentatively and somewhat unsure begin to claim God's power and then become increasingly confident as we saw Him work in our midst. At the outset we felt God's presence in unifying our disparate congregation to work toward our goal. We are a heterogeneous group coming from all over the United States and Canada and representing nearly every variation of Mennonite belief and practice. Just agreeing on a goal was a big step! But then God began showing us that His power could do even more.

On the first Sunday the offering amounted to $503. Compared to our average weekly offering of $300, it represented a healthy beginning. In the next three Sundays we gave $2328. That left a balance of $1669 to be given on the final Sunday. Human nature being what it is, we could not help feeling somewhat discouraged at that point. But our faith was strengthened when one of the few middle-aged persons in the church, a stalwart prayer warrior, shared her conviction that God had assured her we would reach our goal.

On the final Sunday (fortunately, September had five Sundays that year!) there was an atmosphere of apprehension mixed with assurance that God would be faithful. To God's credit, the final offering was $1745, even more than what we needed to reach our goal. Incredulously delighted and pleased as children, we thought it was only fitting to hold a praise service to express gratitude to God for His working. In that meeting many testified to the way in which God had more than met their needs.

Undoubtedly many of our members had simply faced the truth that their giving during the year had been inadequate and made up their lack. Others felt that meeting the budget was of such importance that they dipped into their savings to make additional contributions. Still others had more unusual stories to tell.

A medical student had received a government check unexpectedly and gave it to the church. Another medical person, a resident in surgery, had had the opportunity to give physical examinations to high school students and gave his earnings. One man had gone away on vacation and returned to find a check in the mail for two weeks' wages, a provision of his summer job of which he had not been aware. An office worker had not been able to put in overtime on his job all summer, but during September came the opportunity to put in many hours of overtime and thus earn money for the budget. A housewife promised God she would give all her September earnings to the church if she could get a particular part-time job; she got the job almost immediately. A group of mothers who had no other way to earn money used their culinary skills to conduct a successful baked food sale. A hospital accountant received a note from his employer — an IOU for $250 for extra services rendered — which he and his wife matched with $250 from her earnings and gave to the church.

We learned many lessons in that month while we tried to meet our budget. We found God to be faithful to "... do far more than we ever dare to ask or imagine...." (Eph. 3:20, The New Testament in Modern English, J. B. Phillips). We also experienced a new unity in working together as a church. This new unity was especially needed in the following year when it became necessary for us to sell our church building and move to a new location. The voices of doubt were raised immediately saying that we could not handle the financial strain of purchasing another building. But the newly strengthened voices of faith prevailed and believed that God would show His power again among us. We should not have been surprised when God performed another miracle, but we were.

That's what happens when humans let God have a chance.

Prayer

High over the ocean the occupants of an apocryphal jetliner were told by their pilot that one of the engines had failed. "Well, we'd better start praying," said a passenger. And an alarmed seatmate asked, "Do you think it's that bad?" Sadly, even Christians tend to think of prayer more often as a rescue operation than a preventative maintenance. — Editorial, Christianity Today.
Harnessing Our Contrasts

It is a time of contrasts in our congregations. An increasing emphasis on the secular molds the minds of the rising generation. Yet there is also a fresh emphasis on the Spirit. Soul music and relationships turn some young people on. The whole person is important. Yet more and more often the person finds himself caught in the cogs of the secular machine.

There is on the one hand the product of a secular society, the cold, competent, calculating, computerized man come of age. But there is on the other hand an increase in all sorts of things that point in an opposite direction, a new interest in ESP, attempts to talk with the dead, the use of drugs to escape into another illusionary world.

Other hints of the incompleteness of the spiritual man in the secular society are the increasing emphases on faith healing, various forms of spiritual "tongues," and the success of groups like the Full Gospel Businessmen’s Fellowship.

This is the world young people find themselves in. It is full of contrasts and contradictions. They see things good and bad but they find it difficult to tell which is which. They see the secular and the spiritual in constant juxtaposition. Parents, teachers, and other adults come through with confused signals about what is right. When adults say one thing and do another youth rightly read it as phony.

Youth groups often divide themselves between those who prefer a pietistic emphasis and those who are more comfortable with a more intellectual, a more secular approach to their faith. It may be that neither group is more "spiritual" than the other. Each is struggling to find a positive, sensible way of expressing their faith in their kind of world. These persons cannot always understand those who believe differently.

Teachers, too, may find themselves identifying more with the pietistic emphasis or its opposite. They are in danger of expecting others to fit the mold they find most comfortable. When they do this they are apt to alienate young people who honestly differ with them.

Let us remember that ours is a pluralistic society. No longer can we expect the sort of similarity in the expression of our faith that once we knew. With the rapid increase in the speeding up of change we can expect more diversity rather than less. Today more than ever the church has an opportunity to be the church — a fellowship where the various viewpoints of brethren can be tested and where each can help the other to be stronger and fully whole.

By Still Waters

Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God. Matthew 5:8.

Purity of heart is not proven by the ability to point out sin in other persons or in society. The pure in heart are those who are most sensitive to sin within themselves. And only those who deal with their own sin see God here or hereafter.

It is sin within ourselves which blinds our eyes to God. God is always vague to us when we refuse to face our own sin. "Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord? or who shall stand in his holy place? He that hath clean hands, and a pure heart. . . ."

In Jesus’ day, as in ours, many had it turned around. They thought they could prove their own purity by pointing out the sin in others. So a group of religious leaders brought a sinful woman to Jesus, telling Him of her sin. But even as they led her to Jesus they were laden with their own lust. Jesus stooped and wrote on the ground. If they had no such sin in their own hearts then, and then only, could they condemn.

When Jesus looked up, those who came with condemnation had left condemned. They could not prove their purity by pointing out the sin of someone else. Not to Jesus. He saw deeper.

So it is always. The purest cry not "Look at the sin over there" so much as "I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips." "Create in me a clean heart, O God."

Prayer

Prayer is likely to be undervalued by all but wise people because it is so silent and so secret. We are often deceived into thinking that noise is more important than silence. War sounds far more important than the noiseless growing of a crop of wheat, yet the silent wheat feeds millions, while war destroys them.

Nobody but God knows how often prayers have changed the course of history. Many a man who prayed received no credit excepting in heaven. We are tempted to turn from prayer to something more noisy, like speeches or guns, because our motives are mixed. We are interested in the making of a better world, of course, but we also want people to give us credit for what we have done. — Frank C. Laubach, Prayer, the Mightiest Force in the World.

Telling It Like Marie

People in Paris milled about the streets and threatened to riot. The queen of France wondered why they were discontent.

"Because they have no bread," one of her ministers told her.

"Then let them eat cake," said the queen, according to a story that has attached itself to the name of Marie Antoinette.

This tradition assumes that the royal family had grown so rich that it no longer understood the needs of the people in the streets. This kind of isolation from the needs of her citizens brought on the French Revolution during which Marie was killed by the people with whom she could no longer sympathize.

That happened about two hundred years ago. Since the French Revolution, politicians have grown more sympathetic to the needs of hungry people. Or have they?

A recent issue of the Newton Kansan reported that the local county commissioners had decided to discontinue their sponsorship of a community action program that provided services and information for the poor and underprivileged of the county. One of the reasons given for ending the program was that its workers have been "soliciting people for welfare."

This saying will not go as far as Marie Antoinette's. But what it lacks in literary flair it makes up in its distillation of the heartlessness expressed by the rich North American middle class (that's us) toward the poor and neglected of our towns (often referred to in our conversations as they).

I know it is popular to sneer at the government aid known as welfare. Yet other forms of government aid such as crop support programs and oil depletion allowances are held in honor. We all want to be friends of the farmers and we all like to be acquainted with the man who owns an oil well. We wouldn't think of offending them by hinting that it is improper for them to receive help to advance their businesses. In fact, if they didn't know how they could get such aid, we would feel we ought to tell them where to go to get the information they need. Friendship would expect no less.

Would we assume that it is proper for a drowning person to be allowed to drown because he does not know how he can be saved from drowning — such as yelling for help? Therefore, if a poor person does not know he is qualified for help, shouldn't someone tell him? Wouldn't a county commissioner who is county commissioner for all the people and not just those who elected him want to be the first to go and tell him that he can get help?

It has become almost pious and patriotic to believe that poor people will be corrupted by help that is given to them. But no one would dare hint that farmers or oilmen are hurt by government aid. It only makes them better farmers and oil field developers. Let's not follow a double standard in our thinking about government aid. Rather, as far as the poor are concerned, let's go the second mile and do all that we can to help them.

This does not mean that we need to feel the present welfare programs are adequate. They aren't. Rather, we should give our support to the kind of reforms suggested by President Nixon that look forward to providing for each deprived person a minimum income.

Enlightened self-interest suggests that we can do no less even when you consider only the cash-and-carry aspects. All the people in our state benefit from the money poured into our communities through government aid to farmers and aircraft manufacturers and through tax benefits to oilmen, to mention only a few of hundreds of programs. (Canada has similar programs.) This money enters the pockets of the merchants, teachers, preachers, doctors, barbers, and others. The money given to help the poor does just the same. (I'm sure a dollar spent at the grocery store from a welfare check does just as much good for the economy of a town as a dollar spent by an aircraft worker.)

But the religious dimension works in favor of the poor who are among those that Christ calls His brethren in Matthew 25:40. Our piety will be measured not by our sarcasm about welfare but by our sympathy for the unfortunate. I want to live in a town that has a little more tenderness for the unfortunate. — Maynard Shelly, editor of The Mennonite Ever Hear This Confession?

Many times we've heard persons say, "I need more faith." But have we ever heard one say, "I need more love"? Yet love is the mark of a disciple. Paul says we may have all kinds of great faith, yet if love is lacking, our faith is of no value. Are we too proud to admit we lack love? It just may be that we will never have more faith until we make this confession of lack of love. — D.
Youth Team in Retrospect

Ed. note — From Dec. 30 to Feb. 23, five Latin American young people toured Mennonite congregations in North America and presented programs on the theme, "We've a Story to Tell to the Nations." Kenneth Seitz, Jr., Elkhart, Ind., coordinator for the Youth Team's visit in North America, accompanied the group on the final two weeks of their itinerary. In an interview with John Bender of the MBMC Information Office, Seitz reflects on the Youth Team's impact during their North American visit.

John Bender: What is the most significant contribution you feel the Latin American Youth Team made?

Ken Seitz: In answering this question I need to mention the spiritual dynamic evident in the lives of the five young people who visited us from South America. This became obvious to me as I traveled, lived, and worked with them. From the response I got from youth leaders and people in congregations, the thing most appreciated was their genuine Christian testimony, friendliness, and love for other people.

John: Was there anything distinctive about the Team as Latin people and also as a Team?

Ken: As I think about the individuals comprising the Team, I think immediately of five very fine people possessing keen minds and an awareness of what life is all about. In the two weeks I was with the group, I never heard them complain and I never saw their morale sag. This was significant because it seemed to tell me that these people have purpose for living and for being here. I was interested, of course, to see whether romances might develop or whether there might be jealousies or any competition to make an impression. But I found none of this. One Team member was more on the quiet side, at least for awhile. But he wasn’t ridiculed about this; everyone seemed to accept everyone else. It was proof again that in a group where there is Christian commitment, there is perspective for working at problems.

John: To retrace a bit of the background, what expectations did you have for the group and how were these met?

Ken: A primary objective for the Youth Team coming to North America was to share from their Christian experience. I have never visited or been a part of the church in South America, but I do know that the Latin people tend to be warmly evangelical in their church life today. One of the greatest expectations I had for the Team was for them to bring some of this warmth of testimony and Christian experience into our midst. Truly they did this.

Several of the Team members are rather new Christians. Most of us are used to circulating among Christians all of our lives, perhaps unsure at what point God really did step into our experience. Well, these young people seemed to know that God is in their lives and it has made a difference. I especially remember the one girl's testimony, Ana Marli from Brazil, who would say that in the struggles of her youth she did not believe in God. Then she attended a Christian camp, afterwards she came home and decided to make a decision to accept Christ. At that point the Person in whom she had not believed resolved her greatest struggle.

Of course, another anticipation we had was that we might be able to share the peace position and our service motive and emphasis in the Mennonite Church, and I think this was accomplished too. There is a difference of opinion on this as they don’t have the status for a conscientious objector position in S.A. We had some discussion about this, and I think the youth from S.A. were challenged by what they saw young people in N.A. doing in service as part of the church.

John: How do you feel about the reception extended to the Team in various communities?

Ken: I feel very good about this, John. I had some qualms as to how the Team would adjust to N.A. churches. I was concerned how they might react to our wealth and affluence, and maybe develop some negative attitudes that would actually impair their contribution here. But this didn’t happen, and I felt that our young people in N.A. for the most part really appreciated learning to know personally young people from the Latin America church.

I was impressed every evening after the program the way people, young and old, would come up front and crowd around and want to talk and shake hands and try what little Spanish they might know and give the Team an opportunity to use their English. There always seemed to be real appreciation for them. Of course, as they would give their program, they were an assuming kind of people who were anxious to meet us.

John: What percentage of adults were exposed to the Team?

Ken: As I calculated it recently, the Team gave programs in some 30 congregations. Most of these were programs where everyone was invited. I was often impressed by the fact that adults in some instances more than the youth went up to these young people and wanted to talk and relate. So, as I analyzed this thing, I feel that although we call it a youth exchange program, the N.A. adults were blessed and strengthened by this experience just as much as the young people.

John: Were there any areas where the Team made a special impression or received an outstanding reception?

Ken: Well, John, I think I'd have to say that was in Ontario, and maybe that's why you asked this question. But I am sure that the weekend in Ontario was a tremendous experience for the Team and for the youth of the conference. Especially Sunday morning of Feb. 15 when 800 to a thousand young people were assembled at Rockway Mennonite School. I was at St. Jacobs with Jaime Gardin from Brazil, and it was obvious to me from the very first evening he performed that these Ontario young people were perhaps the most responsive that the Team had encountered.

The Team mentioned Newport News, Va., as a place where they had an especially good time with the youth and intelligent questions were asked. I think another place the Youth Team made a real impact was in an inner-city school in Atlanta, Ga. We visited Mennonite House, and one of the VS teachers invited the Team to his seventh-grade room. The class was studying S.A., and so the Youth Team's presentation fit right in. The Team said afterwards that these inner-city seventh graders asked more intelligent questions than a lot of the MYF-ers they had encountered. I felt this was a real credit to the job the VS teacher had done in that situation and said a lot about the mentality and keenness of this particular batch of inner-city kids.

John: You've implied that you have benefited personally from interacting with the Team. In what ways has your life been affected?

Ken: I'd very candidly have to say that I feel I'm a better Christian because of my association with these people. I am one of those that grew up in a Christian home, and of course I asked what would it be like to have arrived at my Christian faith from a little different route? But after hearing for two straight weeks the sincere testimonies of these young people and see them live out their Christian life, I can't help but be a different person. I am renewed in my zeal and desire to follow Christ.

The simplicity of their testimonies made necessary because of the language barrier is what touched my heart. This is what other people responded to. And seeing them leave from Chicago, I felt I was parting with some very dear Christian friends. It reminded me of the Apostle Paul's parting scenes from the churches in the Book of Acts.

John: What's happening on the second part of the exchange — the N.A. youth going to S.A.?

Ken: To date we have received the names of 35 to 40 individuals nominated to participate in the Team going south. These nominations have come in from youth secretaries from the different conferences. Fourteen district conferences have submitted one or more names of people they think would make good candidates according to the requirements we've set up. These people have then received letters and as I understand we now have heard from about six to 10 of these nominees who have actually desired to follow through and make application.

I frankly am concerned that we are able to contribute to the church in S.A. with our Team what the church in S.A. was able to contribute to us. Perhaps I am being too pessimistic when I talk that way, but again this points out that the contribution of the S.A. group was so exceptional that we may come out second best in all this.

John: What did the tour cost and who is carrying the expenses?

Ken: To date expenses have totaled $4,516. This includes, of course, the round trip tickets for the group as the largest single factor. To date about $900 has been contributed by different churches and individuals who heard the Team and wanted to contribute.

The second phase will no doubt just be as expensive. We do have plans to lift several offerings at the churchwide youth convention at Lake Junaluska in North Carolina in August. Funds have been advanced at this point by the Mission Board, but the Board and the Youth Office at Scottsdale are not guaranteeing to stand behind this, so we'll see what happens.

John: What other exposures or other types of visits other than presenting programs did the Team have?

Ken: The group planning the itinerary tried to take a number of things into consideration. It was arranged for the group to visit a farm here in Elkhart Co., Ind. They visited Erie Sauder's church furniture factory in Archbold, Ohio, and discovered that he is a Mennonite Christian who is greatly interested in and contributes heavily to the church. They had the opportunity to see this happening as they traveled down to Adriel School at West Liberty, Ohio, and saw where Mr. Sauder had made contributions of different cabinets, etc., around the school. And this made sense to them.

They had the opportunity to visit New York City and the United Nations building. They were in Washington, D.C., one day and visited the Capitol, the graves of both Kennedys, and talked a great deal about this. Another impressive time was in Atlanta at the tomb of Martin Luther King. There was a lot of head shaking, wondering why a man like this had been killed in our country. I was impressed by the fact that each one of them reached down and picked up several stones from around the grave to take back to S.A.

We visited Floridaland in Sarasota. Several MYF-ers from Bayshore and Tuttle Avenue Mennonite churches took off from school to go with us to see a porpoise show. I tried to expose them to different kinds of eating establishments in the U.S. and Canada — Dairy Queen, banana splits, steak houses, etc.

I regret that we didn't get to see the Rocky Mountains and other western U.S. attractions. This tour was limited to the major concentrations of Mennonites primarily east of the Mississippi River. This is unfortunate, but there simply wasn't enough time.

Again I have to take my hat off to the Latin American Youth Team as fine individuals, five people who impressed me as top-notch Christians. I feel many attachments to them at this time and many strong desires to hopefully visit them in their countries sometime.

God's Miracle Among Us

By Orie O. Miller

"Eager to maintain [or endeavouring to keep, as in the King James Version] the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace" (Eph. 4:3) is one of the more apt scriptural words characterizing the church fathers of our older generation.

The 46 1/2 percent membership growth of the 1904-18 period, the structuring of boards of publication, education, and mission and Mennonite Conference from 1890, the fruit of Sunday school begun even earlier, the more general use of English in the Mennonite Church beginning with the turn of the century, enabling the influence of Moody, Funk, and J. S. Coffman, making "all things new" again (Rev. 21:5), probably accounted at least in part for this scriptural "eagerness." By 1920 (after President Wilson's "The War to End War") and the wider world becoming visible, from this beginning obedience in Dhantari, India, Pehuajo, Argentina, War Sufferers' housing rebuilding in France and the Russian Mennonite deputation visits among us in the United States in 1920, another scriptural word. "As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith" (Gal. 6:10), seemed particularly applicable to the circumstance, and easily led to beginning MCC and this wider brotherhood structuring.

The American Friends Service Committee, founded in 1917 and preceding MCC by several years, had taught us much about consensus and nonpolarization, and respect for differences in decision making. One notes all MCC actions of the first 20 years "unanimously" passed (in good Mennonite parlance) and the steady moving towards Holy Spirit-led-togetherness. But we never gave up our Roberts Rules of Order. By 1941, and the particular preparation of the six years preceding in our nonresistance and peace position understanding, one found this "togetherness" possible from grass roots — youth to old age and leadership.

Romans 12:21: "Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good," and Matthew 5:38-41: "Ye have heard that it hath been said, An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth: But I say unto you, That ye resist not evil: but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also. And if any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also. And whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain," was speaking to all of us across the North American (U.S. and Canada) brethrenhood, plus the Brethren in Christ, via Civilian Public Service, Voluntary Service, War Sufferers' Relief, and with world vision pull and tug. MCC in mission was by then sensed, although not yet ripely spoken — as was the case also in the fathers' designation of "Missions and Charities" — as a two-sided entity.

And so this Anabaptist scripturally-unique vision could begin to flower, as at no time in brotherhood historical background heretofore. This vision of so much promise in the 1525-1540 Swiss brethren days, which through and after dire persecution, reemerged in Pietism, and similarly in Holland eventually into Liberalism, and flowering for a time in Moravian brethren communities, then there into legalism, now in its freedom-setting, promised and promises much.

MCC's accepted scriptural priority of prayed-out Christian-committed workers, and after this, then, contributed varied gifts and things "In the Name of Christ" and the needed administration — not only simplified the treasurer-controller function but prepared for the merging with mission and world brethren partnership in gospel outreach obedience. Even before this ripeness, MCC here and there took and still does a "John the Baptist" forerunner role, and then phased out to a John Mark to Paul role, without John Mark's lapse.

A few additional meaningful observations: First, the service or gift or labeled contribution "In the Name of Christ" clarified immeasurably worker standards and motivation, resource relationship and deed perspective and dimension, and enabled testimony opportunity, despite language, culture, and other barriers. Second, Jesus' striking feeding miracle and His con-

This message was given at the annual meeting of the Mennonite Central Committee, Chicago, Jan. 23, 24, the occasion also of commemorating MCC's fiftieth anniversary.
Toward a New Day

By Hubert L. Brown

In my article entitled, "Mennonites Are Guilty," I made the statement "A new way must follow." In light of some questions and concerns shared with me I've set forth to further elaborate on the above statement. I believe it is important to understand corporate guilt but more important than this is to personally deal with your guilt, and not become hung up on trying to describe it or technically define it. It will be tragic for the church to evade this area of deep responsibility. Probably the greatest evil facing the church at this hour is this whole problem of not caring enough, or in not being daring enough to care more. In essence, it is the church's unwillingness to take the Zacchaeus way of reconciliation in human relations. Personally, from various perspectives it appears as though general apathy still has a large band of soldiers in his following. This of course is very sad.

The single most significant thing the church can do is to own up to her involvement in copying racist America, so as to begin dissolving the issue of corporate guilt. Then the church can move as a power force in the establishment of a new fellowship. Within this new fellowship true humaneness can be practiced and also preached. Under this process the church matures rather than depreciates. The present church needs to become a new kind of community for its own survival. In this new atmosphere of humaneness the old clothes of racism and spiritual discrimination are passed away and are buried. The church can thus begin to live up to such Christian doctrines as love, mutual sharing, openness, and oneness without contradiction.

Dealing with corporate guilt lays the groundwork for newness and reconciliation. The aftermath of guilt manifested is solely to move effectively into the challenging days of confrontation and biblical action, whereby we join with Christ in His activity for justice. We enter this struggle with such a dedication that we become willing to die for each other. Herein lies the great dynamics of Christian brotherhood. Here also lies the highest standards of Christian character and social equality. Sincere compassion and real mutual assistance thus emerges. I sincerely believe true humaneness and Christlikeness is achieved by this method. As a matter of fact, the whole issue of humaneness is best understood and is best displayed in how one personally feels and acts toward his brother. For how can one brother be open to another if he fails to see him? And here precisely is where the whole matter of Black identity pops up. Mennonites finding it hard to become Black-minded will have to deal with this issue constructively. And Mennonites finding it hard to suppress and rid themselves of racist attitudes and activities will have to deal with this issue in the same way. For true humaneness cannot be practiced if lumps of hate and segregation are maintained, and this statement includes all races.

If we are to move in a new direction as a church, then we must collectively understand and faithfully back up our purpose for existence. And I believe that purpose is participation with God as agents of social change and reconciliation. In order for true redemption to be carried out inside and outside the brotherhood the mentality of the church must begin, or shall I say, must even more than ever reflect the mind of Christ. So the church can become that beautiful community where God's will is performed. The old way of name-calling and complacent pacifism must cease.

In seeking to move toward a new way the church must deal honestly with her nonparticipation (guilt) in the struggle of God to liberate those oppressed and despised. Thereby clearing the way to become God's new people totally caught up with Him in this struggle to overcome evil wherever it may prevail.

A one-legged schoolteacher from Scotland came to Hudson Taylor to offer himself for service in China. "Why do you, with only one leg, think of going as a missionary?" asked Taylor. "I do not see those with two legs going, so I must," replied George Stott. He was accepted. — Clinton Frame Church Bulletin.
What About Reports?

By J. J. Hostetler

"We are only a small congregation and thought it not worthwhile to report," said one superintendent recently. Out of 991 congregations reporting in 1969, there are 250 with less than 25 members each, or 25 percent of all our churches. There are 621 congregations, or 63 percent with fewer than 75 members each. Only 122 congregations have over 200 members but they comprise 43 percent of all Mennonite Church members while 248 congregations, or 25 percent have from 75-200 members each. The median membership for the Mennonite Church is 51. This means we are a denomination of small congregations. This information is very essential to people planning for curriculum materials, pastoral services, youth programs, and churchwide activities.

"These reports are a lot of extra work," said another person. Perhaps this depends on local books and record keeping. When secretaries and treasurers maintain adequate and proper records the report blanks are designed to merely transfer totals. Problems arise when local records are not properly organized, regularly maintained, and consistently dated.

"We were glad you insisted on full reports, it made us evaluate our whole program and for the first time we saw where we could improve our work." This was written as a testimony by a pastor. Even if the reports were of little value to the many church leaders they can be a real help and blessing to local congregations. It is like an annual inventory to a business or an income tax report to the Internal Revenue Service.

Why Have Reports?

They are essential and necessary so that we may have the facts. Our district conferences, various church boards, committees, publishers, writers, editors, students, and church leaders need to know factual information in planning materials and programs for the church. It is costly to act on guesswork alone. Congregations will benefit in improved program and materials, economy in supplies and administration, and efficiency in their operation.

Who Should Make Reports?

All congregations espousing the name Mennonite. Congregations who are members of district conferences report through their respective conference officers. Other congregations having no conference affiliations are asked to report directly to Mennonite General Conference offices.

What Reports Are Needed?

These may vary from time to time, however, at the present the following are being asked for:

A. Membership. This includes reception of new members, baptisms, members lost, and present membership.
B. Ministers list. This includes bishops, ministers, deacons, and licensed persons, ordinations, changes of address, deaths, and congregational responsibilities.
C. Congregational finances. This includes contributions and disbursements, money received and how distributed.
D. Summer Bible school record. This includes number of pupils, dates of school, types of schools, offerings, and costs.
E. Sunday schools. This includes enrollment of pupils in various age levels, average attendance, number of homes, and some other educational activities.

What Other Values Are There to Reporting?

Many pastors, superintendents, and treasurers have given testimony that making out reports has helped them and their congregations to see and realize some of the weaknesses and strengths of their respective programs. Record keeping has improved, bookkeeping has been clarified, giving has been increased, additional visitation contacts were made. Some of the lost, strayed, and careless members were contacted and relationships renewed. There apparently is no end of values to the church which takes its record keeping seriously.

When Should Reports Be Made?

Immediately at the close of the respective year for each reporting agency. In general the following schedule is suggested:

Summer Bible school reports, due by September 1, each year.
Sunday school reports due by October 1, each year.
Financial reports due by January 1, each year.
Membership reports due by respective conference time.
Ministerial lists due according to changes throughout the year.

J. J. Hostetler, Scottsdale, Pa., is Stewardship Secretary and MCCE Field Worker.

Gospel Herald, April 7, 1970
How Should Reports Be Made Out?

Blanks are provided for each type of reporting. One copy is for use as a work sheet and to be retained for local records, while a second is sent in to the proper agencies. Reports should be as complete and accurate as possible. Incomplete and incorrect reports can distort the final picture. When records are inadequate then careful estimates should be made by local leaders who are aware and understanding of the situation.

What Problems Are Encountered?

When local leaders neglect to be prompt or fail to make complete and accurate reports, then the program is delayed and the collector must send out follow-up letters, make telephone calls, and is delayed in making his report. This delays the central collector and final publication of the report. It costs additional money to reschedule, to check on unreported congregations, to work at correcting reports, and to be delayed in compiling reports.

Where Can I See These Reports?

Each year these reports are published in the Mennonite Yearbook which is designed for every congregation and family. Some are published in the Gospel Herald, in the Mennonite General Conference Proceedings, and in most district conference periodicals and conference reports. Copies are also available upon request. The reports are then filed in the historical library and are available to students in their studies of church history, church growth, and the development of church programs.

Twenty-One Days—A Warning

By Arthur M. Jackson

"Mother, I had lunch today but it tasted nasty," Sharon said as she arrived home from school. She had always enjoyed her lunch and often raided the refrigerator as she dropped her coat on the couch or chair. This afternoon she didn’t feel like eating.

That evening we had frozen dinners and the meat loaf was one of her favorites but she didn’t eat. Instead she asked to go to one of her friends’ houses where she remained until about eight.

During the night she wakened her younger sister and came down from the third floor bedroom and crawled into bed with her older sister in the middle room on the second floor. That morning since neither got much sleep Sharon asked if she could remain home from school.

About ten o’clock that morning Sharon went to a nearby store and returned with odd stories about people watching her. Nothing much was said at lunch. Again she didn’t eat but about two o’clock she began to cry and scream. We didn’t know what the trouble was but thought that she might have been over tired from not getting enough sleep the night before. But by four her cry outs were such that we knew we would have to do something. We called the nearest hospital. After taking her temperature and learning about her cry outs, comment was made, but ignored, that she might have had a dosage of drugs. The hospital did not have facilities to care for her so we were transferred to the County Hospital on Chicago’s West Side. She was admitted and put into a dark room with restraints.

Two days later we visited her and found her dazed and unable to communicate. On that Friday we again visited her and found that she had been diagnosed as a severe schizophrenic and that she was to go to the local State hospital.

Arthur Jackson is pastor of First Mennonite Church, Chicago, Ill.

On Saturday, however, her change was so remarkable that we brought her home only to learn on Sunday that she had regressed to where we had to take her to State. This done we found that the care there was meager and plans were made to take her to Oaklawn at Elkhart.

On Tuesday, a week after the first signs, we arrived in Elkhart and Sharon found her way into the therapeutic ward of General.

After repeated telephone conversations it has been confirmed that she had been given, unknowingly to her, a dose of what might have been LSD and that her recovery may happen suddenly or it might take months.

Later we learned that an old man had been coming to the local school and selling the pills for a quarter to any boy or girl he could encourage.

This is only one of four such cases at the local school and this school is only one of countless schools all over America having this drug problem. What will be done to prevent this we do not know.

We are aware after these three weeks that many have been concerned about Sharon and that many friends and strangers as well have included her in their prayers.

We are also aware that Sharon may not be able to return to the local school and along with her older sister this school situation may alter our future here. In fact this may change the direction of our mission but only time can tell.

We ask for your prayers and your help that we may continue to serve God and that through this effort we may be able to take care of the responsibility of her cure and that God may give us courage.

We all realize that it is impossible to protect our children from all such happenings but hopefully Sharon’s story will serve by alerting parents to the prevention of such happenings.
The Kind of Evangelism Help We Need

By Nelson E. Kauffman

While many churches are losing members some are growing rapidly. As pastors we are anxious to know the reason or reasons why some grow and others do not. We rationalize in our ministers’ meetings. Then we are inclined to want to plan more meetings which seem only to frustrate us further. It is so easy to look for the right answers in the wrong places.

The answer is simple but not easy. We must spend time and money to do evangelism rather than call more meetings to talk about it. The Evangelism Workshops which I conducted during my service as Secretary of Home Missions did some good, gave some help, but fell short in some ways. They were too brief, and did not give enough training. This training needs to be given in the congregational context.

The Coral Ridge Presbyterian Church of Ft. Lauderdale, Fla., is known all over the country as one of the fastest growing congregations in America. What is the reason? A program of training of laymen and women once a week for 16 weeks. One trained person takes two trainees out into homes. A carefully thought through plan of presenting the gospel is followed. There are results. People find Christ. After a thorough period of instruction they become members and are invited to join the training program to reach others. An evangelism explosion follows.

Many pastors wanted to learn about the program so a clinic was begun. Last year the second clinic was held with 80 pastors. This year 160 were enrolled out of over 1,000 applicants. I was one of the fortunate 160 in the clinic, beginning Saturday evening, Jan. 31, and ending Wednesday evening, Feb. 4. We lived in homes of members of the church and had our meetings and meals at a hotel. We attended the third (Feb. 1) Sunday morning service at 11:15 a.m. The 2,000-member congregation always has visitors. It is discovered that about 70 percent of church members do not have assurance of salvation. They really do not know what the gospel is.

The schedule of the three weekdays of the clinic included morning lectures and evening visits. Two clinicians were assigned to a place at the table for the evening meal beside a member of the church who had been trained and who showed us how to do it. I went out twice with a woman trainer. The teams of three have one man and two women, or two men and one woman. This threesome provides for the practicable opportunity for women in new situations and after dark. What congregation could provide 80 persons trained to present the gospel, willing to take two preachers into a new unknown home, begin the conversation and in an hour or more present the gospel and lead people to commitment to Christ? All returned to the church after the visit to report. A number of people responded to the gospel each night.

The program is based upon these principles. (1) The church is a body under orders by Christ to share the gospel with the whole world. (2) Laymen as well as ministers must be trained to evangelize. (3) The minister is not the star performer or witness, but rather the coach of a well-trained and well-coordinated team. (4) Evangelism is more caught than taught. (5) It is more important to train a soul winner than to win a soul.

I came back to my congregation here in New York and preached Feb. 8 on the mission of the church. I asked the congregation to respond to the sermon by checking a questionnaire. Seventy-seven percent of those answering believe the number one task of the church is to share the gospel, but 80 percent said they do not know how. I decided to begin training immediately.

On Wednesday morning, after a discussion on the plan and purpose, I took two women with me to a home. We followed the plan of presentation and a father, a mother, a daughter who had been on drugs, and a niece responded and holding hands around the bed in which the mother was, we each prayed till God heard.

On Thursday evening I took a couple with me to a home. After the presentation to the young mother who said she had not had assurance, and who was not clear on what the gospel was, received Christ and professed faith.

There is no promise that everyone will respond in a profession of faith, but as one presents the story of the gospel beginning with the need of man, and God’s love, it is exciting and rewarding to see what God will do. The secret is not some mystery but simply a purpose and a plan to carry out that purpose so the Holy Spirit can do His work.

This learning a plan, practicing it, observing another do it, discussing the experience in the visit, is a method of evangelism that brings results. Too many of our visits are done without a plan. We cannot be successful and effective evangelists by taking shortcuts any more than others can.

With the completion of my assignment here in June 1970 I am ready to spend time and energy to share this vision plan and program with others. We can have a clinic or Visitation Workshop in various communities of our conferences where there is interest. We cannot expect our congregations to grow unless the army of the Lord, the members of the congregation, become involved. Battles are not fought by generals, athletic contests are not played by coaches. But generals and coaches, ministers and leaders, must know how to do what they expect those under them to do or there is only failure.

A lay brother sent me and paid my expenses. I must now help others. I must do evangelism here and carry through the 16-week training program. By God’s grace I will!

WMSA Enters the Seventies

By Beulah Kauffman

April marks the beginning of a new WMSA year in a new decade—a decade likely to be characterized by new dimensions of commitment, concern, and change.

Since women in our society exert a great deal of influence in the area of spending and setting the style-of-life pace, we feel it is time to take a long look at the values which serve as our basis for decision-making. The meditations in the 1970-71 WMSA Devotional Guide focus on “Poverty and Affluence.” In light of our commitment to the call of Christ, we may find our order of priorities being called into question. How seriously do we take Christ’s words in Luke 14: 25-35?

Concern for our brothers and sisters both at home and abroad, coupled with astrong sense of responsible stewardship, were motivating forces which gave birth to organized women’s work in our denomination. In recent years that fundamental concern has grown to include both providing material aid and speaking to the issues of our day—peace, war, drugs, mental health, family planning, social injustices, racial tensions—and to work at countering those subtle influences which tend to erode faith in God and the strength of our moral fiber.

In our WMSA program, as well as in all areas of our living, change can neither be ignored nor sidestepped. To provide some help in facing changes creatively and constructively, study guides have been prepared by Winifred Paul, our secretary of home and special interests, for use with Dr. Armin Grams’ book, The Christian Encounters Changes in Family Life. Small groups—women, men, or women and men together—have been encouraged through Voice to use this paperback and the study guides as tools for discovering Christian principles for working through the change processes of our time.

One change which is surfacing and will gain momentum in the years ahead has to do with the women’s liberation movement. Some facets of this trend are very militant and quite contrary to Christian concepts of relationship. However, there are legitimate urgings on the part of women in our church to have their gifts recognized and used in the body of Christ to which they belong along with men—not as second-class members, but as equally worthy in God’s economy and endowed with gifts to be developed and exercised for the mutual good of the brotherhood.

Hopefully, as the new structure for church organization is developed and implemented, women will not be given token representation on decision-making committees and boards just because they are women, but will rather be called to serve as persons whose particular gifts can best fill the needs and can make a productive contribution.

Commitment, concern, and change will characterize WMSA in the 70s: renewed commitment to Christ and the mission with which He has charged us; concern for the execution of mercy and justice, especially in behalf of deprived and disadvantaged persons in our world; and a willingness to undergo change in ourselves and our program, not just for the sake of change, but for the advancement of Christ’s kingdom as the Holy Spirit leads.

Benjamin Franklin wrote the following epitaph for his own tombstone: “The body of Benjamin Franklin, Printer. Like the cover of an old book, its contents torn out and stripped of its lettering and gilding. Lies here, food for worms. Yet the work itself shall not be lost; for it will as He believed, appear once more in a new and more beautiful edition, corrected and amended by the author.”

An American Indian speaking recently said, “If the Indians had been stricter on their immigration laws we wouldn’t have our problems.”

A little girl called her pastor to come into the sanctuary of the church. She pointed to her little brother who was standing in back of the pulpit. “We are playing church up there, too,” she said.
Readers Say

Submissions to Readers Say column should comment on printed articles.

Bro. Yoder are caused by the unregenerated human nature. These things can be cured only by practice the teaching of Jesus and receiving a new heart.

Also on J. Otis Yoder's article, "God, Israel, and Palestine," he fails to mention that the prophets to Israel are conditional to the obedience to the God of Abraham. John the Baptist says that God can raise up other children to Abraham.

In the day of grace the children of Israel are to be saved just as any others. There is only one way for the Israelite and the Gentile to be saved. That is through Jesus Christ, the door. —Roosevelt Leatherman, Souderton, Pa.

While reading the article, "Don't Beat Me on the Head with Your Heart, Brother Yoder," in the Mar. 3 issue of the Gospel Herald, I was disappointed that a person would write almost a double page article in the Herald without a single Bible reference.

Such articles remind one of the verse in Jude 12, "Clouds they are without water, carried about of winds, going to be blown to nothing.

In this article Bro. Derstine goes back to the year 1935, fourteen years before Derstine was born and when Pastor Yoder would have been fifteen years old. It is doubtful that a fifteen-year-old boy would write a letter to a mayor of his town at that age.

Bro. Derstine used a familiar method in defending himself by comparing himself with the imperfect spirits of Sunday's. The Bible says this is not wise. (Read 2 Cor. 10:12.)

The Bible gives the Christian's standard for comparison. Every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure. (Read 1 John 3:1-3 and Prov. 4:18.)

Bro. Derstine says he and his girlfriend are 23 percent Christian and want to improve. I would like to suggest to Albie and Bets that instead of riding motorcycles on Sundays, they should use some of that time in studying the life of some of the great Bible characters, like Joseph, Samuel, David, Daniel, and Timothy. The Bible also records stories of women like Ruth and Esther and others, who became a great influence for good to people of all ages in their youth.

—Jesse Peachey, Belleville, Pa.

Paul Lederauch’s Open Letter to Howard Zehr, Executive Secretary of General Conference, in the Feb. 17 issue of the Gospel Herald merits wide discussion.

One does not need a very close contact with any of the church programs to become aware of a definite competition between the various boards for the members’ dollar. Not only can a case be made for an overproliferation of projects and programs and projects may be continued after the need for them has ended. The church, to the extent that it is a social institute, does definitely develop a bureaucracy which is as subject to Parkinson’s law as any other. Probably in every congregation the complaint that the members are asked to contribute to too many causes can be heard.

There is much merit in the idea of consultative meeting of representatives of all the conferences and boards for a general examination of all the various programs in order to test the value of each program in respect to the other programs. But I believe that one should be aware of several pitfalls. Participation, as proposed, would be dominated by administrators, and youth would have very little representation. I do not see how this could be avoided, but it should be recognized.

I also feel that there would be a great temptation to set up a priority board to rate the various programs and allocate areas of emphasis, and feel that the problem was solved. That is the way in which a business corporation would attack a similar problem. But there is a great difference between a church and a business corporation, though both might be made up of the same people. Most stockholders are aware, when they buy stock in a corporation, that they will have no real control over the management of the corporation. They purchase the stock because they have confidence in the management, and when the management of any corporation disappoints them they sell their stock. But when a person unites with a Mennonite congregation he invests his total being in it, not just money, and he expects to become an integral part in the decision-making process. He does not delegate to any church board the responsibility for the work of the corporation board of directors. And he expects his relationship with the Mennonite Church to continue throughout life.

As a rule, members of the Mennonite Church do not give because it is their duty, but because they are in sympathy with some cause, and that is as it should be. Should the outcome of the proposed meeting be a pacific allocation of funds among various projects to be supported by a general appeal, I am convinced the result would be a lowering of the total giving through the church and an increase of the amount given by Mennonites to causes outside of the church. —Howard Yoder, Wooster, Ohio.

The article by J. Otis Yoder entitled "God, Israel, and Palestine" is obscene. It is frightening because its cold calculated Zionism reflects a prevalent attitude in the Christian church. Its failure to even include passing reference to the million and a half Arabs who were driven from the soil which had been their homeland for 30 centuries is inexcusable. Mr. Yoder says, "When the Gentile church understands the sweep of the divine program, there will be no more antagonism expressed toward the Jews." Does this mean that in the "divine program" Israel had special permission to confiscate property and massacre those who would not leave voluntarily? I would not argue the fact that Jewish people have been victim of more discrimination and inhumanity than any group except perhaps black people in America and the Vietnamese people.

However, that the Arabs should be made to suffer by losing their land for the sins of Germany, does not follow logically.

The God who is love must be a different Being from the One who, according to Mr. Yoder, proposed a program to drive from their homeland a people whose sin lay in the fact that their names were not Rosenberg or Meir, and in this way He could establish another race of people, whose lineage was more suitable to His whim.

Mr. Yoder's article attempts to justify an ancient tradition rooted in the crusades—a tradition that to this day we as Mennonites call our "divine program," or "divine program" can go on. —Donald R. Bender, Atlanta, Ga.
Music Is an Important Part of Christian High School Education

Each year, Mennonite High School students meet for a music festival, singing under the direction of a capable guest conductor.

This year, the Mennonite High School Music Festival will be hosted by Belleville Mennonite High School, Belleville, Pa., April 11 and 12. Mr. Lowell Byler, Hesston College music professor, will be guest conductor. Nearly three hundred high school students will be involved in this exciting and rewarding week-end.

Many of the world's people see cancer as a form of nemesis or moral retribution. Some believe it is caused by everyday bruises and falls, by shock, worry, tinned food, aluminum cooking pots, tomato seeds, or tight corsets.

Plastic cups, insect bites, and eating meat have all been offered as "causes" of cancer. And the belief that cancer is infectious, that it can be "caught" from nursing a cancer patient with cancer, still persists.

All these beliefs are false, but unless we know how prevalent they are in our community it is all too easy for the messages of health education to be distorted beyond recognition.

These old wives' tales, and the role of public education in fighting cancer, are featured in a special issue of World Health magazine published by the World Health Organization (WHO) in Geneva.

Cigarette smoking is responsible for about one tenth of all deaths in Britain each year, says Sir George Godber, chief medical officer of Britain's Department of Health and Social Security. Aside from cancer of the lung, cigarettes bear a heavy responsibility in illness and death from bronchitis and coronary thrombosis. Cancer of the mouth, throat, and gullet, and even of the bladder and liver are more frequent among cigarette smokers than in nonsmokers.

A special committee of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S. (Southern) has reported that severe cutbacks in church personnel and programs last summer were due to "a significant shortage of funds."

An "impartial review" was requested by the denomination's Board of Christian Education (BCE) which has received "sharp criticisms" for its "controversial retracements."

In the cutback, 42 percent of BCE personnel positions were eliminated, three of the four Presbyterian bookstores were closed, and the book list of John Knox Press was reduced by 50 percent.

The Office of Worship and Music was also eliminated, and there were staff reductions and program curtailments in the work of Family Life, Church and Society, Higher Education, Research, and Children's World.

A new "no-fault" divorce law, lacking the Family Court provision advocated by many sociologists and religious leaders, has been passed by the Iowa legislature.

The statute, approved by a 48 to 9 vote in the Senate and an 82 to 15 vote in the House, states that a divorce can be granted when there occurs "a breakdown of the marriage relationship to the extent that the legitimate objects of matrimony have been destroyed and there remains no reasonable likelihood that the marriage can be preserved."

According to the new law, divorce will now be called "dissolution of marriage." Under the former Iowa law, five grounds were listed under which a divorce could be granted: adultery, desertion, felony conviction, alcoholism, or "cruel or inhuman treatment."

The new law requires a mandatory attempt at reconciliation for a period of at least 90 days before final dissolution of the marriage can be ordered by the court. In addition, it extends the period in which either party can legally remarry without consent of the court to one year and bars any public announcement of divorce proceedings until the dissolution is ruled by the court.

The general public should give just as much attention to the backgrounds of the men who head television networks as it now gives to other key officials in today's society, Paul M. Stevens declared.

The director of the Radio and Television Commission of the South Baptist Convention urged this approach to persons who are disturbed by current TV and radio programming.

"Who are the officers of NBC? Where did they go to school? Who is in charge of production? These are the questions they ought to be asking," Mr. Stevens asked.

"People want to know everything about their mayor, their President, or the teachers in their schools, but here's some guy who controls what comes into their homes and molds their minds and they don't even know who he is."

An atheist could not be elected president of the United States today according to a Roman Catholic lay theologian at the University of Iowa School of Religion.

Prof. James McCue made this claim during a discussion series on "Religion in America" by scholars of the School of Religion.

Despite the American principle that church and state should be kept apart, the U.S., in practice, has had an "established religion," Prof. McCue said, noting that in some ways religion has been stronger here than in other countries usually considered religious.

In such countries as Italy, Spain, and Latin America atheistic communists often run for office and are elected, he pointed out. This has not happened in America, and serious American candidates for public office are "quick to point out" their religious affiliation.

However, Prof. McCue predicted that as the 21st century approaches, the need to be even "vaguely religious" will decline as a requirement for being "American." He said Americans are becoming "disenchanted" with the nation's religious "institutions."

President Nixon has called for establishment of a commission on school finance to study the money problems of private as well as public schools.

He said the commission will be specifically assigned to focus on the "steady disappearance" of the parochial school. "The government cannot be indifferent to the potential collapse of such schools," he noted.

"Our purpose here is not to aid religion in particular but to promote diversity in education," the President stated in his 8,000-word message to Congress on education reform.

Noting that nonpublic schools are closing at the rate of one a day, he warned that if most of all were to shut down, the added burden on public funds by the end of the 1970s would exceed $4 billion per year in operations. Facilities alone would cost another $5 billion.

Within 20 years there will be one major Lutheran denomination in America in place of the present three major bodies, a Lutheran leader predicted in St. Paul, Minn.

Dr. Malvin H. Lundeen, immediate past president of the Lutheran Council in the U.S.A., forecast the merger of the American Lutheran Church (ALC), the Lutheran Church in America (LCA) and the Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod.

If and when this merger takes place, Dr. Lundeen said, he believes that two ultraconservative groups — the "Lutherans Alert" groups of the ALC — and the "Christian News" segment of the Missouri Synod — will "split off to form a separate body."

Scripture distribution in the United States by the American Bible Society in 1969 rose 47.6 percent to a total of 76,216,533 copies, it was announced in New York.
Nigerian Mennonite Church Growing

Vern Preheim, Africa and Middle East Director for Mennonite Central Committee, and Wilbert Shenk, Overseas Missions Secretary for Mennonite Board of Missions, made a brief administrative visit on Mar. 1 and 2 to the Uyo area to meet leaders of the Nigeria Mennonite Church to discuss the situation with them.

Members of the Mennonite Church there know much about the pain and suffering that accompany war. They live in an area in South-Eastern State much involved in the recent civil war in Nigeria. However, their experiences during the 21/2-year war have taken on another dimension.

Whereas in mid-1967 there were 2,400 members in 30 congregations, they today count about 3,000 members in nearly 50 congregations. In the midst of many hardships the church discovered new spiritual vitality.

People lost many of their personal possessions through the war, but the communities are gradually getting reestablished. Transportation is still somewhat limited and the prices of goods in the market are high. There is much concern to see hospitals and schools return to normal operation.

This is also the concern of the Nigerian government under whose planning and direction all relief and rehabilitation work is being done. Apr. 1 marked the end of emergency relief and the beginning of a two-year rehabilitation program.

To enable young people to resume their training and education, the church asked the Mission Board to continue and somewhat expand the scholarship program. This will enable about 45 young people to receive trade training and attend secondary, technical, and Bible schools.

The Board has also agreed to help the church reestablish an agricultural program that will be set up in the four areas and provide a means of reviving farming in these communities.

Preheim and Shenk were also able to assure the church that the North American Mennonites are concerned about them and plan to contribute significantly through MCC in the rehabilitation programs now being submitted to government for approval. Although these efforts will not be directly tied to any church, they will contribute to the total rehabilitation of the communities where the churches are located.

After careful discussion, the Mission Board and Nigerian Church agreed that no plans will be made to return mission-appointed personnel to work with the church for the next several years. Instead, other ways will be developed to maintain a fraternal relationship.

Among the issues confronting this growing church are Bible training for leaders, pastoral support, and leadership patterns. The conference has already approved the ordination of additional leaders later this year.

The 1970 annual conference was to have taken place the end of March. Delegates were expected from each of the four areas spread out from Uyo: Ibinjo, Ibianga, Ubum, and Itam.

MCC Adopts New Identification

Beginning in 1970 and marking its 50th anniversary, the Mennonite Central Committee is using a new identification program approved by the Executive Committee.

With the diversification of the MCC program it has been necessary to simplify the original mark, removing those elements that create a false or static impression of the organization.

An attempt has been made to create a symbol which utilizes the universal language of the visual. Kenneth Hiebert, director of graphic design department, Philadelphia College of Art, designed the new identification. Of it, he said, “It was intentionally designed to require a moment of active participation by the viewer to understand its content. That content is very simple: a dove or messenger form unfolds or empties from the cross. It is thus a visualization of the phrase used by MCC since its founding — ‘in the name of Christ.’”

By restudying and revising its identification, MCC affirms its intention of being committed to innovation in the areas of Christian service, responding to new needs wherever they arise in ways still to be found.

Urban Training Held in Detroit

An in-service training program geared to assist Voluntary Service personnel stationed in urban locations was held Mar. 21-27 in Detroit, Mich. The weekend conference, the first of its kind, was sponsored by the Minority Ministries and Relief and Service Divisions of Mennonite Board of Missions.

The idea to provide additional orientation after a volunteer has spent a period of time in his inner-city mission/service assignment is part of a growing churchwide concern to better equip Mennonite youth to cope with life in the urban setting. The Detroit experiment, coordinated by John Powell of Minority Ministries and Kenneth Seitz, Jr., of the Relief and Service Office, was to serve as a proving ground for future workshops in this area.

In recent weeks Seitz and Powell, along with several other Mission Board staff members, met with resource persons in Detroit to outline objectives and project a schedule for the program. “Since this is our first attempt at in-service training, we don’t know what to expect,” Seitz said prior to the conference. “Basically the program is being set up to help a VS'er evaluate his performance in an urban assignment, develop skills for the urban ministries task, provide on-location exposure to persons and conditions in the city, explore the culture of urban minorities, and to help the volunteer develop a uniquely Christian approach to his ongoing service.”

Cass Community Methodist Church located about 12 blocks from the Detroit V5 unit served as home base for daily classes, lectures, discussions, meals, and study. Specific activities included worship in black churches on Mar. 22, observing city council sessions in operation on Mar. 24, and confrontations with Edward Vaughn, a black power leader and chairman of the Pan African Congress, and Bro. Malik, a member of the Black Panthers.

Jim Parks, a local Church of the Brethren minister, and Bill Schmidt, a Lutheran pastor, led the devotional period each evening using Keith Miller’s book, The Taste of New Wine.

A major portion of the daily schedule focused on lectures and discussions in the areas of black history, culture, and theology by John Powell of Elkhart; Tom Robinson, pastor of the East Grand Blvd. Methodist Church; and Mondolyn Mushler, editor and Mennonites Aim for North Vietnam Relief

The Mennonite Central Committee has stopped administering the Vietnam Christian Service relief program in order to begin negotiations aimed at providing relief services in North Vietnam, a Mennonite spokesman said yesterday.

Vietnam Christian Service has been administered by the Mennonite Central Committee since it was founded in 1966 by Church World Service (an arm of the National Council of Churches), Lutheran World Relief, and the Mennonites. Its work is limited to South Vietnam.

"We felt we had to do this alone," said William T. Snyder, Akron, Pa., executive secretary of the MCC, in reference to the committee's decision to begin efforts to make its relief services available to North Vietnamese victims of the war.

"Frankly, we were afraid the other churches would be embarrassed if we tried to take them along on our attempt to negotiate with the North," said Snyder in a telephone interview. "Their constituencies probably wouldn't be able to approve such action."

Mennonites don't find much controversy on such matters within their churches, which have 220,000 members in the U.S. and Canada. Their consistent service policy is one of serving the victims on both sides of disputes. Such has been the case recently in Nigeria and the Middle East.

In 1966, the Mennonites were asked by the major Protestant bodies to head the Vietnam Christian Service because they had been in Vietnam with medical, agricultural, and school personnel since 1954. None of the major Protestant bodies had previous experience serving in Vietnam.

The Mennonites will continue to supply personnel for Vietnam Christian Service.

According to Snyder, they have been nervous about their "vocation" to serve "all sides" ever since they got into the project at its inception.

Though Snyder will not specify what North Vietnamese officials he has talked with, he said he already has talked with several in embassies in Europe and Asia.

At this point, he is not optimistic about getting Mennonite personnel into North Vietnam soon.

Snyder admits that they might not get in until or unless there is a settlement of the war. "But we want to be ready, we want to have laid the groundwork, so that when there's a settlement, we're ready to work in North Vietnam."

The unvarying first question from the North Vietnamese when they meet with Snyder and other Mennonites is "What's a Mennonite," he observed.

After explaining that his people traditionally are "pacifists and nonpolitical," says Snyder, the North Vietnamese officials usually indicate that "they don't see how that fits their situation. They indicate that the greatest service we could give them would be to get our government to stop the war."

Snyder said the Mennonites, who are strongly opposed to the war, will not break the law in order to gain admission to North Vietnam. "But we will do everything we can in order to help rebuild in both the North and the South."

Generally speaking, proselytizing is far down the Mennonites' list of priorities. They specialize in relief service in disaster and war areas.

Under the administration of the Mennonites, the Vietnam Christian Service spent $700,000 in 1966 and sent 35 persons to do relief work there. The program has increased to a $1.1-million budget this year with 61 persons from churches here and in Europe. In addition, 138 Vietnamese are employed by the service.

A basically rural and small-town church, the Mennonites gave $1,655,729 last year for relief. That was an increase 6.8 percent at a time when many major churches were experiencing cutbacks in giving — Betty Medsger, Washington Post staff writer.

Note: MCC had three reasons for asking its partners to be relieved of the administrative responsibility of VNCS: 1. MCC desires to relate more closely and effectively with the National Protestant Church in Vietnam and also with the Christian and Missionary Alliance and the Mennonite missions there. 2. MCC is interested in pursuing opportunities for relief assistance in North Vietnam, as the Medsger article points out. 3. MCC felt that with the possibility of the Vietnam War deescalating, CWS would be in a better position to carry the several concerns of the National Council of Churches and related organizations in Vietnam than could MCC.

(The Medsger article highlighted only the second reason of these three.)

Illinois and Iowa to Hear GC Choir

The 39-voice Goshen Collegiate Choir, plus string trio, under the direction of Cornelius P. Mathies, will tour Illinois and eastern Iowa Apr. 21-26.

Arranged to fall during the vacation between winter and spring trimesters, the tour includes services at six churches and one school. A pre-tour program at North Main Street Mennonite Church, of Nappanee, Ind., was given on Apr. 5.

On the itinerary are East Bend Church, Fisher; Roanoke Church, Eureka; Science Ridge Church, Sterling; Freeport Church and Willow Springs Church, Tiskilwa, all of Illinois; and Iowa Mennonite School, Kalona, and Iowa City Mennonite Church.

Response Good to Special Missions Appeals

Several rays of hope now filter through the clouds of concern overshadowing the budget situation at Mennonite Board of Missions. A final tally of receipts for the 1969 Christmas Sharing Fund shows that contributions have doubled compared to the 1968 response. A total of $30,832, less promotional expenses of $550, will be divided among the Mennonite Board of Missions for Bihar, India, Mennonite General Conference, and Mennonite Board of Education (which includes the three church colleges).

The above-budget Compassion Fund for minority ministries continues to pick up speed. According to David C. Leatherman, Board treasurer, contributions as of Mar. 20 totaled $50,325.

A 6.2 percent increase in general fund giving was recorded for the period from Apr. 1, 1969, to Feb. 28, 1970, as compared to the same time period a year ago. The 1969-70 fiscal year at Mennonite Board of Missions ended on Mar. 31.

Eastern Mennonite College Defines Aid Plan

The crucial pressures of meeting soaring tuition costs have been eased for students at Eastern Mennonite College this year by a substantial boost in student financial aids.

More than two thirds of EMC's 900 students are receiving more than $1 million in grants, scholarships, loans, and work-study money, according to a recent report by Daniel H. Bender, EMC's director of student financial aid.

This year's figure of $1,004,812 compares to $889,600 last year and to 1967's figure of $770,705, the year after Mr. Bender became the first director of financial aid at EMC.

Mr. Bender credited most of the increase in financial aid to increased enrollment and a high percentage of students applying for aid along with expanded programs.

"To succeed in securing financial aid requires a substantial amount of detail and follow-up work," Bender stated. "However, EMC does have definite selling points, one of the strongest being off-campus work-study projects."

Mr. Bender referred to the summer programs in which EMC students are employed in such areas as city ghettos, poverty pockets in Appalachia, and mental health institutions.

Presently, EMC's work-study funds account for nearly one fourth of the financial aid picture. This year the college is receiving $64,800 in federal money for off-campus work-study and $95,200, including required base and matching money from EMC and other agencies.

An additional factor affecting the availability of funds for EMC, Mr. Bender said, is that EMC students show "high need." "Most of the students at EMC have rural backgrounds," he explained, "and many are children of ministers and missionaries."

Another major source of the million-dollar financial aid package is the $387,000 in federal and state loans which EMC students have utilized as a means to help pay for their education. Most come from the federal government.

Of the $183,255 offered through 215 state loans, the largest source has been Pennsylvania which allotted $94,000 for many of the Pennsylvanians at EMC. Virginia has provided $66,100 in state loans.

Grants and scholarships comprise the third basic type of financial assistance at EMC. Of the $383,612 available, the state of Pennsylvania provided the highest single amount—$120,500. The college itself allotted $107,948 in academic scholarships, grants-in-aid, and discounts for children of faculty, ministers, and missionaries. The third largest program has been the Federal Education Opportunity Grant which contributed $106,023 this year.

A student's eligibility for financial aid is determined by need, as calculated from a parents' confidential statement of income.

A scale established by economists of College Scholarship Service indicates how much parents should be able to contribute toward their child's educational costs, with the variables being amount of income and number of dependent children.

A parent making $8,000 a year with three dependent children, for example, should be able to contribute $770 each year his child is in college.

With a total operating budget of $2.6 million for the current fiscal year, EMC's financial aid program of more than $1 million is an indispensable source of income for the college. With current nine-month fees of approximately $2,300 for each student, the program helps keep the student in college too.

Overseas Filmstrips Offered

Two filmstrips treating overseas missions themes, recently added to the audio-visuals library at Mennonite Board of Missions, are now available to congregations and other groups.

Come with Me to Bihar, a 66-frame color filmstrip, is a simply told story of the life and work of a pastor-evangelist in the Bihar (India) Mennonite Church. Rather than focusing on any one man, a life style and basic commitment are communicated that characterize a number of church leaders in Bihar.

A printed script and leader's guide accompany the filmstrip, although the use of an 11-minute taped narration (available upon request) will increase the effectiveness. Photography was done by Rod Hernley of Scottsdale, Pa., and the story was written by J. D. Graber, former secretary of Overseas Missions.

Mennonite Board of Missions has been sending missionaries to South Brazil since 1947. The Mennonite Church consists of groups of believers at some 20 locations, with nine ordained pastors and more than 500 members. The Nav Jivan Hospital at Satharwa, pictured in Come with Me to Bihar, provides medical services to a wider area.

Produced by Missionary Aviation Fellow-ship of Fullerton, Calif., I Met a Guy (10 min.) begins with folk music and a conversation between two youth who raise serious questions concerning contemporary life. During this discussion the one youth recalls his confrontations with Don Robertson, an MAF pilot. Through dialogue, Robertson's whole life story as a missionary-pilot is recreated, climaxing in his death in an accident.

The tape concludes: "You know, some people would say he (Robertson) wasted his life. He didn't play it safe and all that ... not safe? Or maybe he played it safer."

I Met a Guy and Come with Me to Bihar, with optional recorded sound tracks, are available rent-free from Audio-Visuals, Box 370, Elkhart, Ind. 46514.

Teachers Are Honored

The faculty of Eastern Mennonite College honored Ernest G. Gehman, professor of German, to highlight their Annual Spring Banquet. Gehman has been a member of the college faculty for 45 years.

"We have few persons among us who have contributed to EMC for as many years," said Myron S. Augsburger, president, in presenting Bro. Gehman with a citation. "Dr. Gehman has served faithfully since 1925, participating in much of EMC's 52-year history," he added.

Other faculty honored at the banquet were Grace B. Lefever, high school math teacher, and Lester C. Shank, registrar, for 25 years of service to EMC.

Margaret M. Shenk, librarian, and A. Arlene Bumbaugh, assistant professor of education, received recognition for 20 years at EMC.

Receiving 15-year citations were Grace I. Showalter, librarian of the Menno Simons Historical Library, Linden M. Wenger, assistant professor of philosophy, and Vivian Beachy, EMHS English teacher.

Meat Canning Is Successful

The Mennonite Central Committee portable meat canner finished its 1969-70 season with more than 130,000 cans of beef processed for overseas relief.

This represents a 30 percent increase of beef processed over last year. The canning was done in accordance with the Federal Meat Inspector Supervision.

Operators of the canner, Gary Reimer, Meade, Kan., and Maynard Bender, Kitchener, Ont., had the canner on a five-month tour which started in Kansas and went as far east as western Pennsylvania.

In one three-week period, the canner made five stops in eastern Ohio. During this time they processed a total of 31,784 cans of beef. The Holmes-Tuscarawas Relief Committee worked at Berlin and processed 10,777 cans of beef in five days,
The Mennonite Draft Counseling on Upswing

"Please send me the Draft Counseling Packet II. It seems that many of my friends consider me an instant draft counselor when they find out I'm a Mennonite! So far I'm not well versed in this role. Please help." This letter sent from a coed to the Student Services Office at Mennonite Board of Missions is typical of student requests for draft counseling materials.

In April 1969 the University Mennonite Church at Penn State University in cooperation with the Mennonite Central Committee Peace Section undertook the support and training of volunteer student Donald Ranck. A 15-word advertisement in the university's newspaper precipitated 85 contacts in two months. Ranck was joined in counseling by the chaplain-intern and a volunteer student counselor. "I initiated group discussions to help the men examine their beliefs of what conscientious objection to war really meant," he said. "These discussions also became effective in helping men find for themselves how to express their beliefs."

In Iowa City, Joseph S. Hertzler, pastor of the First Mennonite Church and an appointed member of the American Friends Service Committee, assisted in supplying 12 high school counselors with information about conscientious objection for their files and for distributing to interested students—a courtesy shared by the military recruiting office. Counsel concerning conscientious objection is provided by counselors in a downtown office.

In 1968, Mennonite Student Services Committee in cooperation with MCC Peace Section assembled peace and alternative service materials into two packets. The Draft Counseling Packet I is primarily for use by Mennonite students and faculty in counseling others about the Christian nonresistant faith and alternative service options. Packet I, the college and graduate student packet, is for handout to students of any faith who are seeking answers and guidance on the issue of war and peace. Similar to Packet II, it includes items on Christian pacifism, bibliography, information about conscientious objection, and about provisions in the draft law for alternative service options.

Packetets are available from Mennonite Central Committee, Akron, Pa.—student peace packets, $1.00; draft counseling packets, $2.50. In January 1970 there were an unprecedented 92,744 conscientious objectors in the United States. Three thousand fellows were awaiting trial for conscientious objection and 800 were in prison. An estimated 25,000 to 60,000 American men of draft age were in Canada.

Of the approximately 4,000 students from the various Mennonite groups now studying on non-Mennonite college and university campuses, a scout but increasing minority is reporting involvement in draft counseling. Opposition to the Vietnam War is heavily represented by young men who have no institutional relationship to the historic peace churches.

Conference Group Inspired to Action

Right from the start it was obvious that the Church Extension Workshop held Jan. 27 and 28 at the Des Moines (Iowa) Mennonite Church would prove to be more than an ordinary meeting. The question whether to meet in the church sanctuary that accommodates 40 or in the basement that seats 80 was resolved when twice as many persons showed up as were expected.

No brilliant oratories were given; no printed programs were distributed. Nelson Kauffman, secretary for Evangelism with Mennonite Board of Missions presently on leave of absence, addressed the group briefly several times, but never from behind a pulpit. How could such a gathering accomplish anything?

Clearly if anything was to be accomplished, it would happen because those in attendance were prepared to share openly with each other. An honest searching and openness to the Spirit of God was mandatory.

In a written report to the Home Missions Office at Mennonite Board of Missions, Joseph Hertzler, pastor of Iowa City Mennonite Church, said:

"We began by analyzing the findings of a questionnaire entitled 'Growth Patterns of Congregations.' It soon became clear that we were unskilled at sharing our faith with nonchurch persons. This was difficult to admit, for we considered ourselves to be evangelical and missionary-minded. We tried to short-circuit the evidence, but finally admitted that the Spirit of God was convicting us."

The workshop assembly then divided into small groups and soon arrived at a general agreement that the greatest hindrances to effective Christian witness existed in these areas:

— An unclear purpose for church programs.
— Lack of genuine interest in evangelism.
— Too ingrown, introverted, and narrow, both in individual and corporate viewpoints.

"These findings hit us hard, but we were determined to be honest," Hertzler said. "At this point in the meeting we all felt a bit discouraged, but nevertheless we managed to move on to determine that as Christians we do have several things going for us—a message the world needs, salvation through Christ and His way of love and peace, tremendous personnel resources, both professionally trained persons and those who have various service experiences such as V.S., T.A.P., M.I.D.S., etc."

Following the positive input and general discussion sessions, workshop personnel divided into three groups (rural churches over 100 members, rural churches under 100, and urban congregations) to formulate ways to carry out their mission.

"It became obvious that we were brothers," Hertzler said. "It mattered little whether our particular congregation was large or small, rural or urban; we all faced the same basic problems and needs. Each congregation needed encouragement and help, and we found strength in sharing both our victories and failures."

Two possible approaches for continuing the kind of spirit generated at the workshop were suggested for the future. Two or three congregations could meet together every three months to identify needs and develop plans to meet those needs. At the next meeting time would be spent reviewing the progress made toward accomplishing the goals. New visions would be shared and goals adjusted if necessary.

A second method of working is to share victories and trials that might prove helpful to other congregations through articles prepared for the Iowa-Nebraska Conference paper, Missionary Challenge. James Detweiler, Manson, Iowa; John Willems, Milford, Neb.; and Joseph Hertzler, Iowa City, were appointed 'church extension consultants' to help congregations upon request to study needs and devise ways to meet them.

The workshop concluded with a spontaneous celebration. According to Hertzler, the four walls of the Des Moines Mennonite Church vibrated to the full-voiced strains of 'How Great Thou Art.' This was followed by voluntary prayers of Thanksgiving.
he was heard saying: "There was more going on at this workshop for the small amount of programmed structure than any other meeting I’ve attended."

April 18, 19 Is GC Commencement

Activities for Goshen College’s 72nd annual commencement have been set for the weekend of Apr. 18 and 19.

Preaching the baccalaureate sermon at 11:00 a.m. in the Church-Chapel, Sunday, Apr. 19, will be Paul Mininger, president of Goshen College.

The commencement address will be delivered by John H. Yoder, president-elect of Goshen Biblical Seminary, at 3:30 that afternoon in Union Auditorium. About 260 seniors will be recognized during the degree-awarding ceremony.

Activities on Saturday, Apr. 18, will be dedication of the Jacob F. Rupp Memorial Organ and the senior nurses’ class program.

The senior nurses’ graduation program is set for 3:00 p.m. in the Church-Chapel with a tea in their honor immediately afterward. A highlight of the occasion is the traditional lighting of the nursing lamps and the awarding of the pins.

North American Youth Team Selected

Five members for the North America Mennonite Youth Exchange Team were selected on Mar. 23 by Art Smoker, Secretary for Youth Ministry, Scottsdale, Pa., and by representatives from the Personnel and VS Offices of Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart. The applicants chosen are: Fred Kauffman, 22, West Point, Neb.; Arthur Griffen, 18, Norristown, Pa.; Cynthia Wingard, 21, Hollspole, Pa.; Becky Lehman, 18, Elkhart, Ind.; and Blanca Ruiz, 20, Grantville, Pa. The team will be visiting Mennonite churches in Brazil, Argentina, and Uruguay from June 27 to Aug. 15, returning to participate in the Mennonite Youth Convention to be held at Lake Junaluska, N.C., Aug. 16 to 21.

The youth tour is the second part of an America’s exchange of Mennonite youth. From Dec. 30 to Feb. 23, five Latin-American youth — Jaime Gardin and Ana Marile Gencer, Brazil; Hugo Moreira, Uruguay; Adriana Matteuci and Hector Boyajian, Argentina — visited churches in North America, sharing their faith on the theme, "We’ve a Story to Tell to the Nations."

The first half of the exchange provided many with an opportunity not only to experience the fraternal pleasantness of foreign contact, but also to share the greater meaning of a universal Christ.

BMS to Host Music Festival

The eighth annual Mennonite High School Music Festival will be hosted by Belleville Mennonite School of Belleville, Pa., on Apr. 11 and 12. The festival is hosted on a rotating schedule by schools that are members of the Mennonite Secondary Education Council.

Because Belleville Mennonite School does not have the facilities for a group of this size, the program will be given at the Kishacoquillas High School Auditorium.

Choruses participating this year are Iowa Mennonite High School, Kalona, Iowa; Bethany Christian High School, Goshen, Ind.; Central Christian High School, Kidron, Ohio; Rockway Mennonite High School, Kitchener, Ont., Canada; United Mennonite Educational Institute, Leamington, Ont., Canada; Eastern Mennonite High School, Harrisonburg, Va.; Christopher Dock Mennonite High School, Lansdale, Pa.; and the chorus of Belleville Mennonite School.

Each year a guest conductor is chosen to direct the six numbers sung by the mass chorus. Mr. Lowell Byler, Head of Music Department at Heaton College, Heaton, Kan., will be this year’s guest conductor.

A total of 305 high school students will sing as a mass chorus after each individual chorus has presented several numbers.

Prospects Good for New Congregation

Arlington, Va., is a growing suburb adjacent to the nation’s capital. Recently several persons from the Virginia Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities met with five Arlington area families to explore their interest in starting a Mennonite fellowship in this Washington, D.C., suburb.

Kenneth Good, pastor of the Hyattsville (Md.) Mennonite Church, was present at this first meeting. A few Arlington area residents attend the Hyattsville Church, but the Washington traffic is no incentive for them to attend regularly at a church on the opposite side of the city.

Good estimates that at least 500 Mennonites, or those having some Mennonite background, live in the greater Washington area. He believes that many come to Washington to escape and blend into the general Washington mood of loneliness. Higher wages and government jobs lure many people to the capital city.

Enthusiasm for a new fellowship ran high, according to Moses Slabaugh, secretary for the Virginia Board. A few brethren living in the Arlington area were asked to plan and be on the alert for suitable quarters where a group of believers could fellowship. There would be approximately 30 people including children who could begin a Mennonite fellowship in the Arlington area. The Virginia Board will be looking for a pastor and stands ready to assist the group in any way possible.

FIEL DNS NOTES

Alvin Hostetter, Board photographer, who had surgery several weeks ago, has experienced further difficulty and underwent surgery again on Mar. 19.

Mrs. George Beare, Upland, Calif., entered the hospital on March 18 for lung surgery for the removal of a tumor in her right lung.

Wilbert Shenk returned on Mar. 13 from an administrative visit to Europe and West Africa. The immediate purpose of the trip was to work with Vern Preheim of MCC in making plans for Mennonite cooperation in the rehabilitation and reconstruction efforts being initiated in Nigeria in the aftermath of the recent war. All such programs are subject to government approval and supervision. MCC plans to contribute to this work through two channels: Quaker Service and Christian Council of Nigeria’s Rehabilitation Commission.

The Sixth Annual Missionary Photography Seminar sponsored by Ken Anderson Films, Winona Lake, Ind., will be held December 8, 9, and 10, 1970. There is no charge to missionaries attending. Contact the Overseas Office at Mennonite Board of Missions if interested in attending this seminar.

Cecil Ashley writes from Lapa, S.P., Brazil: "On Mar. 2 several of us returned from a weekend of visits in the interior. Our last stop was Sertaozinho where we held an installation service for Josue and Luzia Melquiades, the newly licensed pastor and his wife. The Lapa representatives presented the couple with a large comforter made by the Women’s Society of the Lapa congregation, the couple’s home church. The names of each of the sisters was embroidered on this gift of love."

The Mennonite Nurses’ Association is having its annual meeting at Eastern Mennonite College, Harrisonburg, Va., Aug. 7-9. The MNA is meeting in conjunction with the MMA (Mennonite Medical Association). The general theme is: “The Christian’s Obligation to Poverty.”

Open sessions are the Friday afternoon banquet, all day Saturday, and Sunday morning worship. Plan now to attend.

Sunday School Workshop, Apr. 18, 19, at Krall Mennonite Church, Lebanon, Pa. Sessions begin at 7:15 p.m., April 18. Speakers include Paul E. Martin, Norman Shertzer, Jacob Frederick, Jacob Stahl, Sanford Shetler, Nelson Martin, Paul Reed, Earl Groff, and Etheil Reed.

Mrs. James (Rowena) Lark, 77, of Fresno, Calif., passed away on Mar. 5 following a stroke. Funeral services were held on Mar. 9 at the Cooley Funeral Home in Fresno with LRoy Bechler, pastor of the Calvary Mennonite Church in suburban Los Angeles, officiating. Interment followed at Fresno Memorial Gardens.

The current issue of ACTS, a magazine recording today’s news of the Holy Spirit’s renewal, carries a special feature, 12 pages in length with pictures, entitled “Mennonites: in the Charismatic Movement.” Copies may be obtained by writing ACTS, P.O. Box 17066, Los Angeles, Calif. 90017. An introductory article was written by Gerald C. Studer which surveys the evidences of charismatic renewal in many of the district conferences. This is followed by the personal testimonies of teenager, Wilbur Byler, Belleville, Pa.; Norma Hostetter, Washington, D.C.; James Fairfield, Harrisonburg, Va.; and S. Djojohardjo, Indonesia.

New members by baptism: four at Springfield, Waynesboro, Va.; seven at Monterey, Leola, Pa.; three by baptism and three by confession of faith at North Lima, Ohio.

Dale Schunn, Latehar, Bihar, India, reports: “We continue to work here with some gains and setbacks. The hostel has now completed a rather successful first year under the operation of the church. . . . There were some real encouraging happenings at the annual conference. At one evening service the theme was ‘Stewardship’ and there were quite a few commitments to start or revive tithing. Another encouragement was in the elections. We now have a completely Indian executive committee and only one conference committee has a missionary chairman. This is quite a big change in the past several years.”

Mr. and Mrs. Otis Hochstetler write from Brasilia, Brazil: “We coordinated a four-day missionary conference in February. Missionary Information Bureau in Sao Paulo arranged for the speakers—Mr. and Mrs. Alan Redpath. Nearly 60 missionaries participated, of which 28 were Wycliffe Bible Translators. Cecil and Margaret Ashley took in several sessions and the city tour while they were here.”

When, long ago, people brought their children to Jesus, we read that Jesus "took them in his arms and blessed them, laying his hands upon them." We are still bringing our children to Jesus. We want Him to bless them. It is my hope that the Bible storybook will help little children to feel His love.

The author, Cornelia Lehn, is a staff member of the Commission on Education of the General Conference Mennonite Church. She has studied Christian Education at Mennonite Biblical Seminary, Elkhart, Indiana, and holds a Master's Degree in Journalism from the University of Iowa, Iowa City, Iowa.

The illustrator, Mrs. Beatrice Darwin, is a professional artist from Danville, California. She is known for her illustration of Robbie Trent's book, Jesus' First Trip, published by Broadman.

GOD KEEPS HIS PROMISE
by Cornelia Lehn

This book contains seventy Bible stories prepared for reading to the four- and five-year-old child. Included in the 192 pages, size 8 x 10 1/4, are 69 four-color and 11 black and white illustrations. The book is bound in washable white Kivar printed in four colors.

These Bible stories were carefully selected by the Preschool Counsel and Reference Committee composed of representatives from the General Conference Mennonite Church, the Mennonite Church, and the Evangelical Mennonite Church to give an overview of the story the Bible tells in a way that the small child is able to understand.

In the selection of stories the committee attempted to reflect the sweep of God's redemptive activity. In writing the stories the author attempted to retain the power and emotion of the Bible accounts without distorting reality, either in the acts of God or in the affairs of men. No attempts have been made to add applications, or morals, or interpretations to these stories. The Bible stories speak for themselves.

God Keeps His Promise is a tool to help the Christian share with children the story the Bible tells about the heritage of the Christian faith. The stories emphasize God's actions and man's response in history and through them the child comes to see God at work in the present. It is not necessary to read the stories in sequence. The stories can be read to the children whenever they want them and in the order they prefer.

A Prayer-Answering God

By a Minister’s Wife on the Frontier

I remember a day during one winter that stands out like a boulder in my life. The weather was unusually cold, our salary had not been regularly paid, and it did not meet our needs when it was. My husband was away traveling from one district to another most of the time. Our boys were well, but my little Ruth was ailing, and at the best none of us were decently clothed. I patched and repatched, with spirits sinking to their lowest ebb. The water gave out in the well, and the wind blew through the floor.

The people in the parish were kind, and generous, too, but the settlement was struggling for itself. Little by little, at the time I needed it most, my faith began to waver. Early in life I was taught to take God at His Word, and I thought my lesson was well learned. I had lived upon promises in dark times, until I knew, as David did, who was “My Fortress and Deliverer.” Now a daily prayer for forgiveness was all I could offer. My husband’s overcoat was hardly thick enough for October, and he was obliged to ride miles to attend some meeting or a funeral. Many a time our breakfast was Indian cake and a cup of tea without sugar. Christmas was coming; the children always expected their presents. I remember the ice was thick and smooth and the boys were each craving a pair of skates. Ruth, in some unaccountable way, had taken a fancy that the dolls I had made were no longer suitable; she wanted a nice, large one, and insisted on praying for it. I knew it was impossible; but oh, how I wanted to give each child his present. It seemed as if God had deserted us, but I did not tell my husband all this. He worked earnestly and heartily. I supposed him to be as hopeful as ever. I kept the sitting room cheerful with an open fire, and tried to serve our scanty meals as invitingly as I could.

The morning before Christmas James was called to see a sick man. I put up a piece of bread for his lunch—the best I could do—wrapped my plaid shawl around his neck, and then tried to whisper a promise, as I often had, but the words died away upon my lips. I let him go without it. I coax ked the children to bed early, for I could not bear to hear them talk. When Ruth went, I listened to her prayer; she asked for the last time most explicitly for her doll, and for skates for her brothers. Her bright face looked so lovely when she whispered to me, “You know, I think they’ll be here early tomorrow morning, Mamma.” I thought I would move heaven and earth to save her from disappointment. I sat down alone and gave way to most bitter tears.

Before long James returned, chilled and exhausted. He drew off his boots. The thin stockings slipped off with them, and his feet were red with cold. I would not treat a dog that way, yet alone a faithful servant. Then, as I glanced up and saw the hard lines in his face, and the look of despair, it flashed across to me, James had let go too. I brought him a cup of tea, feeling sick and dizzy at the very thought. He took my hand, and we sat for an hour without a word. I wanted to die and meet God and tell Him His promise was not true; my soul was full of rebellious despair.

There came a sound of bells, a quick step and a loud knock at the door. James sprang up to open it. There stood Deacon White. “A box came for you by express before dark. I brought it around as soon as I could get away. Reckon it might be for Christmas; at any rate, they shall have it tonight. Here is a turkey my wife asked me to fetch along, and these other things I believe belong to you.” There was a basket of potatoes and a bag of flour. Talking all the time, he hurried in the box, and then with a hearty “Good night” he rode away.

Still without speaking, James found a chisel and opened the box. I drew out at first a thick red blanket, and we saw that the box was full of clothing. It seemed at that moment as if Christ had fastened upon me a look of reproach. James sat down and covered his face with his hands. “I can’t touch them,” he exclaimed. “I haven’t been true, just when God has been trying me to see if I could hold out. Do you think I could not see how you were suffering, and I had no words of comfort to offer. I know now how to preach the awfulness of turning away from God.”

“James,” I said, clinging to him, “don’t take it to heart like this. I am to blame. I ought to have helped you. We will ask Him to forgive us.”

“Wait a moment, dear. I cannot talk now,” then he went into another room. I knelt down and my heart broke. In an instant all the darkness, all the stubbornness rolled away. Jesus came again and stood before me, but now with the loving word, daughter! Sweet promises of tenderness and joy flooded my soul. I was so lost in praise and gratitude that
I forgot everything else. I do not know how long it was before James came back, but I knew he, too, had found peace. "Now, my dear wife," said he, "let us thank God together." And then he poured out words of praise—Bible words, for nothing else could express our thanksgiving.

It was eleven o'clock, the fire was low, and there was the great box, and nothing touched but the warm blanket we needed. We piled on some fresh logs, lighted two candles, and began to examine our treasures. We drew out an overcoat. I made James try it on—just the right size! I danced awhile around him, for all my lightheartedness had returned. Then there was a cloak, and he insisted on seeing me in it. My spirits always infected him, and we both laughed like children. There was a warm suit of clothes also, and three pairs of woolen hose. There was a dress for me and yards of flannel, a pair of arctic overshorts for each of us, and in mine was a slip of paper. I have it now, and mean to hand it down to my children. It was Moses' blessing to Asher. "Thy shoes shall be iron and brass; and as thy days, so shall thy strength be." In the gloves, evidently for James, the same dear hand had written, "I the Lord thy God will hold thy right hand, saying unto thee, Fear not; I will help thee."

It was a wonderful box, and packed with wonderful care. There was a suit of clothes for each of the boys, and a little red gown for Ruth. There were mittens, scarfs, and hoods. Down in the center was a box. We opened it and there was a great wax doll. I burst into tears again. James wept with me for joy. It was too much, and then we both exclaimed again, for close behind it came two pairs of skates. There were books for us to read—some of them I had wished to see—stories for the children to read, aprons and under-clothing, knots of ribbon, a gay little tidy, a lovely phonograph, needles, buttons, and thread—actually a muff! and an envelope containing a ten-dollar gold piece. At least we cried over everything we took up.

It was past midnight, and we were faint and exhausted even with happiness. I made a cup of tea, cut a fresh loaf of bread, and James boiled some eggs. We drew up to the table before the fire. How we enjoyed our supper! And then we sat talking over all our life, and how sure a help God had always proved.

You should have seen the children the next morning. The boys raised a shout at the sight of their skates. Ruth caught up her doll and hugged it tightly without a word; then she went into her room and knelt by her bed. When she came back, she whispered to me, "I knew it would be here, Mamma, but I wanted to thank God just the same, you know."

"Look here, wife, see the difference."

We went to the window, and there were the boys out of the house already, and skating on the crust with all their might. My husband and I both tried to return thanks to the church in the East that sent us the box, and have tried to return thanks unto God every day since.

Hard times have come again and again, but we have trusted Him, dreading nothing so much as a doubt of His protecting care. Over and over again we have proved that "They that seek the Lord shall not want any good thing."

The more I observe sin, the more it impresses me. I would say, from my experiences here on earth this past year, that the battle between good and evil is not an equal one, because the average human being often finds that the satisfaction of sinning outweighs the rewards of righteousness.

For example, he seldom gets the delight from putting a twenty-dollar bill in the collection plate that he gets from spending it on some purely personal pleasure like gourmet dining or the best seats at the ball game. And he probably gets little or no enjoyment from giving up golf on Saturday to help his mother-in-law clean her basement. These are not, of course, real saint-sinner determinants, but they point up one of the facts of life—the temptation toward selfishness is greater than the temptation toward altruism.

Another thing which keeps the score uneven is that sin is habit-forming whereas virtue can be kicked without any pangs of withdrawal. The oral indulgences—smoking, drinking, overeating—are among the more obvious. The person who is hooked really intends to give up his particular vice, but the idea that "just one more time won't hurt" keeps him from ever actually getting around to it. The same goes for infidelity, or gambling, or gossiping; reform is rare indeed.

Yet people who have gone to church for years can give it up for some small grievance and hardly miss it after a couple of weeks. Unlike the sinners, they do not say, "Just once more—and then I'll stop." They make a clean break—no one last Sunday morning worship, or Wednesday night prayer meeting, or even choir practice; they just stop—period! And I have yet to hear anybody say, "Just one more good deed—then I'll quit forever." or "Just this one last contribution to charity—then no more." Somehow our side has managed to get the odds. I don't know how it happened, Boss, but I do know we have a good thing going for us.
Youth Convention and Compassion Fund

That’s an odd combination. There is little connection but we can make one. Youth are looking for ways to raise the $65 it takes. So here’s a suggestion.

Have the youth group make arrangements with congregational leaders for a fund drive managed totally by young people with the proceeds going 50-50 for convention and compassion. Congregational leaders could take the initiative in creating a climate of openness to the idea.

The Compassion Fund is a special, above-budget program of the Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart, a Christian response to the mounting needs in the ghettos.

Youth Convention happens only occasionally. This is the year for it. The place is Lake Junaluska, North Carolina. The time is August 16 to 21. Not all young people can go. Those who can should be considered the representatives of the whole congregation. When the representatives return they will have an enthusiastic report for all. So it follows that cooperation in sending youth is important.

Young people could send the youth group in twos to all of the homes of the congregation. This would provide an opportunity for explaining the Compassion Fund and the convention; of course they would need to study up on both. The contributions would be split between learning and mission, convention and compassion, which is the balance Jesus speaks of in the Great Commission.

What we have suggested above is only one idea on raising the registration money. There are many others. Most youth groups will generate their own. Here are a few starters used before.

Young people organized baby-sitting services so some were always available. Car washes were planned. On a certain Saturday dozens of cars came home clean. Persons who wanted to make a greater contribution got a wax job. Some youth groups made slaves of themselves for a day. They were sold at auction to members who had chicken houses to clean or basements to scrub. The price of the slave went to the convention travel and registration fund. Some youth groups cleaned up the church grounds. Others contracted to be responsible for the cemetery for the summer. A youth leader, a parent, a church trustee or a pastor after reading this can take the initiative in getting things going.

The major thing in all these ideas is to put a congregational blessing on the youth who go to the convention. It is just as important as sending representatives to Mission Board or General Conference.

By Still Waters

For three years I did not cease night or day to admonish every one with tears. Acts 20:31.

In the quietness of an evening chat together a dear minister friend of mine told me how embarrassed he is because at times he weeps when he is preaching. I know this friend as one who has the love of Christ in his heart. His concern is Christ’s concern. He is in good company with the Apostle Paul who speaks about his own experience of admonishing people daily with tears.

My friend is not melancholy or pessimistic. He is no bemoaner of the times. Far from it. Each time we part I’ve been inspired. We have laughed together. He is fun to be with. And each time we part I have added courage to go on. Life is never dull in his companionship.

But when he preaches his heart overflows and he sheds tears on behalf of those to whom he speaks. He tells the gospel with tears. Should he be ashamed? No! He has a ministry of tears. And as I see his ministry I can only say, “Would to God that more had such a ministry.” When he admonishes, in the name of the Lord, hearts are melted. His ministry is one which bears the sheaves home again rejoicing.

Ideas

Man’s mind stretched to a new idea, never goes back to its original dimension. Ideas are important. They even determine destiny. Ideas clothed in proper language are moral dynamite. A good idea is priceless. Good practical ideas are working capital. They create capital. They are like children — your very own are very wonderful. Ideas make great men, and great books. I do not mean just words, words only carry ideas.

When a boy in Scotland, Andrew Carnegie had a litter of rabbits, and nothing to feed them. But he had a brilliant idea. He told the neighborhood boys, if they would pull enough clover and dandelions to feed his rabbits, he would name the bunnies in their honor. The plan worked like magic. Years later Carnegie used the same psychology in business. He wanted to sell steel rails to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. Mr. J. Edgar Thomson was the president of the company at the time. So Carnegie built a large steel mill in Pittsburgh. He called it the J. Edgar Thomson Steel Works. Thomson was delighted, and of course bought his steel rails from Carnegie. The creative power of thought is one of the greatest in the universe. It is probably the only area where man can create. If you have brains use them.

Make Love Your Aim

Too often we fail to look beneath the surface in our concern. We see actions or hear words and jump to conclusions which hurt rather than help persons. Christ calls us to transform all by love.

Paul, also in Philippians, prays that we may comprehend with all love. We never really understand a person until we love him. Love helps us see a person as he really is. Love changes our own viewpoint.

We forget that the person who acts condescendingly is likely painfully shy. Fighting the inward problem of shyness he seeks to hide it by standing aloof from persons or problems which would reveal his weakness. We look at his condescending attitude or aloofness and label him. Love leads us to accept him as he is. And since one does not need to hide anything in the presence of real love, help and insight is gained.

We forget that oftentimes the overcritical person is one starved for love and appreciation. This can happen at any age. The young person who does not experience the acceptance of love will likely become critical of anything which moves or doesn’t move. He cannot get love and appreciation for being good so he will get attention in some other way. Often this is by a very critical spirit.

Or the middle-aged person may basically act little different from the adolescent or teenager who seems against everything. We may see how such a one continually reacts against, builds programs which center around himself, and condemns others in order to promote himself, yet fail to see that he is a person who needs love and appreciation rather than counter criticism.

A critical person desires love even though adolescent-like he may do the very things which make it harder to love him. The child who is love hungry will often do the very things for attention which cause people to love him less or even punish him. On the surface it may seem he wants to make parents or others angry with him. Deeper, however, is the desire to get attention and love.

Old age can be a trying time. Life work and responsibility decreases. Others take over. We fail to continue to share words of love and appreciation for the contributions given even though small. What can easily happen in such a situation is that the person feels unwanted, unneeded, and unappreciated and he may take a critical stance against the church, society, or persons.

We forget that the noisy, aggressive youth is often sadly unsure of himself. So instead of encouragement to such we may shove him on the sidelines or laugh at his antics. This causes even more insecurity. He feels no one else takes him seriously so he becomes less and less sure of himself. Often a little confidence and love expressed can make the difference between failure and success in life. Love is quick to stand by and for the one who is shaky. And love can sense such a need long before life hits the rocks or falls.

No wonder Christ calls us to transform all by love. This begins by accepting people fully as they are not as we wish they might be. One of our greatest faults is that we want to love people the way we wish they were rather than the way they are. Love loves people just as they are. Love comprehends the possibilities which lie beneath the surface. Nothing so much changes our own attitudes as love. Nothing so much changes other people as love. Nothing else so much outlasts life itself. Therefore as the Apostle Paul says, “Make love your aim.” — D.

"As I See It" Column

A new feature to begin very soon in Gospel Herald is a column called "As I See It." This column is planned so that more readers can be involved in expressing viewpoints through the pages of Gospel Herald. It is to be a sharing of ideas and concerns written by you the reader. In other words you are invited to write on any subject you desire giving your own opinion about it.

This feature is different from the "Readers Say" in that "Readers Say" is a response to published articles. "As I See It" will carry concerns of all kinds. It developed out of a feeling that many persons in the church have something to say of importance which should be shared. Not everyone can write a full-length article but most people have some opinion on some things which is worth sharing.

In addition some may feel that certain issues are not being spoken to. This will afford opportunity to draw such issues to attention. Others may see needs or work in the church which should be shared. Still others may see things in the church which, as they see it, should not be. All are encouraged to submit such concerns to the "As I See It" column.

Certain guides should be kept in mind. First, a Christian spirit of love and concern should characterize the material. Second, it should be positive. This does not mean that nothing negative should be said. Rather it means that some help or guidance ought to be included in order that readers will be edified. Third, material should not attack persons. Rather ideas and issues should be spoken to. Fourth, all submissions must be signed. They can not be acknowledged or returned. And finally material must not exceed 400 words. — D.
Strawberries, Vacations, Jobs, and God

By Simon Schrock

A strange thing happens to people as the phone rings and the leader of summer Bible school responds to the "hello." The strange thing hits just as he asks, "Can you help in our Bible school this summer?" It starts to inflict people in late spring and by fall everyone is completely recovered.

That one question, "Can you help?" causes all of us to take notice of ourselves and our busy schedule. You are needed for three hours a day to teach God's Word. You will need study and prayer time too. Can you help?

Can you teach God's Word this summer? The leader presented the need. Now he waits for your answer. You can't just hang up. So you clear your throat and begin. "Oh, I'd just love to, but the strawberries are just coming in strong at that time. We have to pick and freeze them, and really I don't see how we can help. But if you just can't find anyone else, I might try it."

Another call. "Can you help, Brother John?" "Well, I'm so sorry but we have our cottage reserved at the beach for a week. And what is bad, the two best days at the beach come on the first days of Bible school. Linda will be upset if she and her friend can't go swimming at the beach, and we don't want her provoked at us. We have this planned already. Nice of you thinking of us, but count us out. But do have a good school."

Now for another try. "Say, I appreciate your asking us, but since Bill got the new car and camper we are in debt, and we can't stand that. He has to stay on his second job till late and by the end of the day he is worn out. If we don't keep up the payments, we will lose it all. As for Jane, the job she took to earn money for college takes her time. Sorry. Maybe you could get Sister Clara. She doesn't have anything that important to do."

One more try. "Can you help?" "We just can't. The garden is ready to be worked. Joe can't get off work since we took our vacation at the ski slope in February. The girls both work and Bobby has to work to pay his own fine for speeding and running that stop sign. Maybe another year—but not this year." That is the runaround the leader gets, and whom will he try next?

"Why should I teach? The others don't," was the question put to me by a brother. He pointed out that his buddies were enjoying life in a leisurely way. "They aren't teaching; so why should I?" That is a good reason why you should fire up for the Lord and teach. Others don't—you must. Now is your time to get on the soul-saving line and rescue some of the souls that will be suffering for eternity. Souls are headed toward hell because too many of us are enjoying a life of indifference. Why should you teach? God needs you. And that is the important reason why you should teach.

We nod our heads in approval when Brother William preaches, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you." Our nod may have been in approval of "these things." Then we leave our house of worship and forget about the kingdom till the next Sunday morning around nine. In the meanwhile the boat motor got tuned and the golfing equipment is in the trunk.

Maybe you have a good reason for not teaching—like lacking a vision of leading children to Christ. If you lack a vision of seeing children yielding their hearts to Jesus, then you won't be an effective teacher. Children will hardly discover how to be saved if your goal is not set to show them the way.

Some should not teach because they are not fired up for Jesus. If you have no fire, you will not set anyone else aflame for Jesus. It takes boiling water to kill germs. And it takes a person committed to Christ and powered by the Holy Spirit to lead people from sin to salvation.

Should you just say no and confess you are disobedient to God's Word? the life you live says the opposite of what you are to teach. Your message is distorted and will not get through. If these cases are yours, God is calling you to a rededication to Himself.

If we believe in Bible school as a means of teaching the gospel, then why not take it seriously? Why dread the first Monday and rejoice at the last Friday night when the program is over? Is it that bad? Why not look forward eagerly to teaching God's Word? And why not expect and believe that souls will turn to Christ and be saved? It is a rather careless process we go through, running off the routine of schedule for two weeks and not expecting a soul saved.

We shall take it seriously. It is a part of Christ's work. It should be given a superior place in our lives—like our farmer brothers who plan "these things," like strawberries, jobs, and vacations, around the annual Bible school. Bible school time is the most important item for those two weeks. If the half day spent teaching prevents them from getting in the straw before the rain, then they just have rained-on straw, but Bible-taught children. God tells us to be "always abounding in the work of the Lord" (1 Cor. 15:58). He wants us to be ready to serve in His work at any time. To be always in His work means He has our hearts and our uttermost desires. It means we are submitted to His control. He is our manager.

Take a lesson from another brother who took a good-paying job. He explained to his employer that he was in the Lord's service. When a duty of Christ calls for attention, it gets priority over the job. He still has his job, but the work of Christ continues.

There is a blessing one receives from teaching God's Word. You do get a bit of satisfaction to serve your friend strawberries and say they are of your own. Or show your photos of all the places you have been in this world. You do enjoy talking of the accomplishments you have made on the job. But the real blessings and satisfaction come from knowing that some of those boys you taught for years in Bible school are now church leaders and builders. There is real joy to know that some of your students have yielded their lives to Jesus and are living for Him. It is a blessing to know that young people are facing life in a Christian way. And these blessings won't come to you on the job or at the beach.

Now all of us fine Christians expect a straight through ticket to glory when Jesus goes through the book to check us in. We expect God to rush our way like an emergency ambulance when we are in trouble. We want to have God at our push button control. That is a dead relationship. God wants us at His control. He wants us to give Him the very first place in our life. If He isn't first, then that figures why you can't teach this year.

Turn yourself in to Christ and then into His work. Discover the deep joys of building His kingdom. Be all alive and burning for Christ. Then you can bring others to an all-alive life in Him too. After all, that is what you are meant to be.

Strawberries, vacations, and jobs have their place, but some of us have them in the wrong place.

Can you teach this year?

High-Aim: Upgrading the Student

By Lee Roy Berry

The High-Aim program, which officially began in the fall of 1968, is set up to assist high school-age youth whose potential is likely to be stifled by environmental factors of urban areas. The idea arose the summer of 1967 in the mind of Lee Roy Berry, then a VS teacher in the Cleveland, Ohio, public school system. In 1969, seven students from four U.S. cities were selected and given financial assistance to attend four Mennonite secondary schools. (For more background, see Gospel Herald church news for Sept. 16, 1969, p. 185.)

High-Aim has been both successful and problematical at some points. Of the seven students who entered the program last fall, six are still attending and for the most part are getting along well academically and spiritually. Furthermore, the youth are highly appreciative of the schools they attend.

The problems which High-Aim is experiencing may be divided into four areas. 1) A significant degree of conflict exists between High-Aim students and the families with whom they live. The problem seems to arise out of the students' and their host families' differing life styles. The degree of conflict intensifies when the students come from poor social and economic situations. The remedy to this situation is to plan a longer period of orientation for prospective students and to establish stronger lines of communication between the participating schools, the host families, and High-Aim.

2) Presently the program has no formalized structure. A formal organization would provide a clear delegated responsibility for administering the program.

3) High-Aim must help the participating schools see the implications of their effort. For example, High-Aim sees itself as an extension of the mission outreach of the church, which means that the participating schools are a part of the same process in which Home Missions and Relief and Service participate. Therefore, mission outreach cannot be carried on successfully without the aid of high schools that were originally designed to serve basically established Mennonite congregations. The church needs the additional resources in the form of institutions—in this case educational institutions—in order to make a greater impact on problem areas. High-Aim sees the need for strengthening Mennonite high schools so they can help with this task.

4) The program needs to look for a vast amount of financial resources which means that the program must be sold to those persons capable of supplying them. We are presently working at this endeavor.

Persons interested in more information concerning the High-Aim program may write to Mennonite Board of Missions, Box 370, Elkhart, Indiana 46514.

The Meaning of Redemptive Dealing

By Lloy A. Kniss

When I received the Holy Spirit, He also filled me with the love of God. This love is a great constraining power in me. In fact it is both a constraining power and a restraining power— it makes me do some things, and keeps me from doing other things.

It is repeatedly said that we should be redemptive in our attitudes and in our dealings with offenders and those who need help. The real meaning of the "redemptive attitude" is good and valid, but too often, what some people mean by the term amounts to no more than a spineless and weak permissiveness toward evil. This makes no enemies and no real worthwhile friends. Worst of all, it helps no one to a better life. So in saying what I want to say now, I am not referring to this attitude of permissiveness toward evil. That is not redemptive by any means.

Redemptive Dealing with the Lost

At the base of redemption is forgiveness. At the base of forgiveness is love. Condemning a sinner to his face for his wrongdoing so often seems so right to some of us Christians. But what good have we done by condemning him? We entertain a fear that if we don't promptly condemn a person in the wrong when we see it, we condone it or become partakers in the guilt. This is not true.

The normal process by which a sinner is led to salvation begins with his hearing or reading the Word of God, and seeing it exemplified in a Christian. This brings conviction. Next the sinner condemns himself. Then he repents, and finally he confesses faith in Christ. Our condemning of a sinner is not a part of redemptive dealing. Often a sinner is closed to communications when he is condemned by another person. Jesus said to the adulteress, "Neither do I condemn thee."

In the New Testament we find no instance of a lost soul being required to confess his sins in order to be saved. A seeker must acknowledge his sin (not sins) and he is told in various New Testament passages to repent and believe in Jesus Christ. (In the case of saints who commit any sin, they are told to confess their sins.) What a seeking soul needs to repent of is his way of life— his sinful nature, his sin.

When we meet an unbeliever in the world, who may be very obviously showing signs of pride, vanity, immorality, or even debauchery, we will not feel disgust for him or her; we will not be judgmental; we will not see in him or her an opportunity to glory in ourselves by contrast, like the Pharisee in the temple when he thanked God that he was not as bad as the publican. We will be reminded that, but for the grace of God that could be ourselves. We will see in that lost soul a potential child of God redeemed, saved, and fitted for His glory. We who are trying to win the lost one for Christ must be calm, confident, and happy. A person who is assured of his own good standing with God will not soon resort to condemning others. If we can attain victory over ourselves in this matter we will have come halfway in our effort to win him for Christ.

With all this love for the sinner and desire for his salvation we need to stand firm in witnessing against all sin. If we can in a tactful manner get him to read passages of God's Word that relate to his case it will bring conviction to him. He will not resent God accusing him. However—here care must be used lest we in our carnal tendencies use the Bible as a weapon to give the sinner a beating.

A certain unsaved older man said he likes to talk with me because, "You don't get offended when I use a 'cuss' word sometimes." At the same time I knew he realized he was doing wrong in using "cuss" words. I also knew that his trouble lay deeper than the language he used. He listened soberly when I told him of his need for a change of heart.

Dealing Redemptively Toward Our Brethren

This subtitle of course implies that we are responsible to help our brethren or sisters who may need spiritual help or correction. This responsibility is mostly on leaders and parents, but there are occasions when anyone could be responsible for helping an erring one. Each time we observe the ordinance of foot washing, which is primarily a symbol of loving service, we say in effect, to our brother or sister, "I am willing to serve you in any way I can." This is to be the tenor of our attitude toward our brethren and sisters at all times. This service includes helping in spiritual problems.

There are faults we see in non-Christians, which cause us but little concern because we know that their real needs are deeper than those faults. If a non-Christian cheats someone out of a dime we hardly think much of it because we know he is only acting naturally. But when a Christian does the same thing we become alarmed, for it really indicates that something tragic has already taken place in his spiritual life. Down in his heart something "slipped." A dime is not very much, but the condition in his heart that allowed him to deliberately cheat his brother out of a dime, is a matter infinitely more important than gaining or losing ten cents, or ten thousand dollars.

It is never right for us to condemn another person. However, there are circumstances when we should point out to our brother or our sister that he or she has done wrong. This can be done redemptively without condemning the person. The secret in being able to do this is to be sure we have unfeigned love for our brother. In a case where a brother has wronged me, I would have a harder time to point out his wrong and also convince him that I am doing it out of love. In this case I must forgive him in my heart, even without his apology, and if possible avoid telling him he has wronged me. I should quietly absorb the blow.

If my brother does wrong to another person or to the church or to God, and doesn't realize it, or care, then I should, in true love and concern for his spiritual well-being, go to him and tell him in order to help him. That is what Nathan did to David, and we know what great good came out of it.

If, when dealing with a wrongdoer in a redemptive, way, and effectively, we can really prove to that person that we genuinely love him, the result can be tremendous.

If we want to help one who has done wrong we must carry a forgiving spirit. The statement in the Bible that tells us that if we do not forgive our brother his trespass, then God will not forgive us, is not a legalistic give-and-take proposition. It is deeper. If I forgive my brother I prove that Christ's sacrifice is sufficient for all our sins. If I don't forgive, I prove that I do not believe this and so I also cannot be forgiven.

The spirit of forgiveness must be so much a part of the Christian's life that my love for my brother, or for my enemy, will never be withdrawn, regardless of what either one may do against me or how little he appreciates what I am trying to do for him.

Once I visited a man in the hospital who was very sick. He was a backslidden Christian. When I spoke to him about his spiritual life, he turned in his bed with his back to me and said, "I am not interested." I didn't pray for him there in the hospital, but I also didn't rebuke him or condemn him. After saying a few words as we parted, I quietly left the room and went home. A few days later I visited him in his home. As I came in, he sat up in bed and opened his arms toward me, saying, "I was hoping you would come." After another few days he died. His daughter told me he had given the family a good testimony just before he passed on.

Sometimes parents honestly feel that they should shun or disown a son or daughter that has gone wrong. This can never be right. Certainly it is a severe blow to the parents, but to be redemptive, they must by God's grace absorb that blow and prove to the wayward child that God's forgiveness and redemption can still reach him.

God does give us as Christians special grace to absorb blows from other people. Those who are not Christians return the blow rather than absorb it. We who are God's children will absorb wrongs and forgive. Then only are we in a position to deal redemptively with offenders.

Conclusion

True redemptive dealing is based on the indwelling Holy Spirit. All motivation must be the "love of God," the only true love, the love that can't hate enemies, the love that will make one die for another. The next indispensable quality is humility.

Usually the greatest people are the most humble. They know themselves and their own propensities for evil. A proud person cannot reach down to help a sinner. After that comes the perpetual spirit of forgiveness. This spirit reflects true faith in the sacrifice of Christ, that it will save to the uttermost. Also, to be truly "redemptive" we need personal assurance and confidence. A sinner or an erring brother will never trust one who doesn't trust himself.

Identification with the sinning one is fatal to both. Involvement with him is the only way we can win him.

"Oh, heavenly Father, make me a symbol of redemption, that men seeing what Thou hast done will glorify Thee, and repent of their sin, confessing faith in Jesus Christ, for Thy glory."

Preaching Practical Sermons

"In our sermons we ought to make no ostentatious display of learning, but come down to the level of the people. We should neither beat the air nor use low and vulgar expressions: not introduce too much matter into the sermon, but discuss one fundamental truth fully, prove it thoroughly, and apply it to the heart. Our sermons should not be too dry but practical. Religion should be presented, not as a burden but as a pleasure. Avoid personalities. Let not the love of Jesus be obscured by self-love. Let personal difficulties be settled in your pastoral visits." — Henry Melchior Mühlenberg, 1711-87.

So spoke one of the new world's pioneer preachers, Mühlenberg, educated and ordained in Germany in the Lutheran faith, came to America in 1742. His journeys extended from Savannah, Georgia, to Albany, New York, and inland to central Pennsylvania. His preaching gained him a title from an Indian chief whom he met at his father-in-law's (Conrad Weiser) house. His Indian title was "Gach wungar or ach's." It means "Teacher whose words should go through the hard hearts of men like a saw through a gnarled tree." Selected from The Lutheran, Vol. V, No. 36, June 7, 1923, page 4, by Wilmer D. Swope.
How Few His Followers

By John Powell

The God of creation is continually acting in society.
Again, He is calling a remnant to draw near to Him and obey His commandments. He is calling a nation from chaos to repentance.
Yet, His "chosen" ones who should hear His voice do not know Him.
His "chosen" ones have become heathens who mouth the right words at the appropriate times.
His "chosen" ones, whom He led to a land of free worship, have turned against His will and have refused to follow their Master, and have become the oppressors in middle-class America.
So, God says to a new people, "Come unto me . . . and I will give you rest." The blacks, the browns, and the whites who feel a part of Him out of understanding and devotion, have reached out to find what God is saying to a decaying society. Like a mighty thunder, God calls out through oppressed black and brown voices, "White America, my loved ones, come back to Me!" Yet, no response.
God's call is not new; it has echoed constantly in every decaying society of every age. As one hears the voices of the blacks and browns crying out, they become the voices of the Israelites in bondage in Egypt. As one hears the words of Dr. Martin L. King, one hears the voices of Moses and of Amos. The hammering of Black Power advocates denouncing the sickness of society sounds much like the cries of the Zealots and the shouts of Jesus Barabbas. The rigid legalism of contemporary Christians becomes like the Pharisaism of old. The nation, which in its nationalism and patriotism refuses to see the difference between violence of a person and violence of a system, becomes the nation of Israel, which stubbornly refuses to hear Christ.
But the murders of prominent leaders assure the oppressed minorities that the Messiah is about ready to return to draw His people together. Yes, the oppressed peoples of this land see a God of grace and power, who has and is destroying the system of servitude that the rich white society has perpetuated and middle-class society has condoned. So, God through Christ and the voices of the oppressed continues to direct, convict, convert, and consecrate.
The God of history and the Christ of the poor are active forces within oppressed communities. God is love, and love is active. Love is being recognized as the basis of unity within the minority communities. The love that Christ showed to an oppressed people - the Zealots, the lame, the deaf, the poor, the immorally sick, and the spiritually ill - is permeating men's minds today. It is permeating the minds of those challenging the power possessed by white middle-class America. It is permeating the minds of those who are denying themselves the privilege and power given to white middle-class America. Christ, then, is the revelator. His life is so interwoven with the lives of others that He takes on the hurts, the unwanted feelings of the "oppressed sinners."
Ah! Christ the revolutionist! He talks about the kingdom of God and the reconciling power of the Holy Spirit in bridging the gaps between God and man. He digs into the core of human existence and involvement to break the shackles of slavery wherever He finds it.
In His life and ministry, Christ not only sought to heal the lame, cure the sick, and comfort the oppressed, but He sought to bring the truth of Scripture to bear upon the minds of the oppressors. He, today, is tearing down the unethical and irreligious principles of society, thus bringing about healing and reconciliation. In Luke 4:18, 19 Christ defines this ministry:

"The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he has anointed me to preach good news to the poor. He has sent me to proclaim release to the captives and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty those who are oppressed, to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord."

A revolutionary Christ? Yes! His life is one of liberation. He becomes one of the oppressed and verifies the reality of human existence.
This is the Christ who calls to the white middle-class society, "Deny yourselves, pick up your cross and follow Me. Follow Me into the ghettos; follow Me into rejection by your white 'friends' when you befriended a black man; follow Me in purging the immoral people who have decision-making positions in our land; follow Me into the hills of Kentucky, Virginia, and Tennessee to bring the healing ministry to poor southern whites; follow Me into the migrant camps of the Mexican-American; follow Me in breaking the chains of slavery that now keep the American Indian on reservations; follow Me in your own family relationships to repent of the hypocrisy of your mothers and fathers, and to preach love; but even more, follow Me into death - a death of social acceptability and economic prosperity."

If one is searching for happiness, then this is the path.
Do you want this relevant Christ?
If you do, believe on Him.
Pick up your cross and follow Him.
But never look back!
HERE AM I SEND ME

GO INTO ALL THE WORLD... AND

AS YOU GO PREACH, SAYING
THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN IS AT HAND
HEAL THE SICK, CLEANSE THE LEPERS, RAISE THE DEAD,
CAST OUT DEVILS. FREELY
YOU HAVE RECEIVED FREELY GIVE.

Mennonite Board of Missions — Building the Church Overseas
Renewal of Social Concern

By Myron R. Myer

Let me first say a word about the definition of "evangelical" as a perspective of faith. What do we mean by this? In looking at the Christian church in North America, one finds programs oriented around "proclamation" and they call themselves evangelicals. There are programs oriented around "service" and they are embarrassed to call themselves evangelicals. Then there are programs oriented around "discipleship" which reach into both of these areas, and that is the kind in which we Mennonites stand. The priorities in our brotherhood issuing from discipleship do not remove proclamation nor service, but hold these together in an interrelation. This gives us both a power and a uniqueness to communicate and serve that a lot of our fellow denominations do not have.

Further, the term evangelicals is used in about three ways. Some have sought to make of it a doctrinal structure. Second, there are those who have sought to make of it an organizational structure. Third, there are those who have always regarded it as a perspective of faith inside a variety of doctrinal structures.

I refer to evangelical in the complimentary sense of the latter pattern. In that sense, we as a Mennonite brotherhood are the original reformation evangelicals. We need to interpret matters in the light of this heritage rather than over against persons who artificially have added "evangelical" as a dimension to their doctrinal structure.

There is a new discovery today among persons who call themselves evangelical, among any one of these three categories. They are discovering that it is entirely possible to say that one is conservative in his theology and at the same time liberal in his politics and social concerns. Now that is old hat for us Mennonites because being conservative in theology means that we confess the lordship of Jesus Christ. Because He is Lord, we are not committed to nationalism in respect to political and social concerns, and thus can be quite liberal in these matters.

This has not been the case for the average evangelical because he thought that to be conservative in his theology meant he had to be conservative all across the board. While many have talked a lot about the absolute necessity of the new birth, they haven't gone beyond and talked about how a new creature behaves. This new discovery is one thing happening in the thought processes in evangelical circles.

It is an oversimplification to simply stereotype evangelicals because of a particular theological premise. The issues of the Reformation on which our forefathers had to take a stand are still with us. A basic one is whether or not our salvation is by election. When one gets into that conversation he immediately discovers that this view limits some evangelicals from any emphasis on discipleship.

To illustrate, I sent a manuscript which I had entitled "Meditations on Discipleship in Grace" to an evangelical publisher. They replied, saying that they couldn't use that title. When the book appeared, the subtitle in spite of my attempts to clarify was "Meditations on Discipleship and Grace." From their theological perspective, one doesn't talk about discipleship in grace, for discipleship is works.

The theological premise that I believe to be the classic in Anabaptist thought is that the Anabaptists related ethics to Christology in the same way that they related soteriology to Christology. And when one works that through theologically it makes the basic difference between us and other groups. But there is a new awareness of this theological perspective among persons today who call themselves evangelicals.

But what about renewal of social concern among us Mennonites? When you talk about evangelicals, we are among them. We have been evangelicals for 450 years. When Calvin and Luther were both saying the Great Commission was for the first century, the Anabaptists said, "Nothing doing; it's for us." Belief in the existential dimension of Christian faith was uniquely Anabaptist; the other reformation leaders didn't emphasize it. The whole concept of the contemporaneity of the risen Christ, and that one walks with Him, was Anabaptist, for only in their baptismal code does one find any reference that "now you are sharing the resurrected life."

Yet the Mennonite Church had to have a reawakening in the last number of years. MCC has been a vital part of this, in terms of what social concerns and services really are, as an extension of the proclamation.

While we can boast that we didn't own slaves and that we had a position against slavery, we still had to have an awakening on civil rights, did we not? That is a part of the social awakening.

Or take the matter of extending brotherhood. We drew a line between ourselves as Mennonites and everybody else, and of all others said, "That's the world." We would only call a man brother who was in our immediate circle. This has changed and we see brotherhood now not in terms of a structure, but in terms of a spirit that we can express. We have a dimension of community, which in our fragmented society, is one of the most relevant things to be shared.

In the last number of years our theology has related us to issues other than simply our stand against war. We are rethinking this position to discover whether we can go beyond being merely a social conscience. A conscience only speaks negatively; it never gives positive guidance. It is not enough to be telling people judgmentally what they should or should not do. Having crawled out of our shell a bit and being more secure and less threatened by interacting with others, we Mennonites may now be mature enough to get beyond being a mere conscience and become a creative force of influence.

I have asked myself seriously whether some of our tendency to stereotype and criticize the evangelicals, refraining from involvement with them, in deference to the free way we find ourselves involved with other people, may not be a projection of our own sense of guilt. Perhaps we ourselves have an awareness of guilt in areas of limited social service and so project this when we encounter people who have gone through similar pilgrimage, but have not come out where we have because their theology gives them a different hang-up.

The Congress on Evangelism at Minneapolis, one of the most significant meetings in the history of American Protestantism, demonstrated that evangelicals are as seriously concerned about social ills as are the liberals. When Ralph Abernathy came to Minneapolis to speak, he didn't add one new dimension to what already had been said by Leighton Ford and Tom Skinner and others. The interesting thing was that both Abernathy and the evangelicals were grappling with the same social problems. It was also interesting that the more religiously rigid persons, to the right and the left, ruled themselves out and became conspicuous by their absence. In the judgment of the fundamentalists, Minneapolis was a compromise.

The Congress on Evangelism in Berlin did not come to grips adequately with worldwide problems. There was little intelligent deliberate discussion on topics such as war, poverty, race, population explosion, and the like. But when the Minneapolis Congress was being planned, there was a deliberate attempt to make certain that we met these issues head on. The meeting placed out in the front the fact that among evangelicals there is a general concern about the social dimension of the Christian mission.

But there are problems. The evangelical, awakened to social concerns, still finds it easier to grapple with problems which are less directive in terms of social decision and influence than those problems which are limited more to the personal dimensions. He can deal with poverty, as well as anyone, by going into Appalachia with rural missions. He can deal with the problems of drug addiction, and alcoholism, and even run coffeehouses on Sunset Strip and convert topless dancers to Jesus Christ.

But when you begin talking about the question of war and peace there is a great vacuum. The conscience of the evangelical has not really been awakened to recognize the perspective of separation of church and state, the problem of the idolatry of nationalism, and the privilege of thinking in terms of building the kingdom of Jesus Christ on a worldwide basis which transcends promoting a certain kind of patriotism. This is a very real problem. One might ask if there is really any reawakening here. My answer to this is, yes, in pockets. While there is far more openness among evangelicals to discuss the war and peace question today, I do have to admit that the freedom for such discussions is usually in their academic centers.

Personally, I have never held an evangelistic crusade but that I bring the expression of my peace position into it. One example comes from the crusade in Miami which, incidentally, a number of churches refused to support because of Time magazine's paragraph about me - churches which did not want to work with a man who is a pacifist and an integratorionist.

One of the men who did the counselor training told me when I arrived, "I've been in a spot and I don't know what to do. Here I'm out representing you, as a pacifist, and defending you, and I'm anything but a pacifist!"

I told him I'd answer for myself at the first occasion. At an integrated ministers' meeting, I presented my peace position, concluding by saying that I cannot take the life of a man for whom Christ died, when my ultimate goal is for him to become my brother in Christ.

By the end of the crusade, that same man stood before the ministerial association and said that while he had never before heard of this peace position, he would now have to rethink his whole position, because it made sense from the standpoint of his faith.

The biggest hurdle the evangelical has today in terms of social conscience and social concern is the same one that we are facing within the Mennonite Church. That is the question as to whether history doesn't show that persons who maximize social concern minimize proclamation. If there is any group which has the chance right now to demonstrate something else, it is the Mennonite group. If we flub it, I think we will have missed one of the greatest opportunities the Mennonite brotherhood has. Because of our emphasis on discipleship, I think we can hold the gospel and social service together, instead of letting the two be divorced.

One of my concerns for the brotherhood today is whether in the next decade we have enough of evangelical, spiritual involvement on the part of our young people, so that they will serve in the same type of spirit that many of their elders have, out of an experience with Jesus Christ. I'll tell you why I say this. I have witnessed on the Mennonite college campuses a change of mentality since I was in school 20 years ago. The question in the classrooms today is: "Can you answer my doubts and tell me why I should be committed to Christ?" Whereas, the question earlier was: "Can you tell me how to answer the doubts of a man and lead him to what we have in Christ?"

It is out of this context that I say that as a brotherhood we need to be careful lest we miss the opportunity to strengthen the essential kind of contribution we can share with other evangelicals.

Is Pastoral Calling a Vanishing Art?
By Ralph Skaggs

On almost every hand I hear younger ministers saying two things. One is that we must be involved in the world and in the needs of persons. We must get out of the "four walls of the church" and immerse ourselves into the sweat and toil and pain of living.

The other thing I hear is that "I'm just not going to spend a lot of my time pastoral calling. I have more important things to do than hold people's hands and listen to their little petty complaints."

The first thesis, that we need to be involved in the world, is one to which I subscribe enthusiastically. However, the second, that pastoral calling is largely insignificant, is one with which I totally and completely disagree in my own heart and personality.

Pastoral calling is fast becoming "the vanishing art" that is so important to the spiritual life of countless persons in dire need of the relationship pastoral calling provides. No one seems to quarrel with the idea that this is a tough, cold, and crushing world in which we live. People live, work, survive, or capitulate according to their ability to face the competition and fast moving labor changes in our technological age. Great pressures are upon the individual, not only in his job security, but also in his social, moral, and emotional relationships. Concern for the underprivileged, the ghetto trapped, and the social misfits is certainly a target of tremendous challenge.

However, I submit that the warmhearted, open-minded, understanding pastor in any given parish—I bar none anywhere—has just as challenging, important, and rewarding an opportunity to minister in crucial need through pastoral calling as anyone dedicated to some of these other more seemingly glamorous opportunities. Pastoral calling is difficult, exhausting, and sometimes frustrating, but it has its dynamic joys and rewarding aspects.

One must admit that any given parishioner at times in his life is perplexed and has personal feelings he needs to share with someone. If a pastor does pastoral calling, he often becomes the one who shares in these perplexities and helps think through with the parishioner to a solution for his personal needs. But one might say, "Let the parishioner make an appointment and in a businesslike manner handle the problem." The fact remains that about 95 percent of these problems would not come to the pastor's attention at all in this way. But if the pastor calls in the home of a parishioner who trusts and respects him, he may be able to act as a counselor for the troubled parishioner. Then the door is open to all sorts of possibilities.

In this day and age of family tension many are the times that an individual or family needs direction from the pastor. If the pastor has established a regular routine of calling, or is sensitive to family tensions, he can make a timely call that often gives opportunity for sharing that may alleviate a tense situation.

Being involved in the world means being deeply involved with people, wherever they are. Our parishioners, and those on our responsibility list, are people who deal daily with the world and its crushing inconsistencies as well as its benefits. This being so, the pastor who calls will share in a vital way in the lives of a very important and crucial segment of society.

This is not a plea for the return to "the vanishing art" of pastoral calling for the purpose of maintaining the institution, but for a ministry to a needy segment of persons. [ ]

Fruit of Faith

Give me faith that plants a seed
And waits for it to sprout,
Then tends it till the harvesttime
Will bring the full fruit out.

Many a person never worried much until the doctor told him to take things easy and not worry about anything.

Beautiful Women

God knows that every woman wants to be pretty. So He tells them how to be just that.

The Bible says nothing about which brand of cosmetics to patronize, where to go for plastic surgery; lists no rules for the care of the skin; recommends no machines or methods of exercise; outlines no “techniques,” nor approves any fashion show.

Yet the truly Christian woman is the most charming and desirable of them all. And this is not dependent upon how young or old she might be, what features she might have been born with, the tips she has picked up in the beauty parlor or from the printed column, nor because of the budget she has been allowed to spend upon herself.

She has found her beauty secret in the message of God which is both negative and positive. “Do not let your beauty depend upon ornaments or hair dressing or jewels or fine clothes. Let your beauty come from inside, the beauty of a gentle and quiet spirit. That beauty never grows old. It is very precious in the sight of God” (1 Pet. 3:3, 4, Laubach).
— Paul Showalter.

A Dollar for God

Three thousand for my brand-new car, five thousand for a piece of sod, ten thousand I paid to begin a house — a dollar I gave to God.

A tidy sum to entertain my friends in pointless chatter, and when the world goes crazy mad, I ask, “Lord, what’s the matter?”

Yet there is one big question, for the answer I still search, “With things so bad in this old world — what’s holding back the church?”

Wrong Again

In a Sunday school class one day the teacher asked if anyone in the class knew who the twin boys were who were mentioned in the Bible. A little boy promptly raised his hand. “Who were they, Johnny?” the teacher asked.

“That’s easy,” said Johnny. “They were First and Second Samuel.”

Turn About

A priest and a rabbi attended a large banquet. Both were enjoying themselves when a huge ham was passed around.

The priest turned to the rabbi and said: “Rabbi Cohen, when are you going to become liberal enough to eat ham?”

The rabbi smiled and answered quickly, “At your wedding, Father O’Brien.”

Wit and Wisdom

A little boy was saying his bedtime prayers in a very low voice.

“I can’t hear you, dear,” his mother whispered.

“I wasn’t talking to you,” said the boy emphatically.

A noted astronomer found himself airborne next to an Anglican bishop and said to him, “I never had much interest in theology. My religion can be summed up ‘Do unto others as you would have them do unto you.’” The bishop responded, “Well, I’ve had little time for astronomy, either. My views are summed up in ‘Twinkle, twinkle, little star.’”

Severe restrictions on drinking are now in effect in Moscow, and the Kremlin is mounting a nation-wide campaign to curb Soviet drunkenness. According to The Washington Post Foreign Service, Soviet leaders blame alcohol for most of the millions of man-hours lost in industry and farm work each year. Much of the crime is also blamed on drinking.

Russian trade unions have promised their own measures against violations of labor discipline. They specifically pledged to punish these violators, as well as rolling stones, slackers and drunkards who cause damage to the national economy. They may be penalized by criticism at workers’ meetings, deprivation of bonuses and loss of cheap vacation and health benefits.

Specific restrictions are:
- Shorter hours of sale of wine and spirits.
- Liquor sold only in special stores.
- or in special sections of ordinary stores.
- Liquor sales banned at stores near factories, educational institutions, recreational centers and parks.
- Greater efforts to check on enforcement. The rule of barring sales of drinks to teenagers is frequently ignored.

Nearly 83 percent of the graduates of Concordia Theology Seminary over the past seven years entered a congregationally related ministry of the Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod.

In addition, the school reported, 6.8 percent entered a teaching ministry or some service directly related to the Missouri Synod. The total number of graduates between 1963 and 1969 was 1,033.

Of that total, 80 percent accepted some church invitation — “call” — upon graduation. Eighty-six percent of that 80 percent went into the parish ministry; 14 percent into specialized church work. The latter includes foreign missions and ministry to the deaf.

Only 16 of 870 men accepting parishes were found to have left the Missouri Synod roster.

The New York State Council of Churches is supporting a bill which would establish parental responsibility in acts of vandalism committed by young people.

For several years, according to the Rev. T. L. Conklin, associate general secretary, the council endorsed such legislation.

Last year’s bill, he noted, did not include service to the community “as a possible alternative adjudication.” The bill currently before New York’s legislature has this provision and Mr. Conklin believes it may assure its passage.

He also noted that there has been “a growing list of sponsors in both houses from year to year.”

“Our basic concern,” he added, “is that vandalism be restrained and that the parents or guardians be bracketed with the child in facing up to their common responsibility to their neighbors and to society.”

Claiming that the Vietnam war violates the integrity and honor of human life, a 24-year-old graduate of the U.S. Military Academy at West Point has asked the Army for a discharge as a selective conscientious objector.

First Lieutenant Louis P. Font cited his religious beliefs as the main reason for the request. A member of the United Methodist Church, he is believed to be the first West Pointer in history to request military release on the basis of conscientious objection.

He cited his Methodist background, ecumenical experiences, reading in theology and the Bible as factors contributing to his outlook. Among the specific influences he listed John Wesley, the founder of Methodism, theologians Paul Tillich and Dietrich Bonhoeffer, and the prayer used in the Protestant Chapel at West Point.

Lt. Font placed strong emphasis on the prayer. He said it summed up the basis on which he made his plea. He quoted from the prayer:

“Make us to choose the harder right instead of the easier wrong, and never to be content with a half truth when the whole can be won. Endow us with courage that is born of loyalty to all that is noble and worthy, that scorns to compromise with vice and injustice and knows no fear when truth and right are in jeopardy.”

Poison is believed to have caused the deaths of 30 cows on a Black Muslim-owned farm near Ashville, Ala.

County law enforcement officers said they had sent organs of the cows to the state toxicologist for analysis. Farmer manager J. H. Davis said signs in a stream and in watering troughs indicated cyanide.

The Muslim land, about 1,000 acres, was bought last fall to develop a dairy and cattle farm. It has been the target of intense local reaction. The Ku Klux Klan announced its intention to surround the farm with Klan-leased property.

Six cows were shot last November, and the recent deaths brought to 63 the total number of animals destroyed. The herd has been reduced to 263.

Sheriff Joel Woods of St. Clair County said he definitely suspected poison. “Who poisoned them and why is what we’re trying to find out,” he said.

The American Association of Fund-Raising Counsel predicts “a freeze on religious giving” in the 1970s due to inflation and competition for the consumer’s dollar.

In the April issue of “Giving USA 1970,” the association noted that religion in America is undergoing a crisis of change which will culminate in “new approaches” for religion — and both positive and negative effects to patterns of giving.

Contributions for religious purposes have consistently made up nearly half the philanthropic dollar, the study noted. During the past decade, total religious giving rose from $4.18 billion (1960) to $7.93 billion (1969). However, the ratio of religious giving dropped by 5.2 points to 45.8 percent of the total.

A “materialistic ethos” is the greatest cultural factor causing a decline in the membership growth of the Lutheran Church in America (LCA), according to a study prepared by the denomination’s Commission on Evangelism.

Religious indifference, affluence, urbanization and population mobility followed in that order as causes of decrease in growth.

In discussing a “materialistic ethos,” evangelism director the Rev. Reynold N. Johnson said the LCA could not itself change the prevailing attitude.

He did suggest ways in which Christians can guard against being caught up in materialism. As an example, he said that new church buildings must not be constructed so that they are merely for display.

Each year 10,000 women die from illegal abortions in the United States. And that doesn’t take into account those who receive permanent injury to their physical and emotional health.
Meeting Was Inspirational and Symbolic

Lancaster Conference Mennonites met Mar. 16-19 in some quiet meetings that became symbolic of the seventies. "In these sessions," said Eastern Board President Raymond Charles, "we began to experience what Richard Detweiler described in his conference sermon, 'Survival in the Seventies.'" Charles continued, "The meetings were symbolic of the days that lie ahead; we had a taste of what is to come. Our people recognized and accepted the urban frontier. We experienced some new dimensions of brotherhood. We learned to know some of the new leaders God is raising up from minority groups."

For the Lancaster brotherhood, the sessions held Mar. 16-19 were the first major meetings of the decade of the seventies. Spring Conference was held on the seventeenth at the Weaverland Church. At the Mellinger Church Eastern Board met on the sixteenth for business meetings; and on Mar. 18 and 19 for annual meeting sessions. Richard Detweiler, Myron Augsburger, and Harry Martens were guest speakers.

A New Frontier

In the first worship period of the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities business sessions, Board member Willis Kling recalled an impression made on him as a young man. In one of the inspirational meetings held at Paradise Church by the early leaders, Chicago home missionary A. Hershey Leaman appealed for others to become involved in city missions. Raymond Jackson, a worker at Diamond Street, Philadelphia, verbalized the challenge of the seventies: "If the church is to grow, she must go to the cities." Throughout the week each speaker focused on the urban frontier confronting the church. VS-ers from Washington, D.C., called their listeners to leave the ninety-nine who are in the fold and to search for the one that is lost.

A Brotherhood of Workers

There were less sermons this year, but many more witnesses participated in the meetings. Heads of the program departments did not read their reports, but called on workers from their programs to share experiences and concerns. Macon Gwinn, a black pastor from Atlanta, Ga., said, "As there is wickedness everywhere, so God has His people everywhere." There was a larger involvement of youth in this year's program, and more speakers were drawn from the larger brotherhood. A presentation by the American Red Cross in recognition of the ministries of Mennonite Disaster Service reminded one that the church shares with numerous community agencies in the tasks at hand. Nelson Kaufman, a leader in home missions now serving in New York City, in his address dropped the helpful suggestion that the church must focus her money and resources for those unique ministries that secular agencies cannot perform.

A Sharing Relationship

Ray Yovanovich, a layman from Steelton, Pa., paid tribute to workers who showed sincere love to him, seeking nothing in return. Robert Walters, Steel City, Pa., testified to the need for getting involved with people outside the line of duty. Nelson Kaufman in view of the rudeness and violence that characterizes our day, urged cultivating the kind of relationships in which people appreciate each other as members of the family. Annie Yoder, on furlough from Honduras, spoke of striving consciously to be a brother, not having all the answers; of standing alongside as a brother, sharing responsibility for the mistakes that are made. Larry Newswanger, Personnel Secretary, pointed out how each Christian shares his own experience of Christ, each in his own way and in his own way.

Leadership Is Emerging

On occasion American congregations have been blessed by the ministries of brethren from overseas. In this meeting similar blessings came through the testimony of brethren from minority groups: Macon and Betty Gwinn from Atlanta, Primitivo Ortiz from Reading, Raymond and Frances Jackson from Philadelphia, Artemio DeJesus from Lancaster, and Harold Davenport from New York City. One sensed that through travail and suffering God is raising up from minority groups a new breed of leaders for the seventies, brethren who are genuine, concerned, and tender. Conservative in theology, they are flexible in social concerns. While on the one hand they insisted that Christians must help improve the lot of the underprivileged, they also recognized the futility of human efforts apart from the power of God. Myron Augsburger urged that in days ahead the church must have her strongest congregations in the cities. From the quality of the emerging leadership one senses that this will shortly happen. These men are in their twenties and thirties—suitable leaders for this day when more than half of the population is under twenty-five years of age. In their panel discussion overseas missionaries also recognized that in the days ahead world leadership will come from the underprivileged Third World.

Some Guidelines

Richard Detweiler in the conference sermon and Myron Augsburger in the keynote address set forth some helpful guidelines for the servant witness. Christian experience is a response to Jesus Christ, accepting all He has provided, and going forth with Him sharing His reproach. To the Christian the individual person is the ultimate value in our world; the believer therefore does not identify either with the status quo or with the revolution. And, as one volunteer put it, as soon as one talks about individual people, the city takes on a new atmosphere. Love is the believer's mode of operation. He works to correct injustices, avoiding means that create other injustices. Believers experience healing as they worship; in Christ they are on the same level. While they are not cure-alls, small-group fellowships become a channel for renewal in the church and for penetration of the community. Christian symbols are of value in the degree that they point to Christ. When they become a tourist attraction they may be a hindrance. The mere changing of symbols does not make one an effective Christian. Brethren who can freely discuss the limitations of their symbols can transcend mere external observances; their witness will get through; they can find symbols that convey gospel meaning.

Some of the tensions within the brotherhood were reflected in the conference discussion period; for example, there are those who fear the consequences of Christian prophetic witness to government. On the other hand there were those who reacted with appreciation to the panel of overseas missionaries for the openness and honesty with which difficult issues were faced. Another happy note during the meetings was the testimony of healing and reconciliation between the estranged Spanish groups.

One brother, speaking of the changes that have come into his church district, observed that the changes were not in the direction of worldliness, but in the direction of obedience, with a burden to evangelize. Youth Secretary Don Kraybill shared this same optimism when he said, "Urbanization will test the essence of our faith, the city will tear off the excess baggage." Harold Davenport, a black pastor from New York City, said with confidence, "I believe that in time God will reach the new generation." Harry Martens shared from his experience as an MCC relief worker: "The problems that appear insoluble are made up of little problems; for small problems there are solutions. With a little love and prayer, there are answers. The task before us is not too great in the face of the power of Christ within us."

The hunger outside and within the church became visible. A man in work clothes made his way to the front following the first inspirational session. En route to the second drinking party of the evening, he responded to an inner urge, and turned back to the church. In the service he heard the testimonies of converted addicts from New York City. He began to pray for victory over alcohol, and for his wife and eight children. Two evenings later a college student came to a bishop asking help; he made what was probably his first solid step in Christian experience.

Offerings — Attendance — Elections

After reporting that the response in mission offerings during fiscal 1969 was the highest ever, and that during January and February there was an encouraging increase in contributions from congregations, Treasurer Buckwalter had to point out a decline in offerings during March.

Attendance was not quite on the same level as a year ago. There is always the problem that youth and working people have restricted opportunities for attendance. Plans were announced to promote district missionary conferences during the next few years.

The following persons were reelected by the Eastern Board: Lloyd M. Eby, Chairman; Jay C. Garber, Arthur H. Miller, and Henry E. Shenk, to the Executive Committee; Earl B. Groff and Leslie Hoover as members at large. The following new members were appointed to the Board by their respective church districts: Sanford Good from the Lebanon (Pa.) District; Adam R. Martin from the Mt. Zion (Md.) District; and Glen Ranek from the Philadelphia-Chester, (Pa.) District.

Professors Study Needs

Two Eastern Mennonite College professors who have conducted classes in "Food and Population" recently turned their academic theories into concrete practice. Kenton K. Brubaker, professor of biology, and Charles W. Moyer, instructor in natural science, traveled to Puerto Rico and Haiti for a 13-day study of a few specific problems in food production and some possible solutions.

The EMC team left Feb. 27 and returned to the college on Mar. 10 with a wealth of collected data. Sponsored by the Council of Mennonite Colleges and a grant from the Heston (Kan.) Foundation, they worked in Puerto Rico and Haiti mainly with officials of Mennonite Central Committee, the relief and service agency of the Mennonite Church.

Brubaker and Moyer spent the first two days in Puerto Rico, observing pasture grasses. They devoted the rest of their time to studying food production in Haiti.

"Erosion is a fact of life in Haiti," Moyer explained, "Topsoil is frequently washed into the ocean by flooding, and the small number of trees planted in Haiti offer little resistance."

"The result is obvious," Moyer added. "The Haitians are suffering immeasurably from a food shortage and malnutrition. One half of the children die before the age of five years, and the average income in Haiti is $100 per year."

The team concentrated on five major areas. The first task was to gather samples of healthy pasture grasses from Puerto Rico which might also have the possibility of growing well in Haiti to curb erosion and provide grazing grounds for cattle. The team planted pasture grass samplings in the Grande Riviere du Nord area of Haiti.

A second purpose of their trip was to treat the cashew trees suffering from suspected zinc deficiency with zinc oxide and zineb. Brubaker reported that a large number of the cashew trees have diminished in production, hitting the cashew industry greatly.

Visiting local markets to look for leafy vegetables provided a third objective for the trip. The scientists conducted research on the Amaranthus, a tropical spinach which the Haitians use as a garnish product. Leafy vegetables generally are limited in Haitian markets.

"The Amaranthus is high in protein and grows well," said Brubaker. With the proper development, the plant could become a major cheap food source for the Haitian people.

A fourth area of testing was the local water supplies for sewage contamination and certain minerals.

"Sanitary habits are quite serious in northern Haiti," noted Brubaker. "In general we found the bacteria counts extremely high, even in protected wells." He said that there is no mineral contamination in the waters of Haiti, which he attributed to the lack of industry.

Brubaker and Moyer examined the possibilities of implementing a reforestation program in Haiti. "The greatest problem in getting a reforestation program started is that of getting government support," commented Brubaker. This type of program needs to develop over a 20-year period.

"During this trip to Haiti we were overwhelmed by the warmth, hospitality, and friendliness of our hosts as they shared their lives," summarized Moyer. "We are humbled by the generosity of these people."

Both men listed resistance to change as one of the major obstacles in trying to improve conditions in Haiti.

"The Haitian people need to be sociologically ready to accept new methods and new ideas before any changes can be effective," concluded Brubaker.
Churches to Receive AIM Contributions

Two overseas churches experiencing significant numerical growth have been selected by the Executive Committee of Mennonite Board of Missions to benefit from the newest AIM (Associates in Mission) project for 1970. The embryonic congregations will receive capital grants for construction of new buildings during the next several months.

The Mennonite congregation at Furano, on the northernmost island of Hokkaido, Japan, is a small but solid group of believers active and committed in their desire to be the church in their location. Asai-san, the national pastor, is practically self-supporting. The congregation, having chosen to remain where they are, rather than buying cheaper land on the edge of the city, wishes to purchase the building where they have been worshiping since August 1969.

With monies already on hand from offerings and gifts from the local community, the group has now requested a $3,400 grant from Mennonite Board of Missions to help complete this purchase. Mission Board policy is to contribute one half of the capital for overseas church buildings.

The second component of the new AIM project seeks to aid in the construction of a church facility in Sao Carlos, a university city of 80,000 located 150 miles north of Sao Paulo. Missionaries Arlin and Mary Lou Yoder began an assignment in this new location in March 1969. God has blessed their ministry, and already they have held two baptismal services in the small rented structure presently used by the congregation. A $4,000 AIM grant will cover half the construction cost for a permanent site.

Mennonite Board of Missions offers a continuing series of AIM projects to interested individuals within North American Mennonite churches. AIM members agree to contribute $100 three times a year to one of several special above-budget mission endeavors selected by the Board. Between 60 and 65 AIM members are currently involved in the various AIM projects, with each project running between six and seven thousand dollars.

Workshops Held for Service Counselors and Sponsors

Recently two Eastern area workshops were held for youth service counselors and CPS sponsors on the Eastern Seaboard. On Mar. 14 a group from Franconia Conference, Virginia Conference, and the eastern portion of Lancaster Conference met at the Stephens City Mennonite Church, Stephens City, Va., for an all-day conference. On Mar. 21 a group met at the Maple Grove Mennonite Church, Belleville, Pa., representing Allegheny, Ohio, Washington-Franklin, and western Lancaster conferences. The counselors are serving youth groups in the congregational areas of the conferences and the CPS sponsors represent service locations along the Eastern Seaboard from Portland, Me., through Miami, Fla.

The purpose of the workshops was to help the counselors and sponsors working with youth to become aware of new trends in the attitudes of Mennonite young people. They also were designed to provide information on the various changes taking place in the Selective Service system, and the emergence of persons whose Christian conscience requires them to resist the draft. The workshops also provided an opportunity for counselors to become familiar with the locations where CPS sponsors are located and to restock their supplies of materials to use in counseling.

Resource persons for the workshops included Delton Franz of the MCC Peace Office, Art Smoker from the Youth Office, David Thomas, Moderator of Lancaster Conference, and Service Office personnel including Leon Stauffer, Wilmer Dagen, Jim Long- acre, Don Kraybill, and Elton Nussbaum.

The groups recognized that Mennonite youth are being influenced by trends in our society, namely urbanization and the development of village communities. Affluence, technological developments, and mobility have had profound effects on the lives and thinking of Mennonite youth.

There was considerable discussion on draft reform and the lottery and its effect on alternate service programs. Intense interchange developed over the approach to nonresistance which some Mennonite young people are taking. The group also grappled with the problems and failures of alternate service programs. How can counselors and sponsors help young men relate more closely to the church and become involved in its program?

Essentially the workshops were a time of refreshment and retooling for the mandate to work with Mennonite youth along the Eastern Seaboard as they become involved in service projects.

Youth Music Retreat Held

Ninety-one young people enrolled for a weekend of music at the School of Fine Arts in Banff, Alta., Mar. 6-8. They came from the congregations represented by the Alberta-Saskatchewan District Conference which includes part of Montana. The comfortable facilities nestled among the Canadian Rocky peaks was an ideal setting for retreat and music.

From the ice cream smorgasbord to the music festival which concluded the activities everyone was busy learning, enjoying, and doing his "thing." There were to-the-point talks, workshops, devotionals, and singing from the new Mennonite Hymnal and Songs to Be Sung. Resource persons, Paul Brunner, Hubbard, Ore.; Bill Lauferbach, Edson, Alta.; and Paul Voeglin, Ryley, Alta., added much to the successful weekend.

The Music Festival on Sunday morning proved to be a rich experience as youth pooled their vocal and instrumental talents in an anthem to the glory of God. Three original compositions were also given their first rendition and awarded prizes.

The comment most often heard was that it was all too short.—Alberta-Saskatchewan School Board, Paul Showalter, President

Evangelism Institute Planned

"Evangelism in a Secular Society" will be the theme of Eastern Mennonite Seminary's 1970 Evangelism Institute July 9-22 in New York City, announced George R. Brunk, dean and director of the Institute.

The Institute meets annually in New York in order to utilize faculties of several seminaries there, exchange ideas with inner-city church leaders, and expose participants to unique problems of urbanization.

"We will discuss evangelism in light of scriptural mandates," said Brunk, "noting particularly the impact of secularization on the nature of modern man's response to God. This means that we will have to study social change dynamics."

The program coordinator for the two-week Institute is Paul N. Kraybill, executive secretary of the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions, Salunga, Pa.

"We have invited a number of great lecturers who will address participants during the morning sessions," said Brunk. "The afternoons will find exposure groups using the city for their classroom, under the direction of New York pastors."

Donald R. Jacobs, missionary-ethnologist from East Africa, heads the list of guest participants. A. J. Klassen, dean of the Mennonite Brethren Seminary in Fresno, Calif., will speak on "The Church and Social Concerns."

Tom Skinner, black evangelist from Harlem; J. F. Shephard, pastor of the Cranford (N. J.) Christian and Missionary Alliance Church; and George W. Webber, president of New York Theological Seminary, represent the New York area as lecturers.

Myron S. Augsburger, president of Eastern Mennonite College, and Richard C. Detweiler, bishop in the Franconia (Pa.) Mennonite Conference, will bring their experience in evangelism to the Institute.

Brunk said that the Institute enrollment will be limited in order to retain a seminar structure. Inclusive fees for the Institute, which yields two semester hours of credit, is $145.

A second evangelism institute will meet this year in conjunction with EMC's June 15-26 summer seminar, "Peacemaking in a World of Revolution," in Harrisonburg.

Interested persons should write to Eastern Mennonite Seminary, Harrisonburg, Va.

MDS Cited by Red Cross

Delmar Stahly, national coordinator of MDS, receives a plaque of commendation from Mr. Ralph Davis, Red Cross director of Eastern Area Disaster Service.

The American National Red Cross cited Mennonite Disaster Service, both United States and Canada, for its clean-up operations after Hurricane Camille in Mississippi and Virginia. The award was received by Delmar Stahly, national coordinator of MDS, at the annual meeting of the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities at Mellinger Mennonite Church, Lancaster, Pa., Mar. 19, 1970.

Speaking for the American National Red Cross was its Director of Eastern Area Disaster Service, Mr. Ralph Davis.

"I have a most pleasant mission this morning," said Davis, "to commend Mennonite Disaster Service for its work in Mississippi and Virginia. In all my experiences with people from all walks of life, you have won nothing but respect. Everyone associated with the Mennonite Church, including those who stayed behind making it possible for others to go help in MDS, is included in my commendation."

Stahly, in accepting the plaque, thanked the American Red Cross and stated, "The American Red Cross has had to accept us as a decentralized group which was sometimes unpredictable while we were maturing. Throughout all this, they have accepted us warmly."

"We will indeed have failed this day," Stahly said, "if we accept as ours any praise or glory that are engendered by our organization and our activities. Our prayer is that Christ be glorified through our service, through the words and the thoughts expressed here today, and through our continuing cooperation with the American Red Cross."

The plaque, signed by Robert M. Pierpont, National Director, Disaster Services, reads as follows: "This certificate is hereby awarded the Mennonite Disaster Service by the American National Red Cross, in grateful appreciation for the unselfish dedication to service and their outstanding cooperation with the American Red Cross in bringing aid to the victims of Hurricane Camille.

FIELD NOTES

Mennonite Missionaries in Somalia are encouraged by the appreciation and confidence demonstrated by the new government. A new regulation requires all expatriates working in the country to secure work permits. Permits to the present missionary staff were granted within two days after application; an official in the department stated readiness to issue additional permits when new workers are needed.

One hundred and fourteen students plan to take part in Goshen College's Study-Service Trimester, beginning on Apr. 23, for 14 weeks. Readers Say

Submissions to Readers Say column should comment on printed articles.

In reference to the article, "Where Shall Justice in the Middle East Begin?" (March 10 issue), I would like to suggest that before you print any more articles by J. Otis Yoder, who has consistently condemned the Arab nations, that you hear from the other side as well.

We do have workers in Arab countries who I am certain would be qualified and happy to write a rebuttal to these articles.

There is no question that the Arabs have resisted peace with Israel, but the retaliation of the Jews has now killed all hopes of peace with some Arab nations who heretofore were at least willing to live in coexistence with Israel.

I realize that this prophecy still is very meaningful to some elements of our church; however, I believe that most of our church leaders would agree that it is the most difficult part of Scripture to interpret.

With the possibility of full-scale war in the Middle East appearing imminent, I believe that we must be very careful not to lose our doctrine of love for all people as it relates to strife between nations. — Ted W. Bergey, Lexington, Mass.

With respect to the articles on the Middle East by J. Otis Yoder, I feel that the justification of a policy, an "ism," leading to bitterness, human suffering, and even death should be attempted. Whether one side with the Jew or Arab is not the issue in abeyance here. Rather, it seems to me that a life which exemplifies an absence of opportunity and a presence of suffering should be condemned, not justified. — Richard A. Yoder, Amman, Jordan.

I am writing to thank you for the article on "What the Social Drinker Needs to Know" in the March 10 Gospel Herald.

I am amazed that the church has no more to say against the evils of alcohol. We seldom hear anything against it.

Many Christians justify social drinking and try to justify their social drinking by the Bible. I firmly believe that the Bible rightly interpreted never under any condition or time approves drinking of alcohol to satisfy thirst. — Harry L. Kauffman, Mio, Mich.

Your March 3 issue of Gospel Herald is great. I enjoyed especially "I Am Ill at Ease" and "Don't Beat Me on the Head with Your Heart, Brother Yoder."

Allow me to console you—you are not the only one "ill at ease." The warped priorities and values of our society are putting people up against the wall in frustration. Any attempt to rectify the situation is met with the Establishment's arm of strength—the National Guard.

We hear that capitalism and freedom go hand in hand. However, there is no doubt about the dictatorship that resorts to imprisonment if its subjects refuse to kill for "peace." Or the fact that this same dictatorship is controlled by people who preach to us, "Love your enemies and pray for those who persecute you" and who are then driven to win over others to Jews (their Lord). This is the experience we need today. Thank God the day is upon us when Joe's prophecy (Joel 2:28, 29) is being fulfilled.

My prayer is that God will continue to give you boldness to write, preach, and teach the full gospel without fear of any man. — Wellington N. Cassel, Telford, Pa.

I take the article, "Don't Beat Me on the Head with Your Heart, Brother Yoder," from the March 3 Gospel Herald, as the sincere plea of a searching young person. Perhaps the message could have been said more gently, but then I wonder if it would have been heard.

Since we are human, we may very well have inconsistencies as individuals and as a group. Are we able to let our young people point these out to us? Can we believe this is done "not because we don't believe your principles, but because we do, and we're trying to follow them to their logical conclusions?"

Our young people have heard our views. Are we able to hear theirs? If we don't like their "logical conclusions," can we work with them to turn them around? Perhaps this article can help us to understand the young person better and begin to bridge the generation gap. — Evangeline King, Kalona, Iowa.

The Cross and the Towel

By John E. Zercher

Henry Hitt Crane wrote, "I wish that athwart the crossbar of every cross, on every altar of every church, there might be draped a towel."

In these two symbols is expressed the genius and the essence of the Christian faith.

The cross — a stark reminder of God's grace and man's sin; a sacred symbol of God's love which reached high tide at Calvary.

The towel — the mark of servanthood and the pattern of life for those who have been to Calvary. It is the symbol of the Christian's love for his brother which love Jesus said should be the mark of His disciples.

There is a strange and non-biblical separation of these two symbols. Many there are who fear that the towel will detract from the cross and so they ignore the call to servanthood and mutual love. Others are so concerned with tired and dusty feet that they fail to understand the alienated heart. They take the towel and ignore the cross.

This modern separation was not known to our Lord. The context of His taking a towel was in the very shadow of the cross. He knew that His hour had come. These were the final sacred moments with the Twelve. In this context He took a towel.

This is indeed a strange incident. Here was one who was from all eternity one with the Father. Indeed, the writer to the Hebrews states that He bore "the brightness of his [God's] glory, and the express image of his person..." He by whom were all things made, had removed His coat, tied around Him a servant's towel and was kneeling before His disciples.

Here is a drama alien to our thinking. Bible scholars find it difficult to believe that in this high moment Jesus was teaching a lesson in servanthood and humility. They find it necessary to see a more "spiritual" truth in the account. Some suggest that it was a symbol of baptism. Others see it as a washing away of sins of the believers.

In spite of Jesus' clear and careful explanation of His actions these scholars miss the point. The serious aspect of their strained interpretation is the assumption that there is something profane and secular about a humble ministry to a brother that is somehow unworthy of so sacred an honor. They fail to see the close relationship between kneeling before our fellow Christian and kneeling at the cross. Somehow we miss the truth that pride which prevents us from taking the servant's posture will keep us from confessing the sinner's need. The pride that separates us from our brother will also keep us from God.

It should not have been so strange to the disciples or even to us. This was no new concept. When the disciples had disputed as to who would be the greatest Jesus had told them "The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and those in authority over them are called benefactors. But not so with you; rather let the greatest among you become as the youngest, and the leader as one who serves."

In contrast to the world's pattern "the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister. . . ." The writer to the Philippians describes Jesus as "... taking the form of a servant. . . ."

It is unnecessary to dwell long on how contrary to human nature this concept was to the disciples and still is to us. The desire for position did not die with the Twelve. The servant role is not the recognized image of a successful man.

A close look at this strange drama calls forth several observations.

Motivated by Love

This humble and menial act of service was motivated by love. The opening sentence clearly points out that with the cross a few hours away and the cosmic load of sin upon Him, Christ's love for His disciples did not waver. "He loved them to the end."

This is the identifying mark of Christian caring. There is the real and there is the counterfeit. They may look alike but the ring is different. There is nothing quite so destructive of relationships and character as philanthropy without love. Our welfare system is a case in point. It hardens the giver and destroys the recipient.

There was a time that I attributed as cynicism the observation that if you would help a person long enough he would eventually turn against you — "Biting the hand that fed him." There is enough truth in the observation to remove it from the category of cynicism. For as Peter Dyck, veteran MCC administrator, has said, "The only way you can help people without turning them against you is to do it in love."

Now this love is not found in the towel. It is expressed by the towel. This love has its source in the cross. The love beautifully expressed in 1 Corinthians 13 finds its source in 1 John 4:19 — "We love, because he first loved us." This love treats the other as we would wish to be treated — recognizing his aspirations and hopes; supporting his dignity and self-respect.

A Personal Expression

Washing feet is a very personal expression. It is a one to one relationship. I question if there is any other way one can really love.

There is a verse in 1 John I used to find difficult to understand. "If any one says, 'I love God,' and hates his brother, he is a liar; for he who does not love his brother whom he has seen, cannot love God whom he has not seen." Now, my problem was this: Because I could see my brother was the very reason I found it difficult to love him. He was crude, overbearing, ill-mannered, and conceited — qualities that did not foster love.

I think I now understand what John meant. One does not love people by proxy or from afar. You love in person to person relationships — with their feet in your hands. We love in the first person singular to the second person singular — not en masse.

Olin Stockwell was a missionary in China before the communists came to power. When they came to power he went to prison. From his prison cell he wrote:

"My neighbor in prison had body lice. I loaned him my blanket one day; then I had lice too. If I had just been further away, I would not have caught his lice, and he would not have had my blanket. Christian faith, like body lice, cannot be caught except by contact. Other people will never understand our Christian faith until we get close enough to wash their feet, to share in that personal service through which the Spirit of Christ can shine."

Love — Giving and Receiving

There is a third lesson in this incident — love is a two-way relationship. It is both giving and receiving. One of the dramatic moments of this scene was Peter's refusal to permit Jesus to wash his feet. We are almost taken aback at Jesus' reply to Peter's refusal, "If I do not wash you, you have no part in me."

Many commentators stumble over what to me is a very simple truth — If someone is going to wash feet someone is going to have his feet washed. If someone is to serve there are those who will be served. This example of Jesus is primarily set within the context of the Christian church. It is a brotherhood relationship; and in the family of faith we all should give and we all must receive.

Most of us are like Peter. When it comes down to it we would prefer to serve rather than be served. It may be costly and inconvenient to help but it is humbling to be in need of help. It requires grace to share my time and means with one who has suffered misfortune; but more grace is required to be that unfortunate brother who is the recipient of the sacrifice of others.

There are in every congregation those who are constantly doing good, but for whom it is nigh impossible to do anything. Take food to them in time of illness and their reluctance to accept is nigh embarrassing. Share your car when you are both going to the same destination and they insist on paying. They refuse to allow any entries to accrue on the debt side of their ledger. These generous souls have never learned the true meaning of Christian love. For Christian love receives as well as gives. Christian love allows one's feet to be washed as well as calls one to wash feet.

Humility and Security

The humility and selflessness that is the mark of Christian servanthood is possible because of our security in Christ. Notice how the incident begins:

"Jesus, knowing that the Father had given all things into his hands, and that he had come from God and was going to God, rose from supper, laid aside his garments, and girded himself with a towel."

This verse has significance for what follows. The humility that Christ demonstrated was grounded in the knowledge of His origin, His present position, and His destiny. He knew He had come from God; He was going to God; and God had given all power into His hands.

Pride is a strange sin. Usually it is interpreted as a feeling of superiority and over-confidence. It is in reality a sense of inferiority and insecurity. Rather than an indication of how high a regard one has for himself it is really how low.

In this connection I recall my college days. Living in Lancaster, Pa., I would often go down to the center of the city. During these trips downtown I would occasionally see a young lady who was conspicuous in her appearance. Three things I recall. She was overdressed. She may not have been noticed on Fifth Avenue but she was conspicuous in Lancaster. She was always alone. And she appeared sad.

Now on what is obviously very slight evidence I make this observation. The usual evaluation of this lady would have been that she was proud and that she felt quite superior to the rest of us. But I believe that if the truth were known it was not that she felt superior but terribly inferior. And what one would describe as pride was in fact an evidence of her sense of inferiority and insecurity.

How many of us in our insecurity, in our felt need to be recognized, refuse the servant's posture. We have not learned that our position in Christ and His attitude towards us makes it of very little consequence what our position is among men. So if we are asked to mow the church lawn or do the janitor's task while others are asked to teach a class or sing in the choir we do not lose our spiritual poise. Status with men loses its importance when we are aware of our status in Christ.

I am reminded of the eulogy given upon the occasion of the memorial service for Dean Edward Howell Roberts, late dean of Princeton Theological Seminary. After appropriate remarks concerning the wide and noted ministry of Dean Roberts the speaker said in essence: "He was a common man, natural and unimposing. He could be that way because he did not need to impress any man of his worth. He knew what he was worth because he knew what value God had placed on him. God had given His Son for him."

The cross and the towel must be joined in the gospel proclamation. Without the cross the message is powerless. Without the towel it is meaningless. "What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder."
By Still Waters

Serving the Lord with... tears. Acts 20:19.

I suppose most of what is said concerning service today stresses the satisfaction aspect. The "serving with joy" is emphasized. Strange, it seems, that in Scripture so much is said about tears. In fact the Scripture says that joy comes after tears. Joy follows weeping. He who goes forth weeping bearing precious seed shall doubtless return again with joy bringing his sheaves with him.

Paul spoke of serving the Lord with tears. Have we lost the ministry of tears? How many church members today know the experience of weeping over their own sins? Jesus said, such are blessed. Such know what real happiness is. How many know from experience what it means to weep over the sin of another member or unsaved person? Do we see weeping as a service to our Lord?

We are inclined to turn from tears. Weeping speaks of weakness, doesn't it? We are embarrassed to weep ourselves or to be in the presence of those who cry. Yet it is doubtful if any can know the joy of sins forgiven who have not known the tears of repentance. It is doubtful if any can bring back the sheaves from the fields without having watered the seed sown with tears of compassion and love. It is doubtful if any will see the sinner turning from sin until the saints serve with tears.

Evidence

By Willis L. Breckbill

Where are you, God?
Are you for real?
Why can't I see you?
Why don't you talk to me?

You are alive. I saw it today.
I saw a tree. Alive! Evidence of your life.

You are alive. I heard it today.
I read your Word. You spoke to me!

You are alive. I felt it today.
I talked with you. Your peaceful presence was mine.

You are alive. I experienced it today.
I walked with Christ. He, my hope, was in me.
Brainwashing Danger

One issue of Time magazine alone (Nov. 21) contained 20 separate liquor advertisements.

Tonight's paper carries an advertisement for a health spa with the caption, "Some people design dresses; we design figures," and underneath a picture of three young women in a provocative pose.

A large car advertisement carries the slogan, "Wouldn't it be nice to have an escape machine?" suggesting that to escape the frustrations of your work you need to buy a car that with its elegance and luxury will provide you with the antidote to a "hurried, harried routine."

One of the greatest abuses in our society is the insatiable hunger for things that is created through advertising. And the stupidest and most inane deceptions are perpetrated in the name of advertising.

A few years ago, for instance, the president-elect of the Manitoba Teachers Society argued publicly for liberalized liquor advertising laws because, so he claimed, restrictions would amount to an impediment on the "free flow of ideas."

A short time later a near relative of the speaker was announced as the secretary of a $10 million distillery that was to be built in the province.

We are literally being stimulated to death through manipulation by advertisers. I was told that one dress ad placed in the Toronto papers by one of the large retailers pulled in something like $30,000 worth of business. It is only a fool who would think that advertising (as it is carried on by many of the large corporations today) has anything to do with the exchange of ideas. Indeed, advertising does more to obscure the truth than convey it. It is the manipulation of buyers' wants that is the real intent.

The tragedy is that in a large measure Christians too are falling to the wiles of the advertisers. Not only are we Christians being sucked into employing the same advertising tactics but we are also being brainwashed into thinking that the way to happiness leads via a $50,000 house and swimming pool, a $1,000 fur coat and a color TV.

I was told by someone close to the situation that a Toronto manufacturer of bedding recently ran an advertising showing a woman in a suggestive pose on one of his beds and yet the man is so conservative (as a Christian) that he opposed the idea of the church treasurer recording church offerings on Sunday.

One of the credit unions in a strongly Mennonite community for a long time employed the slogan, "Help yourself to the good life . . . through your credit union." And a current slogan used by some Mennonite businesses goes, "The name of the game is living . . . with electric heat."

Within this environment it is no longer strange to see our church members, disciples of Christ, sojourners in this world, pilgrims in good standing, driving Cadillacs, Toronados, big Buicks and Oldsmobiles, building $50,000 to $100,000 houses, taking expensive junkets around the world once or twice yearly, spending thousands on family wardrobes each year, following most or all of the latest fashion fads, and manifesting in almost every way the same appetites for things that one would expect from totally secular people.

In the name of God, doesn't it make a difference to us that we are Christians? The death of the church will be the pursuit of things to satisfy our material desires. If we can't cope with this problem, our society will do greater damage to the believing community than all the hordes of communism ever did.

I would hope that we might have many Christians who would voluntarily curtail their wants, consciously living at a lower standard than they might afford, because they wanted to express by their way of life that the deepest needs of man are spiritual — having to do with meaning and purpose in life — and cannot be met by more clothes, cars, or entertainment.

We are facing a most serious crisis. The believing church is fighting for its very life under the suffocating pressure of affluence. May God give us the grace to recognize the dangers. — Harold Jantz, editor of The Mennonite Brethren Herald.

Reliability and Edibility

As we walked in Jaffa, ancient Joppa, where Jonah had an experience which changed his direction, a friend of mine leaned over and said, "Too many persons get hung up on the reliability of Genesis and the edibility of Jonah."

So it is that some never get past the problems of the faith. They're hung up, stopped, by certain unexplainables or difficulties which they let stifle them in spiritual and joyous Christian living. Perhaps it's too simple but at least I've always been helped when I remind myself that if we begin with God and really believe that by Him all things are and exist then believing in the miraculous isn't so difficult. This belief also helps us beyond the problems of the reliability of Genesis and the edibility of Jonah. — D.

Do We Reconcile Persons or Differences?

Men from the beginning of time have sought to reconcile differences of opinion. Christ came to reconcile persons. Differences of opinion will always exist to one degree or another. Large souls are not so much separated by these. Challenged, yes, but divided, no. It is when people are brought together in Christ that they have the Christian grace to love in spite of differences. — D.
Second Thoughts on the Baptism of the Holy Spirit

By John M. Miller

Since my high school days when I first became aware of the differences of opinion about the "indwelling" and the "baptism" of the Holy Spirit I had been a firm advocate of the position that the terms were practically synonymous. This view was first developed in response to the teaching of a dual work in the book The Spirit Filled Life which we used in a high school course on Christian living. I firmly maintained this position against my brother who became a minister in the Nazarene denomination with its emphasis on "second blessing holiness"; and from time to time I stoutly resisted the emphasis of "Pentecostal" brethren. My seminary professors tended to confirm my thinking in this regard.

A few years ago, however, I was gradually driven to reconsider the scriptural evidence; and I now feel that I should share some of my developing convictions. Perhaps it would be helpful to place these views in the perspective of my personal experience and then to trace briefly the understandings of Scripture which have caused me to relinquish a few strongly held positions of long standing.

For about seven years I had had some contact with brethren who bore witness to a special experience with the Holy Spirit which they described as the "baptism." Many of them gave emphasis to the evidence of speaking in an unknown language as an accompanying sign and to the subsequent manifestation of the gifts of the Spirit in their life and ministry. These gifts were held to operate in line with the teaching given in 1 Corinthians 12 and 14.

More recently I had been challenged by the testimony of a number of ministers from various denominations who told of increased power in their lives and a more complete ministry through the operation of these charismata in their lives. As I was deeply desirous for increased effectiveness in my own ministry, I began to investigate more carefully the nature of the Spirit's work and the manifestations of which they spoke.

I finally became convinced that these manifestations of the gifts of the Spirit, including speaking in unknown tongues, were genuine demonstrations of the Spirit of God at work; that they were beneficial for the edification of the brotherhood; that they were essential for the adequate ministry of the church; and that they were to be sought by believers who desired to be effective in the Lord's service. At a point of deep need in my own life and ministry, prayer in the Spirit with the accompanying expression in an unknown language became a part of my experience.

This, for me, was a very undramatic step, and one which I felt to be completely in harmony with all the previous work of the Holy Spirit in my life. At the time I could not describe it as my "baptism" of the Holy Spirit, though I did sense a renewed relationship with Him and a strengthening of His work in my life. There was healing—wholeness of person. And this experience began to revolutionize my outlook and ministry in ways which I had not anticipated.

For quite some time I still resisted the inclination of some brethren to connect in their terminology the ministry of the Spirit's gifts and the experience of the Spirit's baptism. For me the term baptism still referred to His indwelling presence.

However, additional time and study of certain key passages have forced me to change my opinion—a process which is for me a somewhat difficult endeavor.

The first step in this change was to recognize that when Jesus breathed onto His disciples in the upper room on the day of the Resurrection as described in John 20:19-23, this actually resulted in the impartation of the Spirit to their lives. In this experience the Spirit indwelt them, and as the passage indicates, they were born as the church by that experience, having knowledge of the risen Lord and being given redemptive authority for the New Age. I came to believe that in this act Jesus fulfilled His promise of sending to them a Comforter, who was to dwell in them and abide with them always. (For scholars, it may be noted that the preposition "in" is consistently used to describe this experience.)

This view, however, left me with a problem. For years I had maintained that the fulfillment of the promise of a Comforter took place on the day of Pentecost. Since this promise would not be fulfilled twice, there was a need to discover what actually took place on that day. It was then that I noted that Jesus in Luke 21:49 and Acts 1:4 referred to the Pentecost experience as fulfilling not His promise, but the promise of the Father. I then wondered what that promise was.

After some time I saw what should have been obvious. It was the promise spoken of by Peter in his Pentecostal sermon. The Father through Joel had promised the pouring out of His Spirit upon all flesh with accompanying power and signs for the witnessing task of the church. This was to be endowment, not indwelling. It was for this reason that Jesus was so concerned that the disciples not set out to fulfill the Great Commission until they had received the anointing of the Spirit upon their faculties. This experience is also described as “baptism” and “filling.” (Note here that the preposition used is consistently “upon.” For careful scholars such consistent difference in the use of terms must be important for interpretation.)

If this view were true, it would now be necessary for me to give reconsideration to my “proof text” by which I had demonstrated that the Spirit’s baptism was the same as His indwelling. For many years I had maintained from 1 Corinthians 12:13 that it was the baptism of the Spirit which ushered us into the body of Christ. If any man had not the Spirit of Christ he was none of His. I was familiar with the explanation of this verse that under the Spirit’s work we were baptized with water into the body of Christ and that under the ministry of Jesus we are baptized with the Holy Spirit. However, I felt that this interpretation could not be conclusively demonstrated by exegesis of the passage, though it did seem a legitimate explanation.

For days I puzzled over this problem. Finally, while in conversation with a brother about the question in my mind, I was drawn to read the last half of the verse which states that in addition to being brought into the body of Christ by this baptism experience also “we . . . have been all made to drink into one Spirit.” This obvious description of the dual aspects of Christian experience satisfied my mind; and I accepted the fact that there is an experience with the Holy Spirit which is functionally distinct from the initial work of His indwelling the heart of the believer. I believe it is correct to designate this subsequent operation of the Spirit by the term baptism.

It was satisfying to note that not only did this view fit consistently with the pattern of experience described in the Book of Acts, but it also was borne out by the Apostle Paul in his doctrinal teaching of Ephesians 1. In this chapter the apostle speaks of the believers’ being sealed by the Spirit in His initial regenerative work, but he goes on to pray that they may experience the fullness of His operation of power in their life and ministry.

Personally, I have experienced great blessing from the acceptance of this truth. It seems to me that the secret of renewal in the church must be a renewal of the Pentecostal experience among us—a renewal of the Spirit outpoured upon the life of the church with all the prayer and power of those subsequent days. We should expect this to be accompanied by the miraculous signs of His presence and by the fullness of the Spirit’s ministry in the manifestation of all of His gifts.

We claim to be a Bible believing church. Let us believe and claim these promises as the basis for life and ministry in these end times when the task is so great and the need for creative power so essential.

Vignette of Love and Sorrow

By J. Mark Stauffer

Her husband was a tall, broad-shouldered man, dark and handsome. To meet him, you would think him to be fine timber for a husband and father. He was in the intelligence section of the U.S. Army and had to spend a great deal of time away from his wife and children. He had serious difficulty handling money and frequently involved his wife in financial responsibility that she was unable to bear.

His wife, a small, gentle, loving woman, had gotten a job in an attempt to ease the financial strain imposed on the family by her husband’s large and mysterious expenditures and investments. She had already gone far and beyond the call of marital duty when I talked with her at the request of a concerned neighbor.

She was a woman of highest integrity and she held hard to a number of personal decisions. First, she did not want to get a divorce—bless her! She was properly concerned for her husband and her children; she strongly hoped that she could keep her family together in a normal, happy relationship. Second, she had decided to carry this burden alone, sharing it only when it seemed unbearable with a neighbor or two and myself. She was respectful of her husband although she could not trust him. She did not broadcast her troubles. Third, she fervently hoped that she could contain the situation, at least, until her husband would be able to retire from the service.

Many persons, stronger than her, might have given up, but she had great courage and loyalty that sustained her amid her physical limitation. About two years ago, she wrote, “Today I realize to what extent I am subjected to mental cruelty and I am concerned about the effect it is having on me. It is affecting my mental processes and physically as well. . . . Again, it is the constant lying to me that upsets me most and he says that is why he does it, to spare me. . . . I pray for him and am deeply concerned for _______ when I see this thing worsening in front of my eyes. . . . I guess I have dashed this note off in a fit of feeling sorry for myself again. There are people with problems so much worse than mine and I am most grateful that I am always given the strength to continue as though nothing was wrong.”

These words reveal unbelievable strength—not weakness. I congratulated her on her love, fidelity, and courage. She seemed, in the last analysis, to have found the secret of personal survival—“to wait upon the Lord”; God blessed her with renewed strength; she knew the release of “eagle’s wings”; she could run without undue weariness; she continued to walk without fainting.

O God, we thank Thee for Thy love and power. Thy strong, supportive arm is always being offered to those who experience weakness, pain, and trouble. Look upon Thy distressed children and grant them all needed grace, because of Jesus, Thy Son. Amen.
Rhoda: On our last visit to the States we said a good deal about Hokkaido, Japan, since we were very much involved in the mission church there. Our home church is still the Kamishihoro congregation. We have a pretty warm place in our hearts for them because the little isolated groups are lonely and they feel a bit deserted as more and more of us move to urban areas. Feeling as involved as we do with the rural churches, the fact that we have jumped to a city situation sometimes bothers us. But they aren't forgotten, and we often go back "home."

Ruth: We're in Osaka because of our former MCC contacts. Boys we've worked with have grown up and most of them have found very good wives, and they come around with their quota of youngsters and talk about their problems. Some are university teachers, others work as department heads in big companies — men who have moved from the poverty they knew when we first met them to prosperity. The standard of living has skyrocketed in Japan, and more and more of the populace live better than we do in North America.

Because we are teachers we must work with schools in order to keep our visas. I've been employed by Poole Episcopal School, and it's been an interesting experience because the head teacher-principal was a very stiff British, if you please. It's been very good for me to work with her. We've enjoyed her as a friend. She is retiring this year so we won't see her upon our return. We've learned that as far as school is concerned, things went fine. But, oh, living with her! We bought strawberry jam the other summer vacation, and when I brought the jam back she said, "We British always have marmalade for breakfast." That's the kind of thing that irks you when working with someone like that.

In addition, we've been working in a Buddhist school, and from now on Rhoda will be a full-time professor. It's essentially a Buddhist girls' junior college. We have language laboratories set up for 50 people in very nice three-motor sections with tape recorders.

Before leaving the last time we made our bows to the principal and she said, "We're so glad for the spiritual emphasis you give your teaching here." But her husband made a speech the other day and said, "We want to remember that Buddhism in Japan must never become what Christianity has become — just a bunch of old women sitting around in church." He didn't know we were in the audience.

Rhoda: I don't know whether Japanese student protests get into American papers as much as American riots and things like that make the Japanese papers. The year 1969 was rough for student protests, and in some places they practically tore the buildings down. First of all, just a handful of students out of a university of thousands will take the furniture out and pile it at the gate and blockade the place. Then they take over. In a foreign language university they tore out all the furniture and broke all the windows and burned what they could of those. And there it stands — a gaunt, naked, concrete frame.

Momoyama University where I’ve been teaching didn’t have quite that rugged an experience. We were blockaded out for about five months. They maneuvered enough to get going again without any police action. It’s been a frustrating experience.

My classes were not large. I never had more than 20 students at one time. But they were unhappy boys, and some of the things they were unhappy about were perfectly legitimate gripes. The last week after examinations were finished and I was ready with the grades, we held our last discussion class at a teatroom. We were going down over the things we usually discussed — Japanese history and temples and student complaints — and finally one of the boys said, “With all these things we talked about, you never once were angry with us. I think you weren’t interested all the time, but you listened to us. Were you willing to do that because you are a Christian?” He is from a Buddhist home but he doesn’t have faith in anything there. The boy continued, “You know, maybe I didn’t learn some of the important things I should have learned from you. Maybe I ought to come back and try again.”

Right now I have a bit of heartache over that school because I resigned there this spring. Was I a coward? I used to come home from those sessions just wrung out and felt I wasn’t getting anywhere. Should I take it on again? They still have no replacement. Pray with us about it.

Ruth: Teaching is more interesting when students motivate the teacher. We enjoyed our evening classes more than we did trying to make youngsters work when they didn’t want to. These were usually held after work in the evenings. We met groups of engineers and foreign office personnel. Rhoda had a group of older men who purchased salt for the chemical companies all over the city. I had a class of doctors in a 500-bed hospital. Rhoda’s been working too with prefectual teachers, a group of junior high school and senior high teachers. She meets for three-month sessions three times a year.

Saturday afternoon and evening and Sunday are times for guests. We find these to be good times to entertain groups, and sometimes groups of our classes will come and sometimes we invite families. It’s a chance to relax and talk things over outside the formal classroom situation. Occasionally we take time out and go somewhere.

This year is Expo ’70. “Bimbo” in Japan means “poor,” and the women in my Bible class say this year they’re all going to be “Expo bimbo” because their country cousins all come to town and want to sleep and eat there or borrow their cars (and in Osaka traffic you don’t lend your car to anybody). We just don’t know quite how to face it, but it’s going to be all right.

We don’t know what’s ahead for us. American society is a stratified thing these days and unmarried Mennonite women over 60 are kind of a segregated group. But I’d still rather hang the wash on the roof and run for the streetcar and puff up the stairs to class than to sit in a rocking chair and wish I had someplace to go. We enjoy it. And we want to go back again.

Cinematic Sermons
By Harold L. Weaver

Most films fall into three categories, according to purpose — providing entertainment, giving information, or stimulating discussion and action. Films and filmstrips used in the Mennonite Church generally fit the latter two categories.

Audiovisals designed to stimulate discussion and action are the most difficult to use effectively — and comfortably. Why? Because they usually carry an emotional impact, and seldom affect all viewers in the same way.

Some of the most effective films and filmstrips in the General Mission Board’s audiovisual library are also the most controversial. That is, they may generate strongly negative emotional reactions on the part of some persons. How can the local program leader deal responsibly with this factor?

First, be sure you preview audiovisals before using them with an audience. You know your congregation or group and are the one to decide whether a particular film or filmstrip will serve a useful purpose. Cancel or alter a program at the last minute rather than use a “tool” that will not serve your purpose. No charge is made for audiovisals from the Board’s library that are previewed but not used.

Second, do not expect a uniform response to any audiovisual from all the members of any group. Anticipate some negative response, and don’t let it skew discussion toward useless polarization. Introduce the film with awareness, and lead the follow-up discussion, if the potential exists for such polarization.

One discussion pattern that has been used successfully starts with objective recall, using questions such as these: What scene do you recall most vividly? Which inanimate object do you recall? Which music do you recall? Which minor character do you remember strongly? Where were you conscious of sounds?

The discussion is then led to subjective reactions: What were your moods as you watched the film? Do you recall moments when you or the group laughed? To which character were you drawn, at what time in the film? Did your feelings toward the character change? When? Did you ever feel uneasy or angry with any of the characters? When? Why?

Then open the way for life-interpretation discussion. What did the film say to individuals in your audience? (And this need not be the same for every individual.) Respect every response as useful — and summarize the responses for your group.

A film packing an emotional punch can be an extremely useful stimulus for your congregation or group — if the discussion is led with skill and Christian poise.

In the Name of Christ

By H. Ernest Bennett

Ron Hoeberle, a photographer located in Vietnam, said, "The guys were about to shoot those people. I yelled, 'Hold it!' and shot my picture. As I walked away, I heard M 16's open up. From the corner of my eye I saw bodies falling, but I didn't turn to look."

Alan Colburn commented, "I've never marched, rallied, picketed, demonstrated, or otherwise created a public fuss in my life — but this war has gone on too long."

"Biafra surrenders!
Thirty months of fighting ends war in Biafra.
Church World Service director says that unless food and medical supplies continue to be flown into Biafra, tremendous starvation will result."

Father Charles Murphy says: "In our technological age we need Brotherhood more than any age in history. All people here have in common one Lord, one faith, one baptism. Unity is to be found in Him alone."
Thus quotes Life magazine and the Elkhart Truth during recent months.

The Apostle Paul wrote, "And whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus."

"In the Name of Christ" has been our slogan.
Is this just a slogan which we have passed on to others, or is this slogan a principle which we are following in our many involvements as MCC?

What does this slogan mean?
Does it mean a label on a suit,
Does it mean a stencil on a bag of flour,
Does it mean a sticker on a can of beef,
Does it mean a publicity device,
Or does it mean a principle by which each MCC policy and program is evaluated?

Is the slogan "In the Name of Christ" a mark of piety or is it a life principle for MCC?

Let us at this point in history evaluate our commitment to this slogan which we have made known around the world.

Can the principles taught and lived by Christ be a guide for MCC program planning?
We may well ask the question, How are we functioning as a church? How do our practices, our methods, our relationships, and our concerns fit into the pattern of Jesus' ministry?

To seek an answer for these questions I have perused the gospel records to pull out guiding principles that Jesus taught. It seems to me that the following six concepts emerge and may be significant guides for a Christian pattern of life and may serve as a basis for program planning and decision making.

I. Jesus dealt mostly with the need of the individual person. He taught compassion and understanding.

As Jesus went along, the people were crowding him from every side. . . . Jesus asked, "Who touched me?" Everyone denied it, and Peter said, "Master, the people are all around you and crowding in on you." But Jesus said, "Someone touched me," . . . The woman saw that she had been found out, so she came, trembling, and threw herself at Jesus' feet. There, in front of everybody, she told him why she had touched him and how she had been healed at once. Jesus said to her, "My daughter, your faith has made you well. Go in peace." — Luke 8.

When they returned to the crowd, a man came to Jesus, knelt before him, and said: "Sir, have mercy on my son! . . ." Jesus answered, " . . . Bring the boy here to me!" Jesus commanded the demon and it went out, so that the boy was healed at that very moment. Then the disciples came to Jesus in private and asked him, "Why couldn't we drive the demon out?" "It was because you do not have enough faith," answered Jesus. — Matthew 17.

II. Jesus spoke little about strategy for the kingdom but taught much about a "way of life" for the believer.

A teacher of the Law . . . came to him with a question: "Which commandment is the most important of all?" Jesus said, " 'You must love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind, and with all your strength.' The second most important commandment is this: 'You must love your neighbor as yourself.' " — Mark 12.

So Jesus called them all together to him and said: "You know that the rulers of the people have power over them, and the leaders rule over them. This, however, is not the way it shall be among you. If one of you wants to be great, he must be the servant of the rest; and if one of you wants to be first, he must be your slave—like the Son of Man, who did not come to be served, but to serve and to give his life to redeem many people. — Matthew 20.

“But I tell you who hear me: Love your enemies, do good to those who hate you, bless those who curse you, and pray for those who mistreat you. . . . Do for others just what you want them to do for you.” “If you love only the people who love you, why should you expect a blessing? . . . No! Love your enemies and do good to them; lend and expect nothing back. You will have a great reward, and you will be sons of the Most High God.” — Luke 6.

III. Jesus was not impressed by the limitations which men saw in solving problems.

Jesus looked around and saw that a large crowd was coming to him, so he said to Philip, “Where can we buy enough food to feed all these people?” . . . Philip answered, “For all these people to have even a little, it would take more than two hundred dollars’ worth of bread.” . . . Andrew said: “There is a boy here who has five loaves of barley bread and two fish. But what good are they for all those people?” . . . Jesus took the bread, gave thanks to God, and distributed it to the people sitting down. He did the same with the fish, and they all had as much as they wanted. — John 6.

So they left the crowd; the disciples got into the boat that Jesus was already in, and took him with them. . . . A very strong wind blew up and the waves began to spill over into the boat, so that it was about to fill with water. Jesus was in the back of the boat, sleeping. . . . The disciples woke him up and said, “Teacher, don’t you care that we are about to die?” Jesus got up and commanded the wind: “Be quiet!” . . . Then Jesus said to them, “Why are you frightened? Are you still without faith?” — Mark 4.

The teachers of the Law and the Pharisees brought in a woman who had been caught committing adultery, and made her stand before them all. “Teacher,” they said to Jesus, “This woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. In our Law Moses gave a commandment that such a woman must be stoned to death. Now, what do you say?” . . . Jesus said to them, “Whichever one of you has committed no sin may throw the first stone at her.” . . . When they heard this they all left, one by one, the older ones first. Jesus was left alone, with the woman still standing there. . . . He straightened up and said to her, “Where are they, woman? Is there no one left to condemn you?” “No one, sir,” she answered. “Well, then,” Jesus said, “I do not condemn you either. You may leave, but do not sin again.” — John 8.

IV. Jesus spoke much against the “establishment of His day” and saw His mission to free persons from their bondage.

He stood up to read the Scriptures. . . . He unrolled the scroll and found the place where it is written: “The Spirit of the Lord is upon me. He has anointed me to proclaim liberty to the poor, And recovery of sight to the blind, To set free the oppressed, To announce the year when the Lord will save his people!” . . . He began speaking to them: “This passage of scripture has come true today, as you heard it being read.” — Luke 4.

When Jesus came to that place he looked up and said to Zacchaeus, “Hurry down, Zacchaeus, for I must stay in your house today.” Zacchaeus hurried down and welcomed him with great joy. All the people who saw it started grumbling, “This man has gone as a guest to the home of a sinner!” . . . Jesus said to him, “Salvation has come to this house today; . . .” — Luke 19.

He began to teach them:

“Happy are those who show mercy to others.”

“Happy are those who work for peace among men.”

“Happy are those who suffer persecution because they do what God requires.” — Matthew 5.

V. Jesus was deeply concerned about the oneness of the believers.

Jesus looked up to heaven and said: “I do not pray only for them, but also for those who believe in me because of their message. I pray that they may all be one. O Father! . . . May they be one, so that the world will believe that you sent me.” — John 17.

John said to him, “Teacher, we saw a man who was driving out demons in your name, and we told him to stop, because he doesn’t belong to our group.” “Do not try to stop him,” answered Jesus, “because no one who performs a miracle in my name will be able soon after to say bad things about me. For whoever is not against us is for us.” — Mark 9.

Surely you have read this scripture?

“‘The stone which the builders rejected as worthless

Turned out to be the most important stone.

This was done by the Lord,

How wonderful it is!” — Mark 12.

VI. Jesus knew He and His followers would be rejected and would need to suffer and be reproached.

Jesus began to teach them:

“You yourselves must watch out. For men will arrest you and take you to court. You will be beaten. . . . You will stand before rulers and kings for my sake, to tell them the Good News. . . . And when they arrest you and take you to court, do not worry ahead of time about what you are going to say; when the time comes, say whatever is given to you then. For the words you speak will not be yours; they will come from the Holy Spirit.” — Mark 13.

“If the world hates you, you must remember that it has hated me first. . . . Remember what I told you: ‘No slave is greater than his master.’ If they persecuted me, they will persecute you too; if they obeyed my message, they will obey yours too.” — John 15.

He went on to say: “One country will fight another country, one kingdom will attack another kingdom; there will be terrible earthquakes, famines, and plagues everywhere; there will be awful things and great signs from the sky. Before all these things take place, however, you will be arrested and persecuted; you will be handed over to trial in synagogues and be put in prison; you will be brought before kings and rulers for my sake. This will be your chance to tell the Good News.” — Luke 21.

What does the slogan “In the name of Christ” really mean? Jesus said: “I tell you the truth: Whoever believes in me will do the works I do—yes, he will do even greater ones, for I am going to the Father. And I will do whatever you ask for in my name, so that the Father’s glory will be shown through the Son. If you ask me for anything in my name, I will do it.”

Can we, during this meeting and in the decade ahead, seriously serve, be the church, and live as Christ would have us live—In His name?

Can these six principles, or others which I have not identified, be a guide for us?

Can they guide us in releasing in a new way the life and faith of our Lord?

No Vacation on Vacation

By George H. Muedeking

I spent a deeply disturbing vacation in California. I found that the many middle of the road, creative, independent, nonjudgmental Christians I had known two years ago had virtually disappeared. Almost everyone had chosen up sides and was working by emotion. Either he had been radicalized by the bloody terror tactics of the law and order boys, or with visible agitation he had gladly joined to welcome “Big Brother” of 1984, 14 years ahead of time. The unhurried, rational, democratic citizen of California who could amusingly welcome Khrushchev was gone.

The shock came from the understanding that as California goes culturally, so goes the nation five years later. So the midwest pastor who recently told me that his church council demanded he no longer use the word “Negro” in his sermons; or the principal who with arms akimbo barred the entrance to his high school to a practice teacher last winter because he was wearing a moustache, or the 13 percent who voted for Wallace, cannot be explained away by saying that pockets of reactionism remain across the U.S. The polarization is nationwide.

The radical element has little firepower— it can throw broken bottles, but how does that compare with a helicopter spraying a city with gas, as at Berkeley this spring? — So if it comes to a showdown we could expect the general populace to support the repressive measures in the same way they did in Germany when social unrest spurted out after World War I. Thus the knowledge that over 100 people were gunned down and one spectator killed in the People’s Park fracas this spring in Berkeley, caused minor protest.

The heart of the struggle for domination of America will not be carried out in the rioting ghettos, however. Here a minimum number of well-placed bribes, like “made-work” in the depression, or a guaranteed annual minimum wage can cool the ghetto off. Rather the conflict will occur on our campuses. For there has been mounted the most threatening challenge to our way of life in this century.

Challenges

The challenges lie in three areas especially. First, students have done what American pulpits have been unable to do ever since our ancestor immigrants flooded this land. While pulpits were pounded against materialism, listeners were busy shopping for the next largest model car, or hooking a second boat and trailer behind their stationwagon. It was the students who finally asked if split-level houses and color TV weren’t a pretty shabby thing to live for; there must be better hopes and ideals than their depression-scarred parents believed in.

The campus exposed what Rexroth has called the true American religion, which is not monotheism, but moneythe- ism. The resulting challenge was clear to our society; no people can stand to have their god blasphemed as unworthy of adoration.
Second, the students exposed the allegiance of the high priesthood of that religion of moneytheism, namely, American Education. It openly promises that the more education you get, the more money you'll make. The challenge is open, particularly to parents who slave and pay enormous property taxes to get their children to college, only to have them ungratefully reply that a technological education to make money is no education.

Third, and most serious as a challenge, the students and their friends show that they cannot be commanded by the social controls which whipped their parents into line when they were young.

To see this more clearly we must go to the distinction John Howard makes between the revolting hippies of our day and the rebelling youth of other ages (Annals of the Academy of Political and Social Sciences, March 1969). He says that there are two kinds of deviant behavior: vertical and lateral. When people in a subordinate rank try to seize the privileges of the superior rank, they are vertical deviants. A 10-year-old smoking his mother's cigarette in the bathroom, a looter in the ghetto, are vertical deviants trying for privileges the superior rank enjoys. Most youthful rebels (including present-day parents) were of this type. They simply wanted to hurry up the process by which they could get a piece of the cake.

Vertical deviants are fairly easy to control since power remains with the privileged. Promise the discontented a little piece of the action if they behave. Say they can join the union if they quit rioting in the ghetto; say they can drive the car out on some country road if they quit pestering; say they can have "white coffee" in their milk glass if they quit whining.

Lateral Deviants

Lateral deviance, by contrast, is virtually impossible to control except by the sheer weight of coercive force. Lateral deviants are subordinates who develop their own standards and norms, directly opposed to that which the superior rank lives by. The hippie communes show us persons totally uninterested in our American religion of moneytheism; the student rioters, threatened with expulsion, show us persons oblivious of the value of being trained for a slot in the establishment. However we may feel about it, these youth believe they have "renounced the devil with all his works and ways," in favor of a different religion.

We can now account for the terrifying show of force with which People's Park in Berkeley was destroyed, as well as for the noncoherence with which the California citizenry in general accepted the eyewitness accounts of the brutality and indiscriminate gunnery and gassing with which it was wiped out. These were lateral deviants; "they had it coming to them." The American who has been taught to live for the affluent dollar encountered at Berkeley a threat our nation has not met since Thoreau moved out to Walden Pond.

He Was One, Too

The life of our Lord is disconcertingly the story of a lateral deviant, however. He couldn't be bribed by promising a little taste of the privileges which the elders and the Pharisees enjoyed. He lived by a different set of values entirely. In fact, annihilation with the buckshot of the Roman Empire was all that would take care of Him.

As the church goes through the next few years until reason returns to rule emotion, it will be in order for it to be deeply sensitive to the upsetting of the value systems which occur before our eyes. Hopefully, we will be ready to follow Christ's values.

Martys are marvelous helpers—not the burned-at-the-stake or shot-by-a-mob variety—I mean the self-made kind that are never so pleased as when they are miserable and making others likewise. So far I've discovered few people who are as effective in undermining morale.

Because martyrs are very, very good they hold a spiritual club over any who would do battle with them. A martyr in the family can make everyone from grandpa to the youngest cousin squirm under the weight of sacrifices made in their behalf. Usually these sacrifices are uncalled for, but out of sheer generosity and overwhelming concern for others, the martyr makes them. If they are not appreciated, so much the better.

The martyr will make even more—and thus heap coals upon the ungrateful. It is small wonder that generation gaps occur when so many parents belabor the how-could-you-dothis-to-us-after-all-we've-done-for-you theme. Chances are the kids never asked them to do it. Goodies given with strings attached cease to be goodies. A life without luxuries but loaded with love is much more acceptable to most progeny than affluence devoid of caring.

Martyrs in the pew can do much to disrupt the good spirit in a congregation. The church school teacher who serves not with joy but with a sense of duty (and, incidentally, would not resign even if encouraged to do so) can sour a lot of children on attending classes. The KP crew after a church dinner can have a great time if the right people are on it; those who feel it's something less than the Lord intended them to do, however, can turn any kitchen into a gloom room. They'll insist on taking their turn at serving, of course, but they'll let everyone know how hot they are—how allergic to dishwater—and how noble they are for being willing to do it.

Martyrs help me in my mission. I only hope their virtues outweigh the misery they cause—I wouldn't want to have to share my eternal abode with them.

Little Jewels Don't Make a Crown

By Alice Hess

"Your work sounds so exciting," one of my friends wrote to me. Well, let me describe a typical day at school—I'll guarantee there will be plenty of action!

I usually arrive at school a little before 8:00 a.m. School doesn't start until 8:30, but already there are children there racing around in the halls. The patrol boys go running right after them to make them stop running.

By 8:40 everyone is there, has his pencil sharpened and is finally settled and quiet. To quote another friend, my 39 second grade "black jewels" are all before me. Oh, yes, everyone now has a place to sit at a desk or table. The first several weeks I had only 27 desks and 6 chairs for my 39 students.

As a morning opening, we sing "Father, We Thank Thee." One morning I nearly laughed when I saw one little boy going at it with real soul snapping his fingers and swinging with the music.

When classes start, I need to explain things simply and even then repeat again and again. The children are poor in following instructions so everything needs to be oral, because they cannot read well enough to read directions.

The children soon get warmed up and from then on their tongues seem to be in perpetual motion. With a roomful of 39 children, that can be a lot of noise, and telling them to be quiet and stop talking just goes in one ear and out the other.

It doesn't take long until they begin coming to report that someone took their pencil, their tablet, or hit them. It continues all day long, every day. Several times someone comes to report that someone called him black, and one little girl comes to me several times a day to have me rebraid her hair. I'm not sure they notice that there is a difference in our skin color.

In the afternoon we have a half-hour physical education period. When we make a circle to do exercises there are always half a dozen children who want to hold my hands.

At the end of the day a teacher-aide comes to help for 45 minutes and we divide the children into two groups to work with math. It makes me feel good to hear some of them say, "I want to be in your group."

When the day is over and the room is empty and quiet, I am worn out. Many times I feel that I've spent most of my time trying to keep order, and that they didn't sit still and listen long enough to learn much of anything. But each day there is progress—someone learns the difference between "Mike" and "Mary" in reading; in writing class they remember to leave a space between the words; in science they learn what reptiles are; and together we learn the poem, "The Little Turtle."

There are those precious moments during the day which bolster me to face the next day, but my little jewels all put together somehow don't make a crown.

The Urban Teacher Corps (UTC) was begun in 1969 by Mennonite Central Committee as an attempt to help upgrade the educational problems in the ghettos of Atlanta, Ga. Most of the teachers were placed in predominantly black schools in the city and worked with elementary children.

Where will your son or daughter wrestle with life’s basic questions?

Approaching manhood and womanhood, sons and daughters ask penetrating questions. Gnawing at them—often without anyone else’s awareness—their uncertainties require continual thought and examination.

Why am I here? What is to be my purpose and goal in life? What is life all about? What good can I do in life?

Who is my Creator? How can I know and serve Him?

Who is my neighbor—and brother—and sister? What are their needs? How can I best serve them?

What is integrity? How can I have peace with myself? How can I have peace with others?

The Christian college has no magic formula for making a careless, irresponsible student responsible and mature; making a rebellious student pious and constructive; making an indifferent student a committed one.

We do have:

a competent faculty and staff,

a faculty and staff committed to the Christian faith and values:

a faculty and staff that care about students and the world.

Over $150 billions and 40,000 lives have been spent by the U.S. in South Vietnam, and little has yet been attempted or accomplished in land reform, tax reform, or to curb the flagrant corruption which has characterized every Saigon government we have supported, including the present Thieu-Ky cabal. We keep making the blind, stupid, bloody mistake of trying to stop revolutions by killing the people who desperately want a revolution. This is the crux of the matter and will continue to be until a more enlightened policy replaces our present military traditionalism.

Issues of today are the same as those met in Nazi Germany, according to an American theologian who holds that political and religious institutions are still too closely tied together.

Dr. Theodore Gill, dean of Detroit's Center for Christian Studies, made strong statements about the failure of the German church in the 1933-45 period and the failure of American churches today.

Dr. Gill agreed with another theologian, William Stringfellow, who finds "most disquieting the tacit equating of the American way of life with religious idealism and the hand-in-hand between chief priests and chiefs of state."

"The earnest, nervous debates," he said, "are on law and order, race, communism, inflation, international monetary crises, internationalism, keeping the church out of politics, long-haired youth, respect for the flag, urban immorality, censorship."

"Those were the issues then (in Germany). Fascism was then, as it is now, one response to those issues."

"If we aren't in the same soup as the Germans, ours has many of the same noxious ingredients. The question is: How near are we?"

"More disquieting (is the question): Is there anything in American official life that moves massively against the drift?"

"When a U.S. Senator supports a candidate for the Supreme Court because the candidate is mediocre, and lots of folks are mediocre, that is just a funny toe in the ocean across which lies Volk justice and Volk courts."

"But it is the same ocean."

Dr. Gordon Zahn, professor of sociology at the University of Massachusetts, said:

"Was the silence of the German hierarchy over the war atrocities committed by the Nazi armed forces that much more complete than the silence of the American Catholic hierarchy over My Lai, and, long before that, the widespread use of napalm and chemical warfare against a predominantly peasant population? I'm afraid not."

He said that at least the German bishops could claim ignorance, in "contrast" to American bishops who "presumably can read the full detail with their breakfast coffee."

The Spanish government is expected to ease its compulsory National Service Law restrictions on military conscientious objectors, allowing them to serve in special non-combat units. This was reported earlier by Pastor Jose Cardona, a Baptist leader.

At present, men refusing to perform 18 months of military service face still jail sentences. But according to a draft law approved by the Spanish cabinet, conscientious objectors may spend up to three years in special units. The draft law is awaiting approval by the Cortes (parliament).

About 150 Spanish members of the Jehovah's Witnesses have been jailed for refusing to carry out their national armed service obligations and they face continual jail terms because under present laws the government can imprison them repeatedly for the same offense.

One Witness, Alberto Conijoch, 32, has already served 11 years. However, the new draft law provides for the pardoning of objectors now in jail.

The Canadian Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau told Mennonite leaders that Canada should be a "refuge from militarism" and that he welcomes U.S. draft-dodgers because many had "a religious motivation (concerned) with love and brotherhood."

Mr. Trudeau made his comments before a Mennonite delegation that asked him to encourage U.S. draft evaders to come to this country. Mennonites are pacifists.

"I would say we are opposed to militarism," the Prime Minister said.

He added that cuts in Canada's defense budget, now frozen at $1.8 billion a year, are a move in the right direction.

When he met the Mennonite delegation, Mr. Trudeau said he had never been presented with "such a beautiful brief... with views close to my heart."

He said that while U.S. draft evaders "may not be consciously Christians, doesn't what they are doing have to do with ideas of brotherhood, a kind of religious conviction?"

"Your motivation is like mine," he told the Mennonites. "It stems from a belief in a transcendent God. The young radicals are looking for the same thing, too, whatever existentialist and nihilist elements there may be in their thinking."

A group of Mennonites from Kitchener, Ont., joined their Winnipeg brethren to plead for exemption from the Canada Pension Plan, which they claim is against their religious beliefs.

Dr. Carl F. H. Henry has accepted a permanent post at Eastern Baptist Theological Seminary in Philadelphia, Pa. The founding editor of Christianity Today magazine has been a visiting professor since last fall.

Dr. Henry continues as editor-at-large of the evangelical fortnightly. He is immediate past-president of the Evangelical Theological Society.

The well-known author will combine extensive speaking engagements with his teaching at the seminary.

Legislation authorizing "nonsectarian baccalaureate services" in Pennsylvania public schools has been passed by the House of Representatives and sent to the Senate.

The bill drew a protest from the American Civil Liberties Union of Pennsylvania, which branded it "religion in public schools," and asked the chairman of the Senate's education committee to kill the measure.

The ACLU wrote to Senator Preston B. Davis, to say that it believed the bill "violates the separation of church and state principle of the First Amendment of the Constitution."

Most users of psychedelic drugs or hard narcotics are in the 18-30-year age bracket and come from solid middle and upper-class communities, said David Anderson, director of pharmacy services at the Waynesboro Community Hospital, in an address to Eastern Mennonite student nurses this week.

Mr. Anderson, speaking on the "Abuse of Drugs," said, "Statistics show us that the majority of the LSD users are usually recent school dropouts and most of them have had an adequate opportunity to receive a higher education.

"Drug abusers are not just among those people we categorize as hippies," added Mr. Anderson. "Every year we lose about 300 medical doctors who have to leave their profession because of drug addiction."

He noted that this number was equivalent to the yearly output of two or three medical schools.
Right to Survive Challenged by Industry

Smith Griswald, former pollution control officer for Los Angeles County: "The technology is here to clean up every city in the nation . . . but all we get are a bunch of speeches that are a lot of hot air."

"Ten times as many people are afflicted with emphysema today than ten years ago. Everyone who drives along a freeway subjects himself to health-damaging pollution. And it will get a lot worse before it gets better. You people will be living in this mess a lot longer than I will, and you have a vital stake in getting it cleaned up."

Smith Griswald, former pollution control officer for Los Angeles County and now working with a private consultant firm in Washington, D.C., laid it on the line at the 1970 Intercollegiate Peace Fellowship held Mar. 19-21 at Laurelville Mennonite Church Center, Mt. Pleasant, Pa.

"The technology is here to clean up every city in the nation, as well as every automobile, but all we get is a bunch of speeches that are a lot of hot air. . . . We have to go into industry and make them change their practices. They will not do it voluntarily because pollution control is nonproductive in terms of industrial finances."

As keynote speaker Griswald talked on "Alive and Breathing — But How Long." The 95 students continued to drift into the rustic lodge located in the western Pennsylvania mountains. Present were representatives of collegiate peace clubs and other students from most of the U.S. Mennonite colleges. The mood was predominately low-key for the three-day conference. At times the unadulterated landscape seemed to chide the participants for concerning themselves with environmental pollution, but occasionally the sound of a truck pounding along the Pennsylvania Turnpike bordering the campgrounds, brought back the real world in all too real terms.

In his second address, Griswald spoke on containerization and how it relates to pollution. "We should refuse to buy milk packaged in anything other than returnable glass bottles. The American people are not demanding the fancy plastic packages that most food comes in today. They are being duped into it."

Robert Butler, professor at Pennsylvania State University and an expert in water pollution, spoke on "The Problem with People — Population Pollution." "Are you aware that the average American is using most of the natural resources of the world? That we are essentially a fetus braining the blood and guts of the world?"

"There is a chamber-of-commerce syndrome that really galls me," he said, "and that is that we must continue to grow; use more, dispose more, buy more, reproduce more. The ideology of the cancer cell is this: to grow indefinitely and forever." The implication was clear.

"I would like to point out that the earth is finite. It's a closed system as far as you and I are concerned. We have neither the technology nor the imagination to think of going elsewhere. We have one source of energy, the sun. There is no other source."

"Some stupid people want us to think that we are going to get rid of our solid waste by jetting it out into space. They don't understand physics, they don't understand science, they are chamber-of-commerce ideologists. We're confined here, whether we like it or not."

"In the United States, the population is doubling every 44 years. If you continue this indefinitely, and this is what the chamber of commerce would like, and this is what the manufacturers of baby products would like, and this is what Detroit would like, this is what most of the people in the United States would like, because this means money, and it means what they think is a higher standard of living. But if they examine this it can only lead to ecological catastrophe. Man is so egocentric that he thinks he is different from animals, but he is not. He's controlled by the same forces, he lives on the same planet, he has to use the same food, he has to breathe the same air. Man can depart from reality further than most animals. But reality is still there."

"We have a real problem on our hands. We live in the shadow of a monument to procreation coupled with technology and consumption that intensifies the debris of living and promotes the alienation of man and nature."

"Every child that's born has a right to survive. By survival, I don't mean existence. I mean a quality of life that means something. If this is to be so, no one has the right to do more than replace himself. A person has to have space, he has to have food, he has to have shelter, and he has to have love. And in a population that exists at too high a level, you get to the point where love cannot exist."

As Butler spoke on ways of combating the ecological problems, he explained that the beliefs and attitudes of most average Americans could be called conventional wisdom. This wisdom moves on a sliding scale between progress and regression.

"Every reform in society was once a private opinion," he said. "And all progress comes from the lunatic fringe. Examine any great idea in history and you will find it came from the lunatic fringe."

"The first thing that I see as important in combating ecological pollution is to emphasize living patterns that are destructive to the man-nature relationship. One must include in this the sociological relationships between the black and white, the white and Indian because if you have a feeling and love for life, this must extend to all people and to all plants and animals."

"In order to do this, you must overcome ignorance or lack of information. If you study a subject 20 hours, you will know more about it than 99 percent of the people of the world. This is important because if you wish to do battle with the enemy, you must know him better than he knows himself."

The discussions that followed the addresses clearly showed the concern of the students for their deteriorating environment. When told that industry and automobiles are the greatest polluters, they questioned whether we could ever expect an environmental cleanup without a change in the existing social order.

Will people be satisfied with less electricity, with smaller cars, with less luxuries so that they may exist without garbage covering their knees? It is possible to educate people to the hazards of pollution. Will they respond? Can the existing due processes of law ever be adequate to force industry to clean up themselves as major contributors to pollution? Do we try to educate industry to stop polluting or do we educate people to stop buying pollutants from industry? Will people be satisfied with buying Coke in returnable glass bottles rather than aluminum cans which exist in the junk heaps virtually forever because of their oxidation-resistant qualities? These were some of the many questions asked.

The conference answered many questions. It confirmed many fears. It educated many to fear what man is doing to himself and to the earth which God created for him and called good. But it also raised many questions, questions which will have to be answered soon if man is to continue to have a quality of existence.

Committees Preparing for Mission '70

Franconia Mennonite Conference in Eastern Pennsylvania is serving as host for the 1970 annual meeting of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, Elkhart. The meeting will be held July 1-7 on the campus of Christopher Dock Mennonite School near Lansdale.

The various planning committees appointed several months ago are tackling the enormous task of hosting this meeting. On the evening of April 6 all the committees convened to report their progress to date, and each was able to file a favorable report. The tempo of activity is increasing and will continue to do so as July approaches.

Members of the Steering Committee responsible to coordinate the activities of the other 15 committees are: Henry P. Yoder, Lansdale; Robert Kratz, Telford; Mrs. Mary Clemens, Lansdale; Robert Gotwals, Souderton; Gerald Weaver, Collegeville; and Lee Yoder, Harleysville.

With a large number of visitors anticipated for Mission '70, the hosts are preparing for adequate meals and overnight accommodations for all in attendance. Further details on registration, which is to begin on May 1, will be released soon.

MCC Director for Haiti Appointed

Mr. and Mrs. Paul Derstine and son Michael, Souderton, Pa., recently completed orientation and left for Haiti where he will serve as MCC project director for Northern Haiti and unit leader at Grande Riviere du Nord.

Both served at Grande Riviere du Nord from 1963 to 1965. Their return to Haiti for a three-year term represents the first long-term directorship which MCC has had in Haiti.

There are presently 29 MCC workers serving in Haiti. MCC volunteers are involved in a variety of projects in addition to Grande Riviere du Nord and Hospital Albert Schweitzer. They are involved in crafts, poultry projects, a cannie cooperative, adult literacy, general education, and water projects.

The Derstines are graduates of Goshen College where he received his BA in sociology and she a BS in nursing. He recently received his MS in community development from the University of Missouri.

He is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Marvin Derstine, Souderton, Pa., and his wife is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Moses Yoder, Goshen, Ind.

Personnel Openings Await Volunteers

"The year 1968 saw a significant increase in the number of persons entering Voluntary Service and, of course, most of these will have completed their two-year assignments this summer," said Clare Schumm of the Personnel Office at Mennonite Board of Missions. "This unusually high turnover will result in a larger number of openings that will need to be filled."

Placement counselor Schumm said that a personnel overlap is especially desirable in VS leadership positions. Between May and September the following locations will require program directors to coordinate unit activities: Milwaukee, Wis.; London, Ont.; St. Anne, Ill.; Eureka, Ill.; Caldwell, Idaho; and Nyssa, Ore. Places in immediate need of leadership personnel are: Buckeye, Ariz.; 15th Street, Chicago; Northwest Portland, Ore.; and South Bend, Ind.

Schumm noted that married couples are not the only persons who can qualify for program director responsibilities. Single fellows with a certain amount of experience can also serve in this capacity, especially at available locations like Portland, Ore., or 15th Street in Chicago.

An especially challenging assignment awaits a married couple who will be needed in July to serve as host and hostess of the Voluntary Service Center on the grounds of Mennonite Board of Missions. Responsibilities include planning and preparing meals for orientation groups, providing lodging for VS-ers, housecleaning, and headquarters maintenance between orientations.

Construction work, especially rehabilitation of urban housing for resettling to disadvantaged families, is a more recent addition to Voluntary Service assignments. Pittsburgh and Philadelphia are two units opened in 1969 that are calling for additional personnel with construction skills.

Current openings for teachers on the elementary-secondary level include St. Louis, Mo.; Robstown, Tex.; San Juan, P.R.; and several rural locations in northern Alberta. Registered nurses are always in demand in Aibonito, P.R.; Carlsbad, N.M.; and La Junta and Pueblo, Colo.

A new Voluntary Service location is scheduled to begin in July in conjunction with the Morning Star Mennonite Church of Stockton, Calif. It is hoped that VS will make a significant contribution through social work ministries, as well as supporting the church in its other activities. The same type of personnel needs also exist at Englewood, Chicago, and Detroit, Mich.

In January of this year, the number of personnel serving in Mennonite Board of Missions VS reached a new high of 340. Since then the figure has dropped somewhat, and current personnel trends at the Mission Board indicate this will continue to deescalate unless...

Earth Day to Be Held

Students and faculty at Eastern Mennonite College are preparing for a campus observance of the Apr. 22 Environmental Teach-in.

An extensive student campaign to pick up tin cans throughout the Harrisonburg community was launched last night (Thursday, Apr. 9), initiating a series of activities planned for the teach-in.

Classes will be canceled after 9:30 a.m. on Apr. 22.

"Cans gathered from the campus will be piled in a heap on the campus lawn north of the Science Center," said campaign director Jim Sauder, a senior biology major from Lancaster, Pa.

"The purpose of piling the cans on the campus is for shock value," Sauder added. "We want people to become aware of how fast these cans can accumulate."

The can pickup drive will continue until Apr. 22 (Earth Day) after which the accumulation will be hauled away for disposal.

Another focal area in EMC's observance of Earth Day will be water pollution. Presently biology students are engaged in testing and analyzing water samples from the North River watershed, concentrating their efforts in Cooks Creek. This data will be released and evaluated at the teach-in.

In other preliminary activities, student photographers are documenting scenes within a 30-mile radius of Harrisonburg. The results will comprise a slide set presented with narration at the teach-in.

Earth Day at EMC is being planned and coordinated by a faculty-student committee headed by Bryan Stoltzfus, instructor in biology.

Stoltzfus said that the preliminary activities would serve both to gather data on pollution in the local community and to get students involved in the issues.

"We are concerned with the local situation, as well as the national crisis. I feel that we can better understand pollution from a total picture by specifically looking into the local problem of pollution," commented Mr. Stoltzfus.

Classes will be canceled on Earth Day at EMC, with the exception of the first period class at 8:00 a.m.

The day's activities will begin with a 9:30 assembly and will feature guests Robert Sullivan, of the Harrisonburg Planning Commission, and Milford Howard, who has served with the forestry service in Rockingham County.

Student panels and afternoon seminars will study the data collected on local pollution. A rally in the evening will conclude the activities.

The Right of Appeal: A Time for Testing

On Nov. 8, 1968, Jerry Penner, a young Mennonite Brethren man from Balko, Okla., was sentenced to a five-year prison term for reporting but refusing to accept induction into the armed forces.

Penner's Local Board No. 4 in Beaver County, Okla., refused to classify him I-O (conscientious objector) as requested. Instead, they gave him a 1-A-O (noncombatant duty) which he appealed through a personal appearance before his local board. The State Appeals Board also reviewed the classification and sustained the local board's decision.

Through the National Interreligious Service Board for Conscientious Objectors, Penner asked General Lewis B. Hershey, then director of the Selective Service System, to place his file before the Presidential Appeal Board of consideration of the classification. The result of that review was Penner being reclassified I-A (available for military duty—without noncombatant status).

As a result of this unfavorable classification, Penner received an induction notice to report for combatant military service on Aug. 2, 1967. He reported to the induction station, but refused to accept the order for induction. Consequently, he was indicted by the grand jury of the Western District of Oklahoma, for a violation of the Universal Military Training and Service Act.

Penner sought legal council and the case was taken to the Federal District Court in Oklahoma City. Judge Daugherty who heard the case gave Penner the maximum sentence of five years in the federal penitentiary. This is done almost without exception in the Tenth District. The average sentence in most other districts is about two years.

The sentence was appealed in the U.S. Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals where the lower court's decision was sustained. The only remaining recourse is an appeal to the United States Supreme Court. Such an appeal is not exercising the legal process for one's own advantage and benefit, such as in collecting a bad debt, nor is it filing a suit against the government. Rather, the appeal is simply asking the Supreme Court to review a decision or sentence of a lower court to ascertain that the intent of the law has been fully appreciated.

Realizing the far-reaching consequences for the church and for conscientious objectors, the Alvin Penner family and the Mennonite Brethren Church through its general secretary, Henry H. Dyck, have requested the MCC Peace Section to assist them in making the decision of whether or not to appeal the case. Up to this point, the Penner family personally has covered all the expenses involved, which have been quite extensive.

A petition of certiorari (a writ of a superior court to call up the records of a lower court) had to be filed within 30 days. However, a 30-day extension of time has been granted by the Supreme Court. This extension ends on May 5, 1970. Such a petition must present the arguments which are unique to this case and which have not been previously considered by the court.

The cost for the preparation of such a petition alone, with no assurance that the case will be heard by the Supreme Court, will be several thousand dollars (which, incidentally, shows why the poor cannot afford the due process of the law for justice).

Since there was no possibility of having a Peace Section meeting to consider the Penner request, the Peace Section staff consulted with its chairman, numerous individual members of the Section, and the MCC executive secretary. Additionally, the staff consulted several knowledgeable attorneys in Philadelphia, New York, and Washington, D.C. It was the consensus of all those consulted that the case should be appealed. The Penner family likewise strongly supported the decision.

The Peace Section then consulted the MCC executive committee, in a Mar. 19 meeting, for additional guidance. At that meeting the MCC executive committee agreed to support the Peace Section in accepting the invitation to assist Penner in filing his request for a U.S. Supreme Court review of his case, and agreed that if requested, it would file an amicus curiae (friend of the court) brief on behalf of Jerry Penner.

MCC expressed its appreciation and encouragement for the efforts of the Mennonite Brethren conference in providing spiritual, moral, and financial support for Penner, who is a member of their conference.—Walton Hackman, Associate Executive Secretary, MCC Peace Section.

Arena Halts Publication

Arena, a Mennonite student periodical, ended publication with the April 1970 issue. Action to discontinue publication was taken at the inter-Mennonite Student Services Committee sessions held in Chicago, March 6 and 7. Arena was mailed to over 7,000 persons, primarily students from the three sponsoring Mennonite groups (General Conference, Mennonite Brethren, and Mennonite Church).

The Mennonite Student Services Committee felt that Arena's editor, John Rempel, did an excellent job during the paper's three years of publication. The format and publication schedule, however, made it impossible for students and churchmen to immediately respond to articles in consecutive issues. Providing a channel for dialogue between students and students and churchmen was one of the purposes of the paper. It was to provide a forum—or an arena—to share ideas, convictions, discuss issues, and to argue or debate controversies.

Arena was not intended to displace the official conference papers for students, but instead offered an avenue for dialogue and discussion not possible or desirable in church papers. By giving both students and churchmen the freedom to express themselves on many issues or controversies, there would hopefully emerge greater understanding and appreciation for each other.

Rempel stated several months ago that he would be unable to continue as editor next year. Also, in January, the Mennonite Brethren Church withdrew from joint sponsorship of Arena. But the need still remains for the kind of discussions and avenue of exchange which Arena sought to provide. In this situation, the Mennonite Student Services Committee felt that a new format and approach might better serve the purposes for which Arena was created, rather than continuing Arena in its present format.

Mennonite Student Services Committee is very much interested in the thinking of its students and is asking what kind of informal newsletter or paper could best provide the kinds of dialogue and conversation they would like to see. Perhaps more than one paper is necessary to serve Mennonite students' range of interests. Students with ideas and suggestions are encouraged to write to Virgil J. Brenneman, Executive Secretary of the Mennonite Student Services Committee, Box 370, Elkhart, Ind. 46514.

Augsburger on Tour

David Augsburger, Mennonite Hour speaker, is spending Apr. 9 to May 23 on a ministry in six countries for Mennonite Board of Missions, Elkhart. The first major event of his trip was an address to the International Christian Broadcasters' Congress scheduled for Apr. 13-18 in Tokyo, Japan. Following the congress he is participating in evangelism and communications conferences with the Japan Mennonite Church. Mennonite Broadcasts, Inc., producer for The Mennonite Hour, has been involved in broadcasting in Japan for more than ten years. Augsburger will discuss radio and television programming with branch office personnel there.

From Japan he will travel to Hong Kong and Saigon where Mennonite Broadcasts' Bible Correspondence Courses are used in an English-teaching program. Leaving Saigon, he will stop briefly in Bangkok, Thailand, before arriving in India on Apr. 30.

During his visit in that country Augsburger will meet with Mennonite Central Committee headquarters staff and the area Mennonite and evangelical youth fellowship in Calcutta, consult with literature leaders in Ranchi (Bihar mission area), and meet with the Mennonite Literature and Audiovisual Board which operates jointly among Mennonite, General Conference Mennonite, and Mennonite Brethren groups at Raipur (Dhamtari mission area). Then he will visit the Associated Biblical Seminary at Yeotmal where a radio ministry recently began. Mennonite Broadcasts' Way to Life program has also been reaching India via shortwave radio from the Philippines.

Following nine days in India he will fly to East Africa on behalf of the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions. In Kenya, Tanzania, and Ethiopia he will visit missionaries, speak to school groups, and discuss literature and radio ministries with leaders there. The Mennonite Church in Tanzania recently began producing radio programs and asked that Augsburger spend some time consulting with them.

From Africa he will travel by way of Israel to Italy where he will meet with George Brunk, radio director, and Elio Milazzo, speaker for Mennonite Broadcasts' Italian program, Paroles di Vita. After visiting missionaries and local church people for two or three days he will return to the United States on May 23.

Seminar Set for Summer

John J. Fisher, Jr., chairman of Goshen College's Department of English, has announced a five-week seminar on drama July 9 to Aug. 12 at Conrad Grebel College, University of Waterloo, Ont.

Prof. Fisher, director of the seminar, said the interdisciplinary course, titled "Stratford Festival Seminar: Matrix, Media, Myth," is for students interested in English, music, drama, and speech. The first half of the course, July 9-24, is an option for those who cannot devote five weeks to the seminar.

Emphases will be: (1) study of selected elements of aesthetic design, technical execution, and symbolic resonance in the productions at the Stratford Festival, (2) development of coordinated individual projects in various expressive media, and (3) experimentation with essential ritual conventions applicable in the indigenous theater of school, church, and community.

The major productions will be Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice" and "Cymbeline," Sheridan's "School for Scandal," and Ibsen's "Hedda Gabler." In addition there will be three premiers by internationally famous playwrights: "The Architect and the Emperor of Assyria," by Arrabal; "The Friends," by Arnold Wesker; and "Vatzlav" by Slawomir Mrozek.

Music performances during the seminar will include those of pianists Claudio Arrau and Lilli Krause and a series by the Oxford Quatuor, Philadelphia Trio, and Beaux-Arts Quartet.

Also on the staff will be Dr. Norman Lofland, chairman of the Department of Speech and Theater of the University of Bridgeport, Special lecturers in music, drama, and theater from the Stratford Festival and schools in North America and abroad will address the students.

More information and particulars on college credit and fees are available from Prof. Fisher, Goshen College, Goshen, Ind. 46526.

Workshop for Vocalists

David V. Falk, of Goshen College's Department of Music, has announced a summer music course to be offered at Waterloo Lutheran University, of Waterloo, Ont., July 13-Aug. 8.

For voice students, both advanced and beginning, with promise and high recommendations, the summer course will be an opera workshop with a secondary emphasis on wider vocal repertoire.

On the staff will be Prof. Falk; Theo Lindenbaum, head of Voice Department, Nordwestdeutsche Musikakademie, Detmold, West Germany; Victor Martens, head of Voice Department, Waterloo Lutheran University; Russell Smith, basso of Bremerhaven Opera Company, of West Germany; and others to be named.

More information and particulars on college credit and fees are available from Prof. Falk, Goshen College, Goshen, Ind. 46526.

Herald Press Book Printed in East Africa

The 1969 Herald Press Book Publishing Schedule listed the title, Equipping for the Ministry, by Paul Miller, and this book is now available. Strangely enough, the copy for it never passed the proofreaders, no type for it was set at Scottsdale, and the presses at the Mennonite Publishing House didn't run a single signature of it. The entire book was printed in East Africa by the Vuga Press, Soni, Tanzania. We can still hear Paul Miller talking but he comes through with a British accent, and the book is typical of, even if somewhat better than, most of the printing done in Africa. Two thousand copies were printed for the Central Tanganyika Press and 1,000 for Herald Press.

Having the book produced in Africa by Africans was a logical move. For the 232-page paperback describes Paul's two years of research and consultation on Equipping for the Ministry in East Africa, a study which he made by invitation of the Association of East African Theological Colleges. During this time Paul Miller, professor of Practical Theology at the Goshen Biblical Seminary and author of Group Dynamics in Evangelism, studied more than thirty kinds of communities, questioned 104 African church leaders on what the key issues were, and tested his findings and recommendations with more than 1,600 persons. All this intense sharing of spiritual insights, and all these ideas eventually developed into this report. The result is a highly specialized document and will find its readership mainly among the persons serving in East Africa, and among ministers, missionaries, and Christian education people who can draw parallels between Paul Miller's findings and proposals and the situation in their field of service here at home.

Service Opportunities in Appalachia

Mennonite Mental Health Services announced recently the opportunity for mental health workers to engage in a period of service away from their regular employment for a short-term service assignment under MMHS.

A new community mental health center has been established in a 2 1/2-county area, centering in Harlan, Ky. The Appalachian region is an area where the high unemployment rate, the low socio-economic level of living, the excessive dropout rate from school, and the declining population has contributed to acute mental health needs.

The objectives of the short-term service program are twofold: to perform services in given areas of need, and to offer a "sabbatical leave" kind of experience for professional growth and enrichment.

Available positions at the mental health center include those of a psychiatrist, psychiatric social workers, and registered nurses. All of the openings provide excellent opportunities to make an impact on a community where mental health services previously did not exist.

The psychiatrist would be responsible for the development of inpatient and emergency services at the health center. There would also be consultation in the day-treatment program and satellite clinics.

Organizing outpatient services, family consultation and community education and organization would be the primary responsibilities of the social workers. Involvement in group treatment and day hospitalization would also be available.

Nurses with psychiatric training and experience are needed, both in the day hospital and outpatient service. There will also be opportunity to engage in training programs with the staff and community. An excellent general hospital is next to the Center.

The term of service under this program is flexible to suit the needs of the individual and the Center.

Arrangements for housing, moving, and other personal needs are made on an individual basis. Workers will receive the normal salary paid by the employing agency.

Requests for more information concerning the program or application forms should be addressed to: Vernon Neufeld, Director, Mennonite Mental Health Services, 1105 North Wishon, Fresno, Calif. 93728; or J. Robert Noonan, PhD, Acting Director, Upper Cumberland Comprehensive Care Center, Mounted Route 1, Harlan, Ky. 40851.

Mobilized for Evangelism in Vietnam

The Evangelical Church of Vietnam is engaged in an extensive effort to reach ten million people and win them to Christ. A series of campaigns is currently under way. In an area of Cho-Lon near where Don Sensenig is working tent meetings were held for a week with over 400 responding. Pray for those who follow up. When Bro. Hai, Secretary of Evangelism-in-Depth, spoke to a class on evangelism at the Mennonite center, many students were excited about what can be done when the whole church is mobilized for evangelism.

James Stauffer requests prayer for the young men who are caught up in this military struggle. He writes: "Most of the men from our fellowship have been able to serve in noncombatant positions. One of our members had been forced to participate in scores of military operations and miraculously escaped death several times. Now he is praising the Lord for a new assignment to a desk job as finance officer."

FIELD NOTES

Paton Yoder, who will terminate his administrative duties as academic dean of Hesston College, effective July 1, will direct a Goshen College Study-Service Trimester Course on a French-speaking island of the West Indies during a 15-month leave of absence from Hesston College. He will also continue his research on early American inns.

Luke M. Drescher, a former physical education teacher at Eastern Mennonite High School, will return to Harrisonburg this fall as instructor in physical education at Eastern Mennonite College.

Drescher has been director of physical education and a coach at Messiah College, Grantham, Pa., since 1962. He also served in the physical education department at the Iowa Mennonite School in Kalona for two years.

I reread the Gospel Herald editorial (3/17/70) explaining the position of Pastor Takashi Yamada of Japan: "In spite of our sending missionaries throughout the world, Yamada thought we tend to lose our mission in our own communities." Having resigned my pastoral and currently working in a city rescue mission, I would say, "amen." It seems we are more concerned about "being nurtured" than to nurture, and to "send" money and people to foreign mission efforts than to see the mission needs right under our noses. For the church to see an alcoholic leaning against a lamppost with a cigarette dangling out of his mouth is about as far away from the comfortable "mission" as can be. We can't seem to put a mission study class dealing with poverty and a real needy person in the same category, especially if we have more than one college degree. We argue that our mission is among the "up andouters"—it certainly can be, but Christ's emphasis was on the "down and outer." With our fervent desire to erase the old "image" of the rescue mission, and to carry on a work where we have RN's, doctors, social workers, and pastors, we still find the need the same on this Easter! He is charisma enough for the man who has lost his bearings. Jesus Christ came to bring new life—the kind of life that makes life meaningful. Even though this is difficult among alcoholics, a recovery rate from 5 percent to 50 or 60 percent is established because someone cares about the needs at our back door!

It has interested me that many of our most qualified missionaries are serving the least sophisticated and perhaps the most filthy. Yes, I'm glad this isn't rationalizing my position. It simply makes sense, and the need is still there—give food to the man who needs it! Then, and then only, the message. —Norman H. Teague, Fargo, N.D.

By Paul K. Smith

A lot of things are happening in the city which tend to make people die, primarily brought about by their struggle for survival. This statement might be reasonable if we were talking about Nigeria or Vietnam, but can we accept it as being true of our own North American cities?

There are people in the city struggling for physical survival. Some do not have enough food. We had a neighbor with an empty refrigerator and cupboard, so we rounded up some food for her. Her particular situation was related to having a job that didn’t provide enough income to meet expenses.

Some people are confronted with death, mostly related to gang fighting. Sometimes this fighting resembles guerrilla warfare, except that there are alleys and buildings to hide behind instead of trees and foxholes. Not too long ago the gang in our area began arming itself in preparation to fight another gang. They can’t walk around the streets with guns in their possession since the police may stop and frisk them. A church provides the best shelter for these fellows to avoid the police. So they come to us asking to use the church for a meeting site, not admitting that they have guns and want to avoid the police. In addition, the church offers some safety from the other gang.

The Fight for Survival

There are people in the city, especially youth, who are struggling to survive as persons of worth. It is hard to feel good about yourself when all you are offered is a poor school system, poor jobs, and poor housing.

Many are struggling to survive as persons with purpose in life. Most North Americans identify purpose with the goal of acquiring wealth or property. It is hard, almost impossible, for minority groups to acquire much wealth or property. The teenager joins the gang in order to get enough power to acquire some money. The gangs secure money by stealing and by threatening businesses. They use some of the money to buy marijuana and “pep” pills in an effort to feel stimulated by something other than anger and frustration. But, the need to obtain money and to feel stimulated in these ways only promotes death inside.

I have to ask what’s wrong that some people must struggle so hard in order to survive. Is it because members of the urban ghettos don’t work hard enough? Is it because these people don’t deserve what you and I have? The more appropriate question is: do you and I deserve all that we have? This country has enough of the basic necessities to more than decently feed, clothe, and house all of its inhabitants. So why can’t we?

I think most of us have made the acquisition of financial security our primary goal in life. We have made money and security our “gods.” And since these gods are dead, we are dead. We are dead in our feelings for others, especially toward disadvantaged people. We do not talk with others, especially those who are different from us. We worship with only those who are like us because they do not threaten us. We want to avoid anyone who points out our real gods.

In Psalm 115 David talks about idol worship: “Their idols are silver and gold, the work of men’s hands. They have mouths, but they speak not: eyes have they, but they see not: they have ears, but they hear not: noses have they; but they smell not: they have hands, but they handle not: feet have they, but they walk not: neither speak they through their throat. They that make them are like unto them; so is every one that trusteth in them.”

A Life and Death Issue

God is a living God. The idol is dead. The difference between idolatry and the worship of God is that of love of death vs. love of life. When you worship something that is dead you soon become dead yourself. You become what you worship.

We need a revolution in our lives that will remove all idol worship — including the worship of money and financial security — and make God the center of our worship. You and I need to continually examine every aspect of our lives to discover those areas that are not under the lordship of Christ. All who do this will find themselves undergoing a revolution that will change how they see other people and how they relate to their needs and problems.

You may begin to see prejudices deeply imbedded within yourself. You may begin to see hidden injustices in your life, your church, your community. You may sense the need to speak out against people who place themselves rather than others first in life. You may sense the need to speak out against the error of decisions being made on the basis of skin color. You may sense the need to reduce your standard of living in order to help others. You may feel the need to give up your nice home and begin renting in a poor neighborhood. You may even feel the need to change your job. There may be other more radical changes. Read Matthew 10:34-39 and Matthew 24:9-14 to discover what these changes might be.

You can be alive and help some of those in the city to have life also. You may need to give up some things that are usually considered important in this life in order to gain real life for yourself and for others.

O Death, Where Is Thy Sting?

By Beth Robertson

When I think of death, as we all must inevitably do at times as the years roll on, I think of two people far apart in time and place who faced their final hours with such glad and gallant Christian courage that my own faltering spirits are lifted high.

First, there was the old Highland gentleman whom my late husband’s father — “Dad Robertson” — knew long ago in Scotland and loved to tell us about. That gentle patriarch, as he lay on his deathbed, seemed to know just when his final hour had come. Asking to be propped up in his bed beside a window where he could look out on the great majestic mountains he had so long known and loved, he bade them and his family good-bye with a smile.

“Now,” he said with a glow of actual joyous anticipation on his face, “Now for the grand adventure!” And leaning back on his pillows with a contented sigh, he closed his eyes in death.

I saw Dad Robertson’s own face glow with a beautiful smile as he told this true story and felt beyond a doubt that he, like his old friend, had no dread whatsoever of death but looked on it as a door to greater joys than earth could ever hold.

The other story — if story it can be called — concerns Dad’s own child, my husband’s younger sister Mollie, who died of tuberculosis in a Manitoba sanatorium at the early age of 23. She knew many months before her time came that she was going to die, but calmly wrote cheerful letters home, gave instructions as to whom her few treasured belongings should be given (to me came her sketchbook and writings), and continued to spread encouragement and good cheer among the nurses and her fellow patients at the sanatorium.

When on a last visit to Mollie before her sudden end came, Mother Robertson, amazed at her child’s serenity and almost joyful attitude, was moved to ask her tearfully, “Do you mean you are not even a little afraid, my darling?” To which Mollie replied in deep earnestness, “No, Mother, no! Not even a little. I am looking forward to it!”

That wonderful old man in Scotland — and dear, bright-spirited, wise young Mollie — both looking forward with joy to “the grand adventure!” God grant that I can face death half as gallantly when my time comes!

Missionaries Not Wanted

By Willard E. Roth

“Are we really wanted in West Africa?” I asked a fur-loughed missionary. We were at Elkhart, he had just returned from where we were going for our first term overseas.

The answer was forthright and not exactly assuring: “You may not be wanted; but you are needed.”

Even after 18 months, I must confess, that question and my colleague’s response continue to bother me. Not to feel wanted is a bitter pill to swallow.

During the past weeks I have been gathering the opinions of young Africans on a variety of issues. One question probed the place of the non-African in Africa in the 1970s. As one might expect, responses were varied. But one thing came through clearly — if there is any place for a white man in black Africa he needs more than skin color to qualify.

The chief reporter in West Africa for United Press International told me, “The most stinking thing for an African to hear is racial discrimination. Racism is not a word one plays with. If a white man comes to Africa and appears to look down on Africans he is not welcome. Africans believe that color has nothing to do with a man’s brains. I suggest to anyone coming to Africa to work or to visit that if he comes with an open mind without carrying prejudices in his luggage, he will be welcome.”

A university student said, “The non-African who is genuinely interested in the brotherhood of men and their mutual dependence and progress will find a place in Africa. But the exploiter or the opportunist truly will not be welcome.”

More emphatic words came from a high schooler. “The non-African will soon be expected to go back home. There’s no place in Africa for him. It is high time the African maintains his own homeland.”

Is there a way to heed the New Testament missionary mandate and yet take seriously the deep feelings of those to whom we go? The answer may be similar to that given by the man who was asked whether he had difficulty making decisions — “Yes and no.”

Saturday Review featured American business abroad in a special issue last November. When describing the kind of person needed to work overseas, a Du Pont manager emphasized, “Besides flexibility, the multinational executive needs infinite patience and a capacity for understanding.”

Dare the Christian missionary standard be lower?

Paul, the veteran good news spreader, once put it this way: “Live a life that measures up to the standard God set when he called you. Be humble, gentle, and patient always. Show your love by being helpful to one another” (Eph. 4:11b, 2, TEV).

Missionaries with such marks may yet be needed.

Willard E. Roth and family are serving as Overseas Missions Associates in Accra, Ghana, with Mennonite Board of Missions.
Junaluska and Jesus

"Where two or three (thousand) are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them."

If Christ has a calendar I am certain He has circled August 16 to 21 and written "Junaluska" on it. It would not be good, of course, if 2,000 of the sons and daughters of the Anabaptists would get together without inviting Christ to the meeting.

Don't worry, He will be there. This is true because young Christians whose lives are bound up in discipleship with Christ will be there.

It is true also because Christ is on the program. The goals of the convention begin like this: "There should be many opportunities to meet Christ personally." That must mean that He will be there. It follows that someone who has never met Him will have the opportunity of meeting Him for the first time. That will be more thrilling than to shake hands with the President of the United States or to bow to the Queen of England.

Another goal states that "Participants will realize and accept the fact that Christ wants to work uniquely through them." The meeting of this goal is built into the design of the program. The spirituality of the persons who speak, the subjects of their messages, the opportunities for discussion and personal encounter, the small groups and the large, the singing, the quizzing, the hikes, the tours, the films, and the free time—all these things, as Christians relate to each other and to those not yet committed, will fulfill this objective.

Let me mention a related goal. "Through encounter with Christ participants will understand that they are automatically led to personal involvement with other persons in need of Christ's wholeness." If you have a problem with the idea that Christ would be in the midst of a group of two or three thousand, let me remind you that you should not be thinking primarily of a mass meeting where all the little boys and girls are sitting in straight rows of hardbacked benches listening to a series of never-ending messages like this long sentence. Most of what happens at Youth Convention will happen in encounters between people, small groups where Christ will be in the midst.

Commitments will be made. Christ will be honored. The convention will be a blessing to young people this summer and to the church in the future as the results of the convention bear fruit.

— Arnold W. Gressman

By Still Waters

Walk in love, as Christ also hath loved us. Ephesians 5:2.

Many years ago a writer, unknown by name today, wrote: "Oh! if you could only witness the terrible struggles passing in the hearts of friends whose vivacity annoys you, whose fickleness provokes you, whose faults sometimes even make you blush...."

"Oh! if you saw the tears that are shed in secret, the vexation felt against self (perhaps on your account), you would indeed pity them. Love them! Make allowances for them! Never let them feel that you know their failings.

"To make anyone believe himself good, is to help him almost in spite of self to become so."

Seldom do we take time to ponder what problems other people face. We are too filled with our own ambitions. We only see how others hinder our own arrival. We forget that Christ calls us not to condemn others but to love them. Christ calls us not to judge others but to care about them. And if as J. B. Phillips said, "People can only be loved into the Kingdom" then we must do a lot more loving. We must walk in love which means loving others like Christ loved us.

At Daybreak

Great God of all the ages, hear me as I pray—

Past files of history's written pages
I bring Thee this new day.

Write on it of love and beauty,
write of sins forgiven,
write of labor, truth, and duty,
and of hope of heaven.

Fill its lines from dawn till darkening with Thy will for me.

And I, unto Thy mandates hearkening, will live it so for Thee.

— Lorie Gooding
Theology and All of Us

As war is too important to be left to the generals so theology is too important to be left to the theologians. In order for theology (that is the analyses, application, and presentation of religious truth) to remain true it must have numerous dimensions.

First, there must be a serious study of the Scripture which is willing to walk by faith. Otherwise the study of theology becomes only another philosophy of man.

Second, for theology to be articulated meaningfully there must be active and continual dialogue with the "lay" Christians and pastors who are out on the front lines. I have much more confidence in theological decisions reached by the whole church in dialogue with one another than I do in decisions reached by a supposedly elite corps of theologians. Witness the Dark Ages when only theologians made the decisions of the church.

Further, for theology to be true, it must also be in constant dialogue with the world. Otherwise theology will have no real significance. This is why the criticism, that theologians are inclined to develop a faith for the man who sits in the monastery day after day but not for the man who sits up all night with a sick child in his arms, is many times true.

So it is still true that for theology to be correct there must be the study of the Word of God and also the agony in the work of God. For it is just as true for the theologian as for anyone else that unless theology is flesh and blood it has already become heresy.

Now the above refers particularly no doubt to those highly trained in theology. Yet it does not refer to such only. For as Christians we are all theologians, those concerned with religious truth. And the same imperatives are for all, the search of the Scriptures, the speaking of our faith, and the putting into practice of what we know and believe. — D.

Let's Return the Baskets

Back in the last part of the past century, the railroads seemed to be having more than their share of accidents and a lot of people were being killed. No one seemed to be doing much about it. Mark Twain, who said everyone talks about the weather and never does anything about it, did. He brought in a new day of railroad safety with a few sharp words.

He said, "The trains only destroyed—let me see—3,070 lives last year by collisions, and 27,260 by running over heedless and unnecessary people at crossings... Now the companies obviously regretted the killing of these people. . . ."

"After an accident, the company sent home the remains of one dead relative of mine in a basket, with a note which read: 'Please state what figure you hold him at—and return the basket.'"

"There couldn't be anything friendlier than that."

Those satirical words grabbed a lot of people back in the pre-automobile days and they did something to make the railroads safer.

But it is happening again, and this time with the automobile. Last year, 55,300 people were killed in automobile accidents in the United States, and the staggering sum of 4,400,000 were injured. These casualties for just one year are more than the total American casualties in the Vietnam war for all years.

But the real shocker is yet to come. It is now clear that alcohol was a factor in half of those 55,300 deaths. The odor of alcohol hangs heavy over the odor of blood and gasoline in a growing number of accidents.

The United States Department of Transportation has sent a report to Congress saying that "the use of alcohol by drivers and pedestrians leads to some 25,000 deaths and a total of at least 800,000 crashes in the United States each year."

An article in the New York Times for April 5 says, "A drunken driver is twenty-five times more likely to have an accident than one who is sober."

We've made significant advances in recent years in education on the hazards of tobacco. Much more could and should be done, both by public and private agencies.

But smoking is an individual tragedy. The person who smokes kills only himself. The drinking driver often kills another before he kills himself. And he is a threat to every person who ventures near a highway.

We appreciate the efforts of insurance companies to educate the public on the hazards of alcohol, including Allstate and the Travelers Insurance Companies. They have a vested interest, of course, and so it is surprising that they have not done more sooner.

The least that can be done is to strengthen the laws on drunken driving as defined and measured by the alcohol content in the driver's blood. Persons who feel they must drink and drive must be denied the right to drive. They will need to decide which they desire most of all, because the rest of us and our families will not live if they must drink and drive.

Certainly, more baskets for more dead bodies is not the answer. —Maynard Shelly, editor of The Mennonite.
The True Light Now Shineth

By Shem Peachey

"The darkness is past, and the true light now shineth" (1 Jn. 2:8). John referred to the "true light" of the gospel. This article is not an exposition of this text, but an application.

The New Testament Christian church has been obscured in people's minds by the fusion of church and world from the time of Constantine to this day. Church and world, fused in the West, has confused both church and world in the East and West ever since. The Reformation was a disappointment. Everybody can see the sun clearly when there are no clouds. But, speaking in symbols, Christendom has seen the sun only very dimly through the clouds which itself has cast for 1,600 years, and doesn't know that the sun can shine any brighter.

Being unconscious of their own clouds, they regard the dimness of the sun as normal. Thus, Christendom cannot discern between the Old and New Testament, between law and grace, and between war with its horrors and Christ's redeeming gospel of love and peace.

"The Reformers sought to construe the New Testament Church after the lineaments of the Old Testament, thus reversing the forward movement of God's affairs in history by an atavistic stroke which coincided with the Constantinian change."¹

Why then should Anabaptist Mennonites, whose New Testament faith enables them to see the sun clearly, want to dim their vision of it through the clouds that Christendom has cast over the earth?

"Mennonites are standing at a critical hour in their history. . . . Mennonites are tending to become American Protestants, emphasizing a common faith with the major Christian churches."²

Appreciate Our Own History

The formularies of faith of variant Christendom and Mennonism are as distinct today as they have ever been. We appreciate the present tolerance of Christendom. But this should not be a signal for us to become intolerant of our own faith and embrace Protestantism. If we Mennonites knew and appreciated our own history half as well as our historians who expose the old medieval concepts retained by the Reformers, to which Protestantism has fallen heir, we would not "tend to become American Protestants."

With the mounting testimony of many non-Mennonite churchmen against infant baptism, church dabbling in politics, and participating in war; we should rather anticipate the possible fulfillment of the second half of the Reformation of 400 years ago, and our friends becoming Anabaptists.

The historical research of the last 35 years by both ingroup and outgroup historians and scholars has yielded rich dividends. At least 120 doctoral dissertations have been written since the beginning of World War II. Many books have been published by both Mennonite and non-Mennonite authors. Much source material has been exhumed from European court records, archives, and libraries, with evidently much more to discover. Also many significant articles have been written.

One of the late noteworthy books is The Reformers and Their Stepchildren, printed in 1964, by Leonard Verduin, by Eerdmans. Mr. Verduin is an astute analyst of church history, and this book makes possibly the most pungent thrusts at the Reformers and their theology of any of our historical works. Following, is the first paragraph of the Preface by Verduin:

"In the fall of 1963 the Calvin Foundation, with headquarters in Grand Rapids, Michigan, sponsored a series of lectures on the subject, 'The Reformers and Their Stepchildren.' The contents of these lectures . . . are herewith presented in printed form. It is the hope of the Calvin Foundation, of the publishers, and of the author, that in this way the lectures may serve a wider public and further the cause for which the Calvin Foundation exists."

But why should the Calvin Foundation sponsor lectures of such nature?

"Our Christian Reformed people have become increasingly favorable to the Anabaptist faith and people, during the last decade . . . because of the historical information which has become available due to more general research, and through personal contacts, especially with persons engaged in Christian day school education. . . ."

"We have a new book on church history with a chapter on the Anabaptists, and we gave it to J. C. Wenger to criticize, and he made it more favorable to the Anabaptists."³

And they accepted it for their book.

Until early in this century Anabaptist history beyond Mennonite circles consisted mostly of hostile polemics by the Reformers who in their day sought to exterminate Anabaptists from the earth. And this general line of history was followed for four centuries. But today, and for the last 35 or more years, "The true (historical light) now shines," and with increasing brightness.

No longer are any excuses for following the old line justified, with the vast wealth of source material now available for every interested historian. The suppression of truth is one of the tragedies of history. It was always so. Cain thought that he could suppress the truth that he killed his brother from God. "Truth is fallen in the street, and equity cannot enter" (Is. 59:14). Many still believe the "chief priests" lie instead of the Scriptures, which declare Jesus arose from the dead. And this lie is almost 2,000 years old.

Our historians indicate that the Waldensian leadership had

Now Is Our Opportunity

The Anabaptist-Mennonite people have now had a history of over 450 years. It appears that right now is our greatest opportunity of history, many times greater than our capacity. There are approximately 2,300 students in our several colleges, and nearly 2,000 in non-Mennonite colleges and universities. Possibly 2,000 students attend Mennonite high schools, and thousands more public high schools.

There are numbers enough, if there were dedication enough, to scatter several thousands of stalwarts for Jesus Christ throughout the countries of the world, in all kinds of Christian service, in addition to those who are out. But how many of those thousands will be available for the Lord’s work? How many of those in secular institutions will the church never hear from again? The world is bidding for every one of our youth. But can the world outbid the Lord? No! but the world is outbidding the Lord’s people. This is eternally tragic. “The children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light.” Brethren, let’s reverse this.

“Every great spiritual declension in the history of the church originated in a corrupt and godless ministry, while every spiritual reformation had its beginning in a revival of ministerial piety.”

The history of Israel from Joshua to Malachi went up and down with their leaders. Evidently the Waldensians also had a period of decline. After the spiritual blossoming of the Dutch Mennonites a great declension set in that lasted for more than 100 years. In the eighteenth century there were many mixed marriages of Mennonites and Reformed people.

“Men, solicitous for posts of honor transferred to the Reformed Church . . . The prime reason for the diminishing of their church-membership was the neglect of spiritual nurture through preaching and instruction. During the course of the eighteenth century four fifths of the church members were lost.”

Unitarianism had replaced the New Testament Anabaptist faith. The Mennonite Conference in Amsterdam in 1697 demonstrated that many of them are again interested in a New Testament theology. Their several years of preparation, their financial outlay for the conference, and their systematic hosting of several thousands of guests was indeed commendable. One would observe that “the simplicity of Christ” in practical Christian living is hard to come by, apparently, for Holland Mennonites. But we in America can hardly afford to be too free with our comments, for American Mennonites “are in danger of minimizing the unique features of their Anabaptist-Mennonite heritage: Christianity as redeemed discipleship; a close following of the teaching of Christ and His apostles on such matters as love and non-resistance, the rejection of the oath, and the permanence of marriage; the baptism of converted persons who stand ready to follow Christ, even unto death; the maintenance of biblical standards of faith and life by church discipline; and the like . . .

There is nothing Christian about seeking to be quaint . . . a group can become as ingrown and self-righteous as the Pharisees of the first century. But for the brotherhood as a whole, the danger which the Old Mennonites face in the latter half of the twentieth century is . . . the loss of even the best in their heritage, the danger of sinking down to the spiritually lukewarm level of much of Christendom, the hazard of confusing a glorious spiritual heritage with the cultural accidents which are being surrendered with either genuine suffering or a sigh of relief.”

“We have indicated that Mennonite acculturation in America somehow miscarried. But how much acculturation do we want? Is Americanization the cure for Mennonite ethnicity? . . . The answer must be a resounding “No.” But now that the ethnic insularity is shattered, will Mennonites in fact escape the fate of a gullible and even vulgar Americanization? . . . As Mennonite ethnicity disappears, will the religious impulse be liberated once more, or will Mennonites simply exchange one conformity for another?

What will become of the “Mennonite Church” when it loses its ethnic matrix? These were the questions which Ezekiel (Chap. 37) faced in the valley of the dry bones. These are the questions facing every Christian to whom the adjective ‘Mennonite’ applies.”

Our younger men should be better equipped for leadership than the generation before. But education has value only in Spirit-filled men: men who obey and proclaim the true gospel of Christ. Shall our American Mennonites reenact the spiritual tragedies of the Waldenses of 450 years ago, and of Dutch Mennonites of 200 years ago: right now, when the true light of the gospel and of church history together, light up the world for all to see the truth of God in the noonday sun?

Shall we dim this light again by casting the old Constantinian clouds upon our vision? Or, shall we grasp God’s opportune hour to proclaim and demonstrate the gospel of Christ everywhere (2 Cor. 4:6) and extend the hand of fellowship and support to our friends who choose to walk in the full light of the gospel? God grant it. “The true light now shineth.”

Understanding Our Youth

By Kathryn Cullen

To understand our youth we need to sit where they sit; to listen when they talk; to let them express themselves and don't show shock at some of their ideas. How can we understand them if we don't know what they are thinking, why they do what they do, if we don't try to understand the motive behind their action? Do we react to them in hurt, anger, or resentment? We shouldn't lump all youth together, but treat them as individuals. Let them know we trust them, give them credit for having some common sense, some convictions. Teach them to be responsible by giving them responsibility. Sure they will make mistakes. That is the way they learn.

Instead of faultfinding try praise and love — love that is shown by physical contact, an arm around the shoulder, a pat on the back, a special smile. Be able to give them true Bible answers for their questions, to talk to them of the Word, of Jesus, of how important it is to be guided by the Holy Spirit. Above all, trust God and God alone in all things. He loves them more than we do. No matter how we make our youth look on the outside, unless Christ is in the center of their lives; unless they are born again, we have accomplished nothing but a sop to our pride. Our youth can spot a phony a mile away. They know if we really care. Do we practice what we preach? Do they know us to be what we try to make out of them? We criticize their clothes, their hair (the boys' is too long, the girls' is too short), their speech, their actions, where they go and where they don't go, with never a real effort to get close to them. Instead of criticizing let's earnestly and sincerely pray for each individual youth, claiming them as God's purchased possession; claiming deliverance for them from the power and persuasion of the evil one; claiming the tearing down of all the things Satan has built up in their thinking. Every time we are tempted to talk of the lack in our youth if we would, instead, plead with God on the authority of the name of our Lord, Jesus Christ, for their deliverance, we would see the power of God at work in their lives.

Sure our youth are mixed up. So are we. We haven't lived consistent lives ourselves. We are divided on so many issues in our church. Until we understand ourselves, we can't understand our youth. Until we know the sinfulness of the self-life within us, the old flesh nature that must die, the meaning of the cross in our lives, our crucifixion with Christ, our walk in newness of life; unless we walk in newness of life, unless we walk in maturity, we will not be able to understand our youth. They must see God's love manifested through us instead of a frowning, critical attitude. We must see each one, a soul loved by God, a soul to win for Him. Only then can we have God's understanding of our youth. We can be God-taught in our problems and we can have all the things that Christ's blood has secured for us in our relationship with our youth and we can claim this for them. If criticism must be given, it will be much more effective sandwiched in praise. Instead of continuing to harp on those issues that we are fully aware cause strife, contention, hard feelings, and sharp words, we should talk to God about them, relying completely on Him to change desires and thinking.

So often I have asked myself about our differences, would I really make an issue of it, would I really care if it weren't for what others think? Often it is just pride in our own hearts, selfish pride, a building up of our own ego that is at stake. Often God has to teach us lessons through our children, and much heartache could be spared if parents would recognize this. We can't put old heads on young shoulders. We have to realize that they sin because they are sinners and only Christ can change their lives.

We have a glorious potential for Christ in our youth. Let us lead out in a true spirit of love. Let them see the fruit of the Spirit in us. Let them see our affections centered on things above. Let us pray with strong crying and tears for them — fight back the powers of darkness on their behalf, showing them the living Christ — living, real in our own lives. Let us forget our differences, the generation gap, and share Christ with them. Christ is the key. God's love is the answer.

Is Your Light Glowing?

By Mary Merry Yoder

A lady once said to a friend of mine, "How can you always be so cheerful?"

"God has given me so much that I can't help but be happy." The first lady looked at her in surprise. She knew she had a lot more to be thankful for than my friend did.

My friend was letting her light shine. Her light was Jesus Christ. By giving the credit to Him she drew attention to Him rather than to herself.

Had my friend replied, "I have a naturally sunny disposition," it would only have fed her ego. By giving the glory to God, the first lady was forced to think: If God can make her cheerful, He could help me too.

Jesus says, "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works [but He adds a little more to it], and glorify your Father which is in heaven" (Mt. 5:16).

When someone compliments you, do you smile smugly and take all the credit, or do you stand aside and glorify your Father?

"Father, forgive us for the times when we forget to follow Your example."
And lo a great multitude which no man could number of ALL NATIONS AND KINDREDS AND PEOPLE AND TONGUES stood before the throne and before the Lamb clothed with white robes and palms in their hands and cried with a loud voice saying Salvation to our God which sitteth upon the throne and unto the Lamb. "All the psychotropic (mind-bending) drugs at present being used nonmedically on a wide scale . . . particularly by youth, are definitely harmful — marijuana certainly included."

This sweeping indictment of such things as "pot," LSD, and mescaline was contained in a preliminary report to the Canadian Commission of Inquiry into the Non-medical Use of Drugs by Dr. Keith Yonge, president of the Canadian Psychiatric Association and head of the department of psychiatry at the University of Alberta.

Taking the World Health Organization's definition of health as "a state of complete physical, mental, and social well-being," Dr. Yonge asserted: "The use of these drugs does indeed induce changes in personality functioning, changes which are pathological in so much as they impair the mental and social well-being."

The Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) has reduced a tentative 1970-71 budget and voted 25 percent less for 1971-72 than denominational agencies requested.

The Commission on Brotherhood Finances lowered the allocation for the next fiscal year, beginning in July, from $111.2 million to $101.9 million. The sum of $10.9 million was set for 1971-72.

The funds are used for general organization, religion offices, and institutions of the denomination.

Despite the reduction for 1971-72, the $10.9 million is $400,000 more than anticipated income in the coming fiscal year.

Dr. Charles H. Malik, former president of the United Nations General Assembly, said that schoolteachers must share the blame for the flourishing hippie and drug cultures.

In a speech at the annual convention of the National Catholic Educational Association, Dr. Malik called for a return on campus of the teaching of the fundamental principles of Jesus Christ.

The problem, Dr. Malik told 20,000 Catholic educators, is that they themselves are the product of a permissive mood and philosophy.

In discussing campus upheavals, he said, "One had hoped that some first-class university would have taken drastic measures, even if that should cost it half or more of its endowment, thereby saving its soul and helping to save American and Western culture.

"But instead," he said, "the mood has been one of perpetual yielding on virtually all levels to the same nihilism and technological and immanentism and false humanism that brought about the great upheaval, the reason being, of course, that the administrators and faculty are themselves the product of this same philosophy, and therefore incapable of overcoming and rising above its presuppositions."

While students — "a wonderful lot" — come to the schools "craving the whole, substantial, life-giving truth, instead they are given a caricature of it," said Dr. Malik, "And so they will rebel, not knowing perhaps why they are rebelling, or what they are rebelling against."

Archaeological evidence on an important era in biblical history is being uncovered on the site of Dan, the northernmost city in the ancient Israelite kingdom and a cult center of the apostate King Jeroboam I.

Dr. Avraham Biran, director of antiquities for the Israeli government, made reports on the diggings in New York and in Cambridge, Mass. Excavation at Dan began in 1966 and has continued each summer since.

The project has uncovered about a half acre of the 50-acre mound, situated near Mount Hermon near the Golan Heights region. Ruins of a huge gate, believed to have been built by King Jeroboam, has been uncovered.

Dr. Biran said it was possible that the digging was near the approach to the shrine where Jeroboam set up the worship of a golden calf.

Dr. Biran said that artifacts unearthed went back as far as the fourteenth century BC. Items discovered include pottery, weapons, and the head of a figurine.

According to the Greek constitution, a Jehovah's Witness — even against his will — can be required to undergo medical treatment, including blood transfusions, when his life is at stake.

This was the opinion handed down by Greece's Supreme Court in Athens. The judgment was made in response to a query submitted to the Ministry for Social Affairs about a physician's attitude and procedure in the face of a refusal of medical services judged to be necessary to save a patient's life.

It was ruled that Jehovah's Witnesses are not exempt from the provisions of the constitution, despite their religious convictions.

The Jehovah's Witnesses appeal to Leviticus 17:10, which says "Whatsoever man . . . eateth any manner of blood: I will . . . cut him off from among his people," in justification of their refusal to submit to blood transfusions.

A collection of 2,500 papyrus fragments — dating from the first to the seventh century AD — has been offered for sale to the Israeli government by two Old Jerusalem Arab antiquity dealers for a million dollars. Recognized by leading scholars as of "boundless scientific value," the collection includes letters, administrative documents, and apparently hitherto unknown religious literature, both Christian and Moslem.

Last year, the dealers, Issa Maroujee and Fauzi Mansour, offered the papers to Hebrew University in Jerusalem for $500,000, but the offer was declined because the school could not afford the purchase.

President Nixon has signed into law a bill which bans cigarette commercials from radio and television beginning Jan. 2, 1971.

The President put his signature to the document at a ceremony which was not given advance publicity. Newsmen asked the White House press office about the Chief Executive's action after they had received a statement from the Tobacco Institute.

The Baptist Union Council has asked Baptist churches and associations in Britain to study a controversial report recommending a "two-tier ministry" for the denomination.

A report by the Commission of the Ministry calls for a full-time professional ministry supplemented by a "properly trained" lay ministry designed to enhance the professional ministry with experience of the secular professions.

The proposal was made in an attempt to cope with "the lack of effective oversight and leadership" in British Baptist churches, believed caused by an ineffective ministerial system.

Under the proposal, professional ministers would be given pastoral charge, with supplemental ministers working in partnership. Some lay ministers would be in charge of smaller congregations.

The report also called for a full-time, properly paid professional ministry of smaller numbers than at present, having higher qualifications and better training.

At present there are an estimated 2,117 Baptist churches with 1,245 pastors in charge. The number of pastors would be cut to about 400. Total Baptist membership is about 280,000.
Draft Debate in Washington: Repeal vs. Reform

By a 52 to 38 percent margin, the American public would like to see the entire draft system scrapped and a volunteer army substituted for it, according to a recent Harris public opinion poll.

A blue-ribbon panel, designated "The President's Commission on All-Volunteer Armed Forces," recently announced its strong recommendation for an end to the draft by July 1, 1971, when the current authority to induct expires.

Ending conscription by July 1971 would be possible, according to the Gates Commission, by (1) reducing the armed forces from the present 2.2 million to 2.7 million men—a Pentagon projection of "peace-time" needs, (2) increasing pay for the lower ranks at an annual additional estimated cost of $2.7 billion, (3) recommending standby draft authority (Selective Service System and registration), and (4) induction reactivation only by Presidential request with Congressional approval.

The latter point is one that troubles the President and is the most crucial recommendation of the Gates Commission. To reactivate the draft would require a joint resolution of Congress, thus returning the constitutional power to raise armies to the legislative branch.

The Commission said: "With the all-volunteer force, the President can seek authorization to activate the standby draft, but Congress must give its consent. . . . If the need for conscription is not clear, such [public] discussion will clarify the issue, and the draft will be used only if public support is widespread."

Mr. Nixon, like his predecessor, would like to retain the powers he now has to activate draft calls and commit troops to combat without acts of Congress. Though the President is on record for ending the draft, the crucial question remains—with what qualifications? To implement all the other proposals of the Gates Commission, but to leave the power to reinstitute inductions in the hands of the President can be viewed as an attempt to gain the benefits of popular approval for "ending the draft" without truly ending it.

On the other hand, by reinvesting Congress with this constitutional power, future Vietnamese might well be avoided. Had such a safeguard been in effect in 1964, the executive branch might well have been restrained from engaging the U.S. in an "undeclared war."

Support for, as well as opposition to, an all-volunteer military crosses all lines in Congress. The volunteer army has adherents from both liberal and conservative wings. Among its advocates are Senators Barry Goldwater, Mark Hatfield, and George McGovern.

Many Congressmen acknowledge the inequities in the draft law and Selective Service procedures, but are more inclined to support reform of the draft than repeal. The inequities in the narrow provisions for granting conscientious objector status, and the discrimination against minorities and the poor in the college and occupational deferments which favor the affluent, have long been acknowledged. Yet it can be argued that to seek reform of these foibles in the system represents mere tinkering with a system that is basically unjust and immoral. To reform rather than repeal the draft could tend to reinforce and acknowledge conscription as a legitimate system, thereby insuring the permanency of its continuation.

Opposition to a volunteer military by the predominantly pro-military Senate and House Armed Services committees has slowed any move to open hearings by these committees. Any serious influence toward ending the draft will require the influence of citizens being registered with Congressmen outside these Armed Services committees, as well as through the testimony to be presented before these panels. Hearings by the Senate Armed Services Committee were expected to get under way sometime in April.

The sentiment for repeal of the draft is, nevertheless, greater than the country has known in many years. The strong position taken by the Gates Commission could add to that sentiment.

From the President's and the Pentagon's perspective, any "deadline" for terminating the draft is largely dependent on the rate of troop reductions in Vietnam. Unaccustomed as the Defense Department is to having any kind of real restraints placed on it, it came as no surprise to us at a recent briefing at the Pentagon to hear the military official express dismay over the Gates Commission's July 1, 1971, target recommendation.

A Nixon-appointed task force is now hard at work rechecking the conclusions of the Gates Commission, with instructions to report to the President in the near future. Some Washington observers anticipate that the President will have a volunteer force program in some form ready to propose to Congress by late spring or early summer.

The Gates Commission, headed by former Secretary of Defense Thomas S. Gates, included several prominent Americans, including Generals Lauris Norstad and Alfred Goodenough, both former Supreme Allied Commanders in Europe; Theodore Hesburgh, president, University of Notre Dame; Roy Wilkins, executive director of NAACP, and others.

The Commission agreed unanimously:

That a volunteer military will cause only a small budget increase and will actually be cheaper than the draft in real economic terms, since higher paid personnel will reduce turnover.

That a volunteer military is not more isolated from society than the present mixed force where one in six is a draftee.

That the volunteer force is fostered not by the voluntary force, but by a peace-time draft which requires no public debates or Congressional action for an increase in manpower.

That ending the draft will terminate the practice of "channeling" (through selective occupational deferments) which provides the military with powers of a massive influence on our society.

That a volunteer military would not vary greatly in social or economic mix—with roughly the same percentage of blacks serving in a volunteer force. —Delton Franz.

Nursing Instructor Is on Furlough

Florence Nafziger arrived in North America the first week of April for a three-month furlough, having completed her fourth term of service as a missionary nurse in India. She was first appointed by Mennonite Board of Missions in 1945 and began serving early the following year. Miss Nafziger is presently a teacher in the Dhamtari Christian Hospital School of Nursing in the Madhya Pradesh province of India.

In some ways hospital care in India might appeal to people from North America. For instance, a private room costs about $1.00 per day. This includes a bed for the patient plus a bed for a member of the family. Every patient is required to bring a family member along who can cook the meals and assist in hospital care.

Presently the hospital at Dhamtari has five doctors on its staff. Dr. H. S. Martin, a native of Dhamtari, serves as superintendent of the hospital. The hospital has 150 beds for its patients, with 65 of these termed...
"charity" beds for patients who are unable to pay for medical care. The hospital also treats approximately 200 outpatients each morning. While the hospital is largely self-supporting, student scholarships and some capital grants are being provided by the Mission Board.

The nursing school at Dhantari Christian Hospital provides a three-year training course plus a one-year midwifery course. Each class consists of 14 students. Of this number ten are women and four are men, largely because more jobs are available for female nurses. The most recent class of 14 was chosen from about 60 applicants.

In an Apr. 9 interview at Elkhart, Ind., Florence was asked about the relationship of hospital and medical work to church building in India. She expressed herself as firmly believing that medical work helps build the church.

"Many Christians who are working and training in the hospital and nursing school are also very active in the work of the church," she said. "The hospital provides a location and opportunity for Christians to practice what they preach. It gives others who may not be Christian an opportunity to see how a Christian functions in the secular world and on the job."

"The hospital is also something of a witness center," Miss Nafliger continued. "A chapel connected with the hospital seats approximately 100 persons and chapel services are held daily. Besides the staff and students who attend, many patients and relatives of patients come out of curiosity."

"Also in connection with the hospital a bookroom offers Christian literature for reading and distribution. In these ways the hospital becomes a very effective contact point for reaching new people with the message of Jesus Christ."

"Family Communication" TV Spots Released

It used to be said, "The family that prays together, stays together." Nice idea. And it probably works for some families.

But for other families, not even praying together can close the gaps of misunderstanding and mistrust. Staying together for them begins with hearing each other, talking to each other. And that is the underlying motif of this year's television spots, being released this month throughout North America.

"Building understanding in a family — then love can grow," says the information release sent in April to U.S. and Canadian stations, offering this year's three spots.

"Family communication gap? The sixties produced lots of gaps between husbands and wives, parents and children. It takes understanding and generous interest in each other to build a bridge for love . . . with the resources God can provide."

How widely will the spots be seen? "We are hoping to better last year's excellent distribution," claims Bernie Wiebe, who heads up Mennonite Radio and Television in Winnipeg, Man., a new inter-Mennonite group formed to distribute television and radio spots. The programs are aired in Canada. Wiebe is also director of Catholic Faith and Life Radio and Television for the General Conference Mennonite Church.

"At least we hope to do better in the U.S.," says Kenneth Weaver of Mennonite Broadcasts. "Bernie Wiebe did a great job last year — both CBC and CTV networks carried the spots in Canada, which means virtually all stations in Canada handled the spots as a public service."

Nearly 300 stations in the U.S. ran the spots last year, covering every state, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands. Currently preparations are being made for translation and dubbing in a Spanish sound track for use throughout Latin America.

Of the message of this year's spots, Louis Paul Lehman reports: "We want viewers to meet the fact of God in a memorable way." Lehman, who is radio and television director for the Mennonite Brethren Churches (U.S.A.), also wrote one of the spots, A Fella'd Have to Be God.

What happens to a child when parents quarrel all the time? In A Fella'd Have to Be God, a young boy, in a 60-second playgroup sequence, tells a friend that he's wrecked his parents' marriage because "when they fight they always say how happy they were before I came along." The situation is poignant and the message memorable.

A 30-second spot, Marriage Is for Love, written by David Augsburger of Mennonite Broadcasts, tells in fast-moving sequence how married couples can reach for new understanding in a "grown old and tired" marriage. Some couples fall into the communications gap through apathy or conflict — yet marriage is for listening to each other, understanding each other, loving each other — with God's resources.

A second 60-second spot is A Childhood to Remember, by James Fairfield, Mennonite Broadcasts. The spot uses two techniques — modern full color and black and white in old silent-movie style. In the old days, the adage "children should be seen and not heard" kept children at a safe distance, but today things have changed — or have they? The spot shows how easily parents build communication gaps with children in today's world, and how parents could make childhood a time to remember.

The 1970 spots are a joint production of the General Conference Mennonite Church, the Mennonite Church, and Mennonite Brethren Churches (U.S.A.). Production supervisor was Harold Weaver, Elkhart, Ind.

Distribution of the spots is through Mennonite Advertising Agency, Harrisonburg, for the U.S., and Mennonite Radio and Television, Winnipeg, for Canada. Over $5 million in free public service time was given last year by television stations for Family Life TV Spots. — James Fairfield.

Students to Tour Church

Two groups of Goshen College students — one known as "The Seekers" and the other as "The Diakonia" — are visiting congregations and youth groups across the church April 27 through May 19.

Going west to Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, and Colorado, the five-member "Seekers" will present 25 programs in a 23-day period. In the group are Miss Christine Nightingale, sophomore from Beaver Falls, Pa.; Miss Audrey Nobilt, senior from Smithville, Ohio; Fred Kauffman, junior from West Point, Neb.; Rick May, junior from Flanagan, Ill.; and Mark Smucker, junior from Smithville, Ohio.

Going east to give programs in Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Maryland is the six-member "Diakonia," a name from the Greek meaning "to go out and serve." The itinerary calls for 28 appearances in 23 days. In the group are Miss Kathy Bennett, sophomore from Elkhart, Ind.; Miss Marilyn Houseer, sophomore from Geneva, Ind.; Miss Bonnie Mierau, freshman from Goshen, Ind.; Mario Bustos, freshman from Milwaukee, Wis.; Rick Stifney, freshman from Albion, Ind.; and Everett Thomas, sophomore from Willow Street, Pa.

Programs of both groups include religious folk music, personal testimonies, and ample time to talk and share with their audiences. One student commented, "All I want is the love of Jesus to shine through."
Board Offers Film Resources

A film documentary presenting the Mexican-American struggle for identity in society has been added to the audiovisual library at Mennonite Board of Missions.

_Mexican-Americans: The Invisible Minority_, a black and white 40-minute production, was primarily filmed in Southwestern United States as an in-depth portrayal of the plight of Spanish-speaking minorities. Excellent camera work and editing are evident throughout the picture.

Lupe Gonzales, a member of the Mennonite Relief and Service Committee and director of El Centro migrant opportunity program in South Bend, Ind., feels that every member of the Mennonite Church should see this film as an orientation to the United States' second-largest and fastest-growing minority group. The film was produced by National Educational Television (NET).

_Mexican-Americans: The Invisible Minority_ is available rent-free from Audiovisuals, Box 370, Elkhart, Ind. 46514.

A catalog listing more than 200 film and filmstrip titles in the Mission Board's AV library was released to congregations in mid-1969. More recently a supplemental fler promoting six additional films and five filmstrips has been prepared for inclusion in the May monthly mailing to pastors and Mission Board members.

Additional copies of the new Board AV flier, offered free of charge to encourage increased use of film resources in Mennonite congregations, are available upon request from Box 370, Elkhart.

Army Barracks Taken over by Mennonites

The eighth annual Christian Life Conference of the Honduran Mennonite Church was held in Trujillo this year. It is always a special event, for during Holy Week the brethren from the various congregations gather to "feed on the good things of God." This year was doubly special because it marked the 20th anniversary of the Mennonite Mission in Honduras. George Miller, pioneer missionary to Honduras, was one of the guest speakers.

The Mennonite witness in Honduras began in May 1950. Trujillo, where George and Grace Miller first began to sow the precious seed of the Word, is an old, old city (Christopher Columbus landed here on one of his voyages). During the early years a large colonial-type house overlooking the Caribbean Sea was purchased to house the missionaries and to provide facilities for a medical clinic. Today this massive structure houses the Mennonite Bible Institute and is adjacent to the Trujillo Army Barracks. Throughout the years many valuable contacts have been made with the military officials, and some personal friendships were established. Last July, after the five-day war between Honduras and El Salvador, the soldiers were transferred to other barracks nearer the war zone, and the Trujillo plant was left vacant.

Since a large group was expected for the 20th-anniversary meeting, missionary George Zimmerman requested the use of the barracks for the incoming guests. The military officials freely gave permission, and the Mennonites "took over the place without firing a shot!" This was a tremendous help to us, for the guests numbered approximately 300. The barracks served not only as dormitories but also as shelter for the meetings during the conference. There we enjoyed Christian fellowship and heard the Lord speak to us. For five days this fort was the "house of the Lord," the "Lord's stronghold." — Norman S. Hockman.

I have been giving some thought to the letters by Brother Zemy and Brother Zemy appearing in the February 17 and March 17, 1970, issues of the Gospel Herald.

I, for one, am ready to have the church examine the financial standing of itself and its organizations, especially the purpose of guarding against the expansion of any one organization. However, I am sure that the church would be pleased to discover it is not on the verge of bankruptcy for the church as a whole at any time in its history. Contributions for the support of the church's organizations have increased in the past and are continuing to increase. Granted, support has not kept up with all the financial needs of the church program, but whose fault is that? It is easy for church leaders to sit back and bemoan the lack of adequate funds, but it could be that the needs and the work being done have not been adequately presented to the church in order to challenge genuine support. And it could also be that pastors and agency representatives have not adequately warned regarding the Christian stewardship of money and property.

My second comment has to do with the idea that high level officials of the church should get together to work out a unified strategy for the future. I think the church needs an overall plan and proper strategy which is led by the Spirit, but I am wondering who the church really is. It could be possible that the high level officials of the church organization may be too much involved in the forest to see the trees. Such persons have a tendency to be biased toward the programs in which they are deeply involved. It is only natural that it should be that way. Therefore, if there could be a meeting of persons to discuss the strategy of the church, this should involve brethren who are not in leadership responsibilities of our church organizations, since they are the large majority of the church and the ones doing most of the giving.

Maybe a better approach to securing the needed dollars to support the work of the church would be for the church leaders to find new and better ways for teaching and informing the church regarding the work being done. From my few years of experience in fund-raising, I have observed that a church has a legitimate and successful work being done and when the needs of this work are adequately and appropriately presented, the church has responded.

The Bible says, "it is more blessed to give than to receive." Many have discovered the joy of this kind of experience. Many others have not yet discovered this. I am convinced that the lack of sufficient contributions is a spiritual problem involving poor communication rather than sound financial planning. —David C. Leatherman, Elkhart, Ind.

Look, Mom!

By Roger L. Richer

If your children lived in someone else’s home, would they have better examples of following Jesus Christ?

George W. Truett tells the story of his boyhood days in North Carolina. Every morning his mother would go out into the apple orchard and spend a little time. When she came back the light of heaven would be upon her face and a song on her lips. George and his brother were curious to know what happened out there in the orchard, so one day they hid themselves in the corner of the rail fence. After a while their mother came and knelt beneath an old apple tree and then she prayed: “Lord, You have given me these boys and I cannot bring them up in the right way without Your help. I will make shipwreck of their lives if I cannot have that help.” The boys went back to their play, but they had learned a great secret. There is only one abiding source of strength and help, God Himself. Mother had faith in prayer. She had worn a pathway to the throne of grace and she kept on using it.

Of all the special days in our calendar year, few appeal more strongly to our sentiments than “Mother’s Day.” Grateful and tender memories of childhood years and adult years flood our minds. Emerson said, “Men are what their mothers make them.” Abraham Lincoln wrote, “All that I am or hope to be I owe to my angel mother.” A proverb states, “Behind every great man is a greater woman.” Most of all the other beautiful things in life come by twos and threes, by dozens and hundreds. For example, there are plenty of roses, stars, sunsets, rainbows, aunts, and cousins. But there is only one mother in the whole world.

While the vocation of homemaker is not represented in Who’s Who in America, it is the major vocation in America numerically, sociologically, and religiously.

“Mother’s Day” is more than a day of sentiment for cards and flowers of remembrance. Its finest meaning is its mighty appeal for a Christian home. Motherhood reaches its highest peak of influence in building character and shaping the course of lives in the atmosphere of a Christian home. Mothers often serve as human bridges for their children, helping them to span the difficulties and distresses of life. Mother is often the bridge between danger and safety, frustration and security, error and truth, hate and love, selfishness and sharing.

A mother’s task is nearly indescribable. Someone has attempted it by saying: “Mother conducts a university, a clothing establishment, a laundry, and a restaurant. At the same time she is a health officer and truant officer. She is president of the little state called home where she has to face all the problems of economy. As president of a bank she must study how to make ends meet and often faces financial panics, shortages, and depressions. She is God’s great priest on earth, the most effective teacher and indispensable companion — this mother of mine.”

Among the many roles of an effective mother, perhaps four are most important in this sequence: her role as a person, a partner, a parent, and a pattern.

Mother’s Role as a Person

Mother is a person whose life is meant to be Christ-centered. To be a real mother she must have a personal knowledge of and relationship to the greatest Son ever reared by a mother, the Lord Jesus Christ. Every child deserves a genuine Christian mother who knows, loves, worships, and serves the risen Lord.

Mother is a person whose life is meant to be biblically oriented. “I want to be the best mother I can possibly be” is the natural heart-cry of every sincere mother. But this will not happen unless the light of the Scripture is allowed to permeate and direct her daily living. The principles of the Bible when followed lead to personal peace, peace with others, and spiritual strength. Where is there a better manual on family living than found in God’s Word?

Mother is a person whose life is meant to be person-concerned. Children soon learn what means the most to mother: things or persons, houses or neighbors, material wealth or cultivated friendships. A Christian mother naturally cares about other people, including her own family members.

Mother is a person whose life is meant to be Spirit-filled. In Ephesians 5 Paul suggests that such a person has a song of praise to the Lord in her heart (not crabbing) a testimony of thanksgiving for all things (not grumbling or griping), and a submissive spirit (not bossing or nagging). When mother is filled with something other than the Holy Spirit, she must confess it and appropriate the fullness of the Spirit in the midst of her current failure.

Mother’s Role as a Partner

Musically speaking, mother is never the accompaniment to her husband’s solo. She is always a vital part of their vocal duet. Even though he sings the melody, her rich alto makes possible the lovely duet. They mean to cooperate rather than to compete. Together they can form an effective team based upon mutual love, admiration, and agreements.

What kind of a welcome does your husband get when he comes home from work? Does your disposition depend upon how the children have been or how your husband has treated you? According to Jesus’ teaching, our spirits are not dependent upon others or circumstances. Happiness is not in circumstances, but in the heart. If your heart is full of joy, can anyone possibly stir up anything but joy in your heart?

As a partner, your husband and you should chart a course for your family living that is mutually agreeable. Then if one of you needs to be absent from the family, you may trust that your children are being treated just as they would if you were present, because your mate is using previously agreed-upon principles.

If you’re going to have zing and zest in your life, you must cultivate a wholesome relationship with your mate. Failure at this point casts a black shadow over all the rest of life. Someone has said that if you can get along well with your mate, you can get along with anyone in the world.

On those rare stalemate occasions when mutual agreement seems impossible after attempted understanding and prayerful consideration, then allow your husband to make the decision knowing that he will decide according to the best ultimate interests of the family. Just as in an efficient business organization, someone has to have the last word and make the best possible decision when there is a stalemate, so it is in the family since the Scripture designates the husband as the head.

Concentrate on being a loving partner. Earn your partner’s respect and admiration.

Mother’s Role as a Parent

Parents guide their children either by default or by deliberation. It is no accident that the wise man of old said in Proverbs: “Train up a child in the way he should go...” Obviously this is an adult decision, not a child’s.

Mother is a guiding parent. Laubach renders Ephesians 6:4 in this way: “Bring them [children] up well by teaching them and training them to follow the Lord.” This requires teaching, patience, and discipline.

Mother is a releasing parent. The best guidance allows the child increasing freedom to discover personhood and maturity tempered with discretionary parental control.

Mother is a loving parent. This love can be manifested and mentioned in a thousand ways. Telling your child you love him should be as natural as telling God that you love Him.

To be a successful parent, keep your eyes upon the beautiful Savior, the blessed Book, successful parents, and unsuccessful parents.

Mother’s Role as a Pattern

A psychologist reporting at a recent meeting of the American Psychological Association said, “By the time a child has learned to talk, his mother has indelibly stamped his personality.” Be that as it may, children do tend to become like their parents. Children watch what is important to mother, whether that is preparing for the next world by furthering the work of the church or by being absorbed by this world. They know whether or not the church takes precedence over the school or community when there are schedule conflicts. Children tend to adopt their parents’ value systems including their attitudes concerning money.

Your children should want to emulate your spiritual pattern. “If mother is a Christian, then I want to be one, or . . . ?” Do your children see that Christianity really pays off for you, that it makes you a better person, constantly improving? Be a good steward of your influence— a most powerful tool. Use all the influence you’ve got to bring spiritual direction to your home. Ask yourself, “If my children lived in someone else’s home, would they have better examples of following Christ?”

Children and husbands, be sure that the emotions you express on “Mother’s Day” will carry over into the 365 days to follow. Be certain that the pedestal of honor that you give her on this special day is a position of permanence. For in reality, “Mother’s Day” comes not only once a year, but every day.

Gospel Herald, May 5, 1970
Self-Preservation or Servanthood?

It is a time of fragmentation. In spite of the technological expertise that binds all people together in a global community there is an overwhelming awareness in many of a fragmentation of spirit and structure both within and beyond the church.

The speed of change is just too much for most. When change was slower, the shift was so slight it could hardly be detected. It was like a series of still pictures shown one by one on a screen. When still pictures are speeded up, as in a film, patterns emerge. We are seeing the patterns and we don’t like what we see. Society in many ways is breaking up around us. We are included in the fragmentation because we are a part of society.

The U.S. national response is to panic into the past. It tries to recapture an earlier conservatism. The government reflects the mind of a huge silent majority that dreams of days that never were, days when life was simple, when the young didn’t talk back, when streets were quiet, when one’s home was his castle, when all the world loved the U.S.A., when blacks stayed meekly in their place, and when the WASP never had it so good.

The church looks over its shoulder, too. That is less frightening than to look ahead. There is comfort in the re-treating, backward world of the rearview mirror because we have all just been there. We would like to mold the present after the order of the past.

The church is tempted to emphasize solidarity in a time of fragmentation. If only there could be a consistent nonconformity, a correct theological answer to every question, a single voice on any issue. Then, say some, the church would be strong and ready to face the seventies.

I think those who say these things are wrong. If the church is to survive, the strategy dare not be self-preservation but servanthood. It must be ready to give itself away, to break out of its own safety zones, to have the freedom to abandon its worldly security for Christ and the gospel, to take the risks of involvement in the world as Jesus did.

This is opposite to the tendency of trying hard to save ourselves. But it just happens that Jesus had a viewpoint that applies here. He said, “He who finds his life will lose it, and he who loses his life for my sake will find it.”

Crucifix
By Lorie Gooding

A silver cross upon a chain, and holy beads to tell the prayers, memento of immortal pain of Christ (upon a rugged tree He hangs all pierced, and no one cares. The blood from hands and feet flows free, and free the stream from spear-torn side, but little droplets trickle down from underneath the thorny crown. O tortured Man, with arms spread wide, bearing such agony for love, suffering through the darkened day, finding no succour from above for even God has turned away — yet loving still and bearing all for those who handled spike and maul, for those who mocked and taunted and hissed, and seeing, turn away again.) O Christ, how did You come to this — a silver cross upon a chain?

Can You See Beyond Yourself?
By Irene Swartzentruber

Who is that walking beside you? Can you see him? Clearly, that is? Can you see when his face is twisted with pain and fear, or when it mirrors the joys of life? Can you see his outstretched hands as he reaches desperately for help, or as he seeks to help you? Can you read the message in his eyes? Perhaps you see only a blob because you are walking, not in the light, but in the gray.

In the dim grayness, you cannot see beyond yourself. The person beside you is not important. He has nothing to offer you. Neither do you desire to share with him. In your own little world, you walk on and on.

But the light! It is coming! Now you can see your brother, and he can see you. Your attention is turning outward rather than inward. Your self-importance dwindles since you are able to see others.

What is the source of this light? You did not generate it on your own. But Christian fellowship is made possible when you walk in the light of God, and not only that, but when you walk in the light as God Himself is in the light.
The Double Threat

We are preoccupied with violence. A long winter of discontent on the campuses may well give way to a long hot summer of violence in our cities. Admittedly not all protest has turned to violence but much of it has. The legitimacy of violence and the necessity for its use are proclaimed by influential leaders of the academic and black communities and sanctioned by some ecclesiastical spokesmen.

Those not advocating violence are preoccupied with its threat. They see a deterioration in law and order that threatens the very foundation of an organized society. Life and property of law-abiding citizens are in peril. If violence is unchecked our universities and colleges will become hideouts for modern-day Robin Hoods and our cities pockets of armed rebellion. The threat of a civil war becomes a possibility. Not since the days of the Civil War has our country been so divided.

The counter danger to this condition of violence and protest is the strong arm of a strong man. The majority of society frightened and desperate turns to one who promises peace on street and campus. All he asks is the waiving of the rights of the individual for the good of the whole. His platform will be law and order. His rallying cry will be God and America.

Why is this type of editorial appropriate in a religious paper? It is because conservative Christians are rightly concerned about respect for law and they themselves are law-respecting citizens. This respect for law and their theological position makes them peculiarly responsive to this authoritarian approach. If I evaluate correctly what I read in the conservative Christian press, it has stood with the military against its attackers; with the police rather than the courts; and with capital rather than labor. I recently heard an evangelical leader say, "I see a fascist horseman on the horizon and the evangelicals are piping him in."

What can a Christian do in light of these two threats to our existence as a free society? Let me offer several suggestions which are neither exhaustive nor profound.

We should recognize the legitimacy of much of the protest that is taking place. We will surely deplore the methods of violence. We may even question the value of nonviolent means of protest and choose not to support them. But we cannot deny the justification for a voice to be raised against conditions in our society.

We need to inform ourselves as Christians as to the real issues and conditions behind the protest. We will find that there are professional agitators and outside financial support. But if this is the extent of our information we are ill-informed. The impersonal quality of a large university; the hopelessness of the black community; the inner conflict in a young man's mind who is asked to participate and indeed give his life in a war that is questioned militarily, diplomatically, and morally are very real issues of our time and will not go away if protest is silenced.

As Christians we must clearly deplore violence but just as clearly identify ourselves with the legitimate issues. To support violence is obviously sub-Christian if not anti-Christian. To refuse to identify with the legitimate issues is to admit that we have no better solution. A former president of the United States has said that those who resist peaceful change make violent revolution inevitable.

Let us be wary of the leader who offers easy and quick solutions to difficult and deeply rooted problems. Let us be doubly wary of one who promises to deal with the unrest and the protest without a serious and costly attack upon the causes.

The Christian is a minister of reconciliation bearing the message of reconciliation. It is the Christian's opportunity-and a unique one-to bring upon any situation the resources of the gospel which changes men, atmosphere, and conditions.

Nor should we forget that we are "protest-ants" and that our forefathers were guilty of protesting. There is the danger that a strong government arise that resorts to strong armed methods-limiting freedom of speech and assembly and equating dissent with treason—we may well discover that we had more in common with the protesters than we knew and that we have bound our arms to keep our hands from shaking.

Inter-Church Vandalism

Recently a friend told me of a group which received a letter addressed to Inter-Church Vandalism. Whether written by mistake or in mischief it starts one thinking because there are many ways of committing church vandalism.

From time to time there are those who have gone from church to church stealing church property and money. Then there have always been proselyters who steal sheep from other churches. Perhaps the most common form of vandalism is the name-calling and judging and gossiping which robs others of their name or reputation.

Perhaps there are other ways of committing interchurch vandalism. I suppose it still means stealing no matter in what form it is found. — D.
War: Who Can Answer?

By Wilbert R. Shenk

Brandenburg Gate, the Temple Wailing Wall, Hue, now Owerri... You stand staring — or hurriedly move past, looking for the next scene in the war that was. All the time a tumult of thoughts overwhelms your mind. Attempts to sort it out, to fathom it all, end in nagging frustration.

An entire battalion, 7,000 men strong, drive through a heavily mined spot and are wiped out in an earthshaking blast at Awka. A victory for mankind? A loud salute to God-given intelligence?

Mutilated men — and women — and youth — and children. Maimed in mind and body. The future? What future for half-a-man in an economy already overtaxed trying to provide opportunities for the elite of trained and able-bodied? In the meantime you-with-one-leg-missing will learn to stand alone, or...

Fine highways they were. Well-engineered and macadamized. Symbols of communication and mutually profitable commerce. Alas, these highways also carried the traffic of warfare and common destruction. These too now bear the marks of war. Deep slashes spaced with precision each 100 feet, set to swallow any tank or truck which dared to pass that way in pursuit of the enemy. The trenches now are filled, but each jolting bump of the LandRover keeps the questions vividly alive.

A throng of village folk jostle each other for a place in line. A doctor or nurse will quickly examine each one and sort them out. The sick and severely malnourished will get cards so they can eat at a feeding center. The rest will fend for themselves. A 12-year-old — gaunt and sick — gets her card. The 3-year-old in her care is judged well enough to survive without additional food. The 3-year-old cannot comprehend and waits on — bowl in hand.

Battered and bombed-out hulls of buildings, once beautiful and useful, now stand as silent sentinels. Vehicles which got stranded along the road have been cannibalized for their vital spare parts. Here and there is a military vehicle which got hit and became a charred junk heap.

The physical destruction is distressing and you wish reconstruction could happen quickly. But what of the people destroyed or half-destroyed? Can these survivors be convinced that they have been given a great second chance to live as a result of this war? And what of the tensions that erupted into war in the first place? Did the propaganda that kept the people emotionally charged up to fight lay a foundation for peace based on mutual respect and understanding? You listen to people speak and you wonder.

The church? You wish the “church” were not so visible. The Catholic Cathedral overlooking the city, even now impressive in its burned-out state, and the dozens of lesser church buildings of all denominations which stand along the roads fairly shout that the church was present. But what effect? A long history in the land — rich in edifices of worship, institutions, and “good works” — but where in the church were the prophets when a great moral question arose? Must the church always sell her soul at the Brandenburg Gate, the Wailing Wall, Hue, Owerri — wherever men have engaged in war?

War as an instrument of peace is a contradiction. Men resort to naked armed power when they have left off talking to each other. It is a recourse to the unthinking, irrational solution, the point at which man repudiates his claims to be human.

The church? I wonder when the church will listen to Jesus for a change.

"If You're a Christian, Smile"

By Robert J. Baker

I suppose it was eight years ago when the question was asked of me, a question that has done much to change my outlook on life. It was not a pleasant question that confronted me that day in church, in fact, it was an embarrassing one. But Dorcas thought it a necessary question. It had been asked of her, asked about me, and she came straight to the horse's mouth to get the answer.

The conversation began in an innocent way. Church was over and Dorcas beelined her way to me, a smile on her face, and asked me if I knew a Mrs. Likens. Of course, I do. She teaches at my school. Well, Dorcas, a registered nurse, had been taking care of Mrs. Likens' mother in a local nursing home. And by chance the nurse and teacher in conversation found out that I was a mutual friend. So they discussed me in a kind sort of way. Then Mrs. Likens asked Dorcas a question about me, the question, "But tell me, Dorcas, why does Bob Baker go around looking so sad?"

And that day in church Dorcas transferred the question to me. I had no ready answer, I had no answer, period. I didn't know I looked sad. But evidently I did. And it bothered Mrs. Likens. It evidently bothered Dorcas, and I would add, it certainly bothered me. I stuttered for an answer, but came up only with a miscellaneous assortment of, "Well . . . you see . . . I never thought . . . maybe she thinks . . . can a person be sure . . . er . . ." Dorcas and I separated, but I carried her question with me.

I've thought about it often. For years I taught in the same school as Mrs. Likens, along with many other teachers. And I faced many students in classroom and hall, literally thousands of them. How did those teachers and students see me? Mrs. Likens saw me as a sad-looking teacher. I presume that many of the others saw me that way also.

The shock wore off slowly. I had a few things to admit to myself, to others, to Another. You see, I do rejoice in the Lord, but usually at church. I have a testimony for my Savior, but most frequently before my Sunday school class. Sure, I have a good word for the Christian life, especially if you will let me put it in writing. I can easily, graciously expound on how the Lord has blessed me, my voice ecstatic, my face glowing, but it's usually told to a nice quiet group of Mennonites who nod approvingly.

I did a little evaluating, set a few things down in my mental notebook. There's room there for evaluating. I've got plenty of blank pages. The actual physiognomy that was assigned to me from the gene pool of my parents, I can do little to change. My goodly sized nose, my generously proportioned ears, my run-of-the-mill chin, my strictly middle-of-the-road eye color, my lack of hair, I either cannot, or do not intend to modify. So be "them." But the expression I have on my face, over that I have control. Smiles and frowns are controlled by voluntary muscles.

Why should I as a Christian look sad? Why should any Christian look sad? Is such sadness a mark of piety? Does it brand us, you and me, as possessors of an extra-special, high-quality Christianity? Is it like being a monk, a sign of our withdrawal from worldly things, an indication of our spiritual superiority? Does God give us a gold star for each day that we don't smile, two of them if we can signify by facial expression that the Christian life is painful? Is there some virtue in my looking like I just swallowed a mixture of vinegar and quinine? Does God intend that the Christian should be characterized with a long face, a turned down mouth at the bottom, a wrinkled, worried brow at the top? Can you cite me Scripture for such a display? I'm finding lots of "Blessed are ye," "Praise ye the Lord," "Happy are they," "Rejoice in," etc. scattered throughout my King James.

The more I thought about that question raised by my fellow teacher, passed on to me by Dorcas, my fellow Mennonite, the madder I got — madder at myself, that is. I sort of took hold of myself and gave myself a good shaking. Here I am, a born-again Christian, positive of it, certain about it, glad to be so identified. But I was going around looking like I was from Atlanta, Georgia, and my own General Lee had just surrendered at the Appomattox Court House, time being, April 9, 1865. What kind of an impression was I giving to the world about my Lord?

I decided real quick that what I had inside had to show to the outside. Maybe my unconcern about how I appeared in the eyes of others was some of the unfortunate spin-off coming from a too rapid and in some cases misguided de-emphasis of externals? But I would not excuse myself. I must have been a sad-looking Christian long before such

427 Cubic Inch
Ego Extension
(Or the Big Lie)

By Earl Sears

My 427 cubes climbed to 60 in 8 flat! Wow! If Betty Jo could see me now! And if you’re not satisfied with melting the pavement from 0 to 60 in 8 flat there’s even more goodies coming from the big three. Super Bird is here! A 440-cube, six-barrel wedge, a pureblood race car being offered for use on our standard, overcrowded highways, where 100 mph is the surest way to a short life or plastic surgery.

And what is this all about? It’s about a moral issue! Most Christians can become concerned about the exploitation of sex in public media. It is the pollution of a beautiful human experience. But the pollution of the human ego in convincing it that it can become bigger and better than ever behind the wheel of a 427-cube sports coupe is seldom objected to. The big lie being peddled by the big three is that you can “be somebody” in a 427 with four on the floor and a racing stripe. Maybe. But that somebody is hardly worth being.

More specifically, that high performance car may be as big a moral issue as Vietnam! When according to the United States Department of Transportation 55,000 persons were killed in highway accidents in 1968, this amounts to a national crisis. Admittedly this problem reaches beyond the high performance car. But when the president of the Nationwide Insurance Companies points out that the superpowered (high performance) cars produce on the average 56 percent more losses than standard powered automobiles, this raises questions about the morality of owning one of these “ego extensions” for highway use.

The Nationwide Insurance Company defines a car as high performance on the basis of weight to horsepower. A car with only eleven pounds of weight to one horsepower is rated as high performance. If it has a stick shift, 13 pounds of weight per horsepower is rated as high performance. In short, there is no good reason for having a car with one horsepower for every eleven pounds unless one is going to use his car for a tow truck or he plans to dig up the turf in the back forty with a six-bottom plow. Four and two-tenths million persons were injured in accidents in 1968. Eighty percent of these accidents were attributed to “driver error.” In the Auto Aid division of Mennonite Mutual Aid, the highest percentage of accidents are attributed to “loss of control.” A car with one horsepower for every 11 pounds increases greatly the chances for loss of control and driver error. If we claim as Christians to value life, what is our justification for driving a high performance speed machine on public highways?

Just Dust Me

By Francis W. Smucker

Sometimes little boys do not like soap and water. When water is just water, it is all right; but when water becomes suds, boys resent it. A certain mother was trying to reason with her son about the matter of keeping clean with soap. “Surely,” she said, “you want to be a clean little boy, don’t you?” “Yes,” he replied tearfully, “but can’t you just dust me?” This question deserves an answer — “Why can’t you just dust me?” We dust furniture, we dust floors, we dust some of the clothes we wear — why can’t we dust ourselves? When our bodies are soiled by the dust of the street, why can’t we do with our bodies as we do with some of our clothes? Simply because dusting just won’t bring about the desired results. Should we dust our bodies we would find that we were more soiled after dusting than before.

“Why can’t you dust me?” we may be asking of God when we want Him to make us acceptable in His sight, but it has not helped at all. There are those “dust” particles that get so deep inside us that even soap and water will not reach them. It takes a power greater than our own to reach them. The power that cleanses us from much of our “dust” is the power of the Spirit of God — the power we may claim through prayer. And the particular kind of prayer that works cleanliness is the prayer wherein we ask for forgiveness.

There are many things which are a detriment to our daily lives that cause God, our fellowmen and us, much concern.

The disposal of these ailments, difficulties, weaknesses, and trials are not brought about by the mere readjusting of the problems, but a disposal can be made, if the proper ingredients and processes are used to eliminate that which should not be a part of us.

I would like to mention four “dust particles” (and there are more) which may be closing the pores of our spiritual being and causing us to appear before God as unacceptable, and also to indicate the remedy needed for cleansing.

Doubt

One person said, “Doubt your doubts and believe your beliefs.”

Doubt, like dismal, dank darkness settles down on our spirit with bewilderment and we don’t know what to do or which way to go. Doubt, like a deep-seated disease, gnaws at our convictions and conscience; and dizzy with dismay, we may falter and faint. We doubt our friends, our background, our future, our faith in the Bible, and the God it presents. Doubt defeats, discourages, and destroys.

The same question can be asked of us that Christ asked Peter at the time when Christ walked on the water, “How little faith you have! Why did you doubt?” The question is as significant as it was 2,000 years ago on that stormy night. The fright of those disciples was not caused by the great storm to which they were exposed, but by their own lack of faith. Storms cannot frighten people who are trusting in the Lord. Doubt is the foundation of every fear that can possibly assail the child of God.

Is doubt a necessary and integral part of Christianity? If not, why do we let it become so much a part of our life? It is evident that Scripture and common sense are utterly against doubting — the Bible tells us that doubting is sin. James 1:6 says, “Whoever doubts is like a wave in the sea that is driven and blown by the wind.” Any such person must not think that he will receive anything from the Lord — for he is unsure and undecided in every step he takes.

Apparently there are ways of remedying our weakness of doubt and bringing us back into the area of faith. The first is to bring our plight to the Master Himself. It is no sin to bring our wants to Him in time of need. God’s mercy is new every morning and is everlasting.

Our second step is to believe the evidence. Christ told Thomas, “Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands . . . be not faithless, but believing” (Jn. 20:27).

The third step is to believe His Word. John 14:1 says, “Let not your heart be troubled.” Doubts cannot live where they find no nourishment. Doubt defeats; faith triumphs. Doubt destroys, faith makes alive.

A second “dust particle” that affects all humanity is that of unrest. Unrest (turmoil, frustration), worry, lead us into trouble. Dogs don’t worry. A certain Chicago physician found that out. It seems that he spent considerable time in research on ulcers. For this purpose he used dogs. He would inflict ulcers on dogs by artificial means. Then the dogs would sit down quietly and cure themselves by refusing to be bothered about anything. So the doctor had to abandon the use of dogs for experimental purposes. Worry keeps ulcers alive. But dogs refuse to worry. Maybe dogs can teach us something.

Each time we sin and try to cover it, explain it, or ignore it, we are becoming less sensitive to God, for sin perverts man's sense of judgment. James S. Steward reminds us that "every time a man sins he is making himself less capable of realizing what sin is, less likely to recognize that he is a sinner." The only logical conclusion is that he is less likely to seek God's forgiveness.

The best remedy we can give for ridding ourselves of unrest is the words Christ gives in Matthew 11:28, "Come unto me ... and I will give you rest."

Selfishness

"Why can't you just dust me?" We have vigorously sought to dust our selfishness away, but it has not helped at all. Selfishness gets deep inside us. Simple prayer contacts the power that cleanses the heart. A dusting will not do for the little boy, nor will it do for us. But if we confess our sins to God, that will do it — it will do so much, so very much to make us clean inside.

We sometimes look at a man and get the wrong concept of him because we measure him improperly. The next time you measure the worth of your neighbor or friend, or any man, try putting the measure around his heart instead of his title, his money, or his intellect.

But let us look at ourselves — let me ask if you were another person would you like to be a friend of yours?

I would like to have us look at this third point of the dust of selfishness as sin in our lives as that which we do when we try to do things only for the big I. To be meek and lowly in heart one must get rid of the I in his life. Some people think they are humble and lowly in heart when they say bitter and disparaging things about themselves, but convincing evidence is that the giant I is often quite as much exalted and puffed up by self-blame as by self-praise.

Are we selfish? Are we inclined to be blinded to the needs about us? There may be some things about the manner in which we carry on our business life that would be quite revealing. The biographer of the Duke of Wellington had but little difficulty in gathering material for his book. The biographer could find plenty of material on what the Duke had done, but he could not find much on what kind of man he was. And then he found the Duke's old checkbook stubs. By examining these he gained more insight into the character of Wellington than he had found anywhere else.

The same would be true in our own lives. The places and things for which our money and time go reveal the kind of person we are and what our major interest is.

Solomon tells us in Proverbs 3:27, "Withhold not good from them to whom it is due, when it is in the power of thine hand to do it."

Thanklessness

The fourth of the four points that represent the "dust" of our nature is thanklessness.

Shakespeare wrote, "How sharper than a serpent's tooth it is to have a thankless child."

All of us need to ask ourselves the question — Have I been guilty of this thanklessness? When did you express appreciation to your neighbor for being a neighbor? When did you tell the person who does things for you that are of daily routine, that you appreciate him — even though you pay for the services? I'm sure all of us need to develop the habit of saying thank you and mean it.

If you think that praise is due him,

Now's the time to slip it to him —

For he cannot read his tombstone

when he's dead. — Berton Braley

But what about our man-to-God expressions? Have we given a thank-you to God for the provision He has made for us to give up doubt, unrest, selfishness, and thanklessness and other elements of our sinful nature, and replace it with His divine nature?

You may ask, can I give thanks to God for those experiences in life that are difficult to endure? All I can say is like Paul expresses it in his letter to the Ephesians in 5:20; "Always give thanks for everything to God the Father, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ."

Our God is a faithful God and would not grant us those things that are not for our good, but at times we question them.

Let us strive to be men who are above the mediocre — to be uncommon men in the sight of God.

During the lenten season there are many people who are giving up something to place them in a position of being acceptable in the sight of men and in the sight of God. I would challenge each of us to be different than the lad, to want the mere dusting.

The Apostle Paul tells us in 2 Corinthians 7:1, "Having, therefore, these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from the filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God."

The psalmist David's prayer would be an appropriate one for us to use — "Search me, O God, and know my heart! Try me and know my thoughts! And see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting!"
A Personal Testimony

By Roy Buchanan

When draft resistance came to my attention I looked upon this idea with some disdain. I thought and spoke unkindly about it, for which I apologize and beg forgiveness to my young friends who have convictions along this line.

I think of those in the military conscription age as being in three areas. First, those engaged in the destruction of human life and property. It is their business to manipulate destructive implements of warfare: to put to death their foe. Christ said, "Love your enemy." I could not conscientiously join this group. Second, there are those engaged in non-combatant service. There are three branches of noncombatant military service: medical, engineer, and quarter master corps. These men do not employ life-destroying implements. They assist the combatants in various ways.

What is the difference between the hod carrier and the brickmason? Are they not both in the business of building a house? The brickmason could not build a wall if the hod carrier did not fetch him the needed material. I could not join this group. Third, we have the conscientious objector group, who do not participate in military service in any form. They engage in some sort of alternative service which is of a constructive nature, entirely away from military action. I am wholeheartedly with this group.

Do I have an obligation to my government? I certainly do. Read carefully Romans 13:1-7. Of course there are exceptions. Pharaoh did not always please God, and we could name other governments who were not in line with God's purpose in human governments. There are sometimes conflicts between human government and our devotion to God. We find the answer to this in Acts 5:29, where Peter has said, "We ought to obey God rather than men." Often bigots and zealots become heads of governments. I have lived in the time of fifteen presidents of the United States of America. Not one of them was a bigot or zealot that I know of, nor any of the preceding twenty-one presidents. Our government is based on biblical principles. Sometimes an individual official of the government may get out of line with our government's policy.

We Mennonites, as believers in the nonresistant doctrine, as it is taught in "The Sermon on the Mount," and other Scriptures, ought never cease thanking our government for its kindness to our way of life. There should never a day pass without praise and thanksgiving to God for the liberty of conscience that is granted to us by our government. Romans 13:1-7 deserves a close study.

Loyalty to our government is related to loyalty to God, for Paul, by the directing of the Holy Spirit, admonishes us, "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers." Our American government is nearer to being God's plan of human government than any that I know of. "For rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil." Those words ring loud in my ears. For that is what our American government is endeavoring to be, "a terror to evil."

I am by no means placing loyalty to my government on the same level with my devotion to God. Human government is temporal, terrestrial. God is from eternity to eternity, everlasting, celestial. I am reminded of Romans 13:7: "Render therefore to all their dues: tribute to whom tribute is due; custom to whom custom; fear to whom fear; honour to whom honour." I have recently examined two draft cards, and found nothing on them that would disturb my conscience. In my way of thinking I see no lofty purpose in burning draft cards, and with kindest respect to my young friends in the draft age brackets I cannot go along with the idea of draft resistance.

During the First World War I spent ten months of uncertainty and confusion plus a generous amount of abusers and some torture. These afflictions were not by the hands of government officials or high-ranking military officers, but by low-rank and petty officers and enlisted men. While I was confined to the guardhouse (military jail) I was confronted with the threat of a court-martial (military trial).

When the proceedings for the trial were completed, except for one item, the prosecuting officer had the guards escort me to his orderly room (military office) for the purpose of arranging my defense. That completed local arrangements for the trial; it was necessary for the officer to send the proposed court-martial papers to the War Department office in Washington, D.C., for approval, and it would take about two weeks for their return. The trial was to take place soon after the papers were returned. While I was waiting for the trial I ran across an item in a church paper which told about a conscientious objector being court-martialed, and sentenced to a military prison for twenty-five years.

After reading that I was most certain that I was in line for a twenty-five-year "stretch." "Twenty-five years!" I thought to myself. "I will be fifty-five years old at the end of that time!" All sorts of things were filling my mind. "One consolation," I thought, "those dreadful uncertainties are gone. I am now certain of what is in store for me." I whiled away the following days with my buddies in the guardhouse.

Two weeks passed then three, and I heard nothing about the proposed court-martial. I asked a guard if he knew anything about the proposed court-martial. He said that the papers were being held in Washington. A new hope began to dawn within me. "Could it be that those papers were being held by the War Department because I was a conscientious objector?" they knew that I was. "Something new to speculate on." I thought. I heard nothing more of the proposed court-martial. How grateful I was for the kind consideration of the War Department! I am reminded of that phrase in Romans 13:3, "... not a terror to good works. ..."

The conscientious objector problem in World War I was a growing one to military men. I shall never forget the kind consideration that President Wilson, Secretary of War Newton Baker, Major General Crowder and other top officials of the government and War Department had for the conscientious objectors.

For handling this problem Secretary Baker chose three broad and fair-minded men as a Board of Inquiry. These men were Harlan F. Stone, Dean of Columbia Law School; Julian Mack, a high-rank lawyer, and Major Stoddard of the U.S. Army. This Board of Inquiry went from one military post to another, interviewing conscientious objectors for classification. Congress had recently passed a furlough act, which permitted conscientious objectors to have extended furloughs from army camps.

Three classifications were named in this furlough act: farm, industrial, and the American Friends Service Committee for relief work in France. I came before this Board of Inquiry July 20, 1918. I was interviewed by Dr. Stone. After a few questions Dr. Stone advised that I would be placed in the industrial group. I asked him if he would change his decision and place me in the Friends Service Committee group, for I had been accepted by them for service in their organization eight months prior to this time. Dr. Stone unhesitatingly and gladly complied with my wishes.

For fifty-one years I have been very grateful to Dr. Stone for his kindness. A few years after this incident Dr. Harlan F. Stone was appointed to the high office of Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. Six years after this pleasant meeting with Dr. Stone, as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, he appointed J. Edgar Hoover Chief of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which office Mr. Hoover still holds after forty-five years of faithful service to the American people.

At the end of the war came the big job of demobilization. As soon as the German Kaiser abdicated and fled to Holland all movements toward the front lines of military action were put in reverse to hasten the process of discharging men from military service. Our group of thirteen landed at Bordeaux, France, the evening of November 9, 1918. While our ship was being docked we were greeted with, "Kaiser Abdicated," in extra large headlines of newspapers.

The following morning we boarded a train for Paris. While en route we met a large troop train of American soldiers. The troop train sidetracked to let our train pass. Our train stopped alongside of the troop train. Some of us fellows got off our train and the soldiers did likewise. When we met the soldiers they seemed perplexed and their minds in a state of bewilderment. They couldn't understand why they were going back over the same route that they had traveled the previous day. We asked them, "Haven't you heard the good news?" "Why, what happened?" they asked, breathlessly. "The Kaiser has abdicated, and fled to Holland," we replied. "The war is practically ended."

You never saw a more jubilant group of fellows as they scurried back to their train to tell their buddies. This was twenty-four hours after the Kaiser fled to Holland and twenty hours before the armistice was signed. There were several of us conscientious objectors in France who had been furloughed from the army for one year to do relief and reconstruction work with the Friends Service Committee. We were free from the army, but at the same time we were technically military conscientics, and it was necessary for us to be discharged from the military system the same as those who performed military service. At first it appeared that we should have to return to America to be discharged from the army.

This presented a very grave problem to the Friends Service Committee. Dr. Rufus M. Jones, Chairman of the American Friends Service Committee, went to Washington, D.C., to find if there was a way by which we furloughed could be discharged from the army without leaving our work in France. Dr. Jones was advised by the War Department that there was no provision whereby one could be discharged from the military system in a foreign land. Dr. Jones pleaded that it would jeopardize their mission of relief and reconstruction in France if all of us furloughed men would have to return to America for our discharges from the army.

Dr. Jones, whom I think of as a No. 1 conscientious objector in World War I, was well-known by top military men in Washington, and highly respected by them. Dr. Jones had a fine personality and had made many trips to Washington interceding for the boys in military camps during the war. Top military men could appreciate our situation, and to make a long story short, a plan was worked out whereby we could be discharged from the army in France without interfering with our program of operation. We were grateful for this very fine act of cooperation of the War Department.

When the American Expeditionary Forces in France were nearing the end of evacuation there were great quantities of supplies left on the field of military action. Much of this could be used in our program. Of course, we had no use for the weapons and ammunition. The military authorities gave some supplies to our organization. Among these supplies were many motor vehicles, large and small trucks. Though they were designed for a military purpose we could put them to good use.

During the spring and summer months of 1919 I drove a military-designed, light pickup truck over the devastated areas of France, and it served our purposes well. Our gift from the military forces enabled us to bring much more relief to the destitute war victims than we could have done without it, and for this we were very grateful. Was not this one mode of beating "their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks" (Is. 2:4 and Mic. 4:3)?

The soldier's life is rough, very rough, and I see no reason why my role as a conscientious objector should be any smoother in my bringing comfort and relief to war-victimized women and children.
When Considering Voluntary Service....

By Roy Yoder

A young person is assigned to the city as a teacher or recreation director. He has not lived in an urban setting before, and now he is expected to move right in and do something. A fellow one year out of high school who is still rebelling against his own parents and background is assigned as care worker at a home for welfare boys. Now he is supposed to help fellowseveral years younger than himself to accept themselves and overcome their problems.

Voluntary Service is basically an in-service experience for persons with little or no specialized training. Most volunteers have had some college or other type of educational background. Regardless of the extent of his training, a newcomer to a community must first learn to know the people who live there, understand their way of life, and roughest of all, learn to accept them.

There is little a person can do "in-service" unless he accepts and loves the people he is working with. Sometimes it takes most of a VS term to accomplish this. In an inter-racial setting a person is often surprised to find personnel prejudices emerging, but once admitted and faced, he can go a long way.

One objective of all VS units is to make Christ known through demonstrating love by physical and social assistance and by talking about Him. This seems to be a difficult area, but part of the learning experience is trying to discover how Christian service grows out of caring about people and identifying with their needs.

One couple went to an isolated community to live and work among the Indian people. At first they thought mainly of leaving at the close of their two-year term. Then they began to take themselves and the people more seriously. Now they see the need for long-term association with the people and feel God is calling them to make this community their home. There are persons in other locations who are doing the same.

One rather obvious admonition about VS — don't choose it for the money. In fact, some parents urge their children not to consider it because VS is not a way to get ahead financially. However, it does provide a chance to put one's talents and earning power to work for the church and other people, with personal financial rewards placed in a secondary role.

At most institutions and agencies VS-ers draw the regular staff salaries. This money is placed in the unit fund to cover operating and program costs for that unit. Excess funds are then forwarded to the Elkhart office to be distributed among other VS locations needing financial assistance.

Some community service units, like Surprise, Ariz., for instance, have no source of local income. The "earning units" come to their rescue. Seventy-five percent of the VS program is financed in this way. The remainder is covered through church contributions. (Isn't this the way a church should also operate, where those who have more distribute their wealth to those who have little?) Hopefully, the "vow of poverty" and sharing earning power will help VS-ers affect the smothering affluence so many Christians experience.

Roy Yoder is acting secretary for Relief and Service at Mennonite Board of Missions.

Some Christians are assets in disguise. One of my prize examples, of course, is Convert X to whom I have referred in previous reports. He has become not only chairman of the planning committee but also church school director—all in slightly over a year after his conversion. This could seem a defeat for our side but for the fact that his wife has become completely alienated from the church because of his preoccupation with it. (He is so busy he has hardly noticed her spiritual deterioration; the only thing that upsets him is if she suggests he go somewhere with the family when he has a meeting scheduled at church.) The boys are keen observers of what is happening, and they have decided that religion is a home-wrecker; they plan not to become involved with it.

Just the reverse has occurred with another couple in the congregation. Vacation church school takes its toll in family felicity each year. In this particular household the husband has become secondary to assembling handicraft materials. He has had to iron his own shirts, settle for sandwiches instead of meals, and go next door to use the telephone because the home line is tied up with VCS dialogues. This annual irritation lasts only two weeks, but that's long enough for the seeds of dissension to take root.

Then there is the zealot who "does too much for God." He presides over the Easter pageant, directs the summer recreation program, plans the fall festival, and makes up the Christmas baskets. He is ubiquitous and—to some of his fellow churchgoers—unbearable. They aren't about to volunteer for the many jobs he handles, of course, but they resent his overeagerness. I encourage this resentment.

When I was given this assignment I thought the church would be my number one target; more and more I find it is my best ammunition.

Vignette of Love and Sorrow

By J. Mark Stauffer

Her brother was in prison for robbing telephone booths; when I stopped at the Howard Johnson to tell her that he had given his life to Christ, she was skeptical. Her husband was an alcoholic and I suspect that she had heard a lot of promises and resolutions of reform.

She had to work to support her three children because much of the family income went down the drain over the weekend. She was an attractive young mother and an accomplished waitress.

I can never forget the time I found her in the hospital; her husband had struck her with the butt end of a shotgun and she was unconscious for almost an hour. Her left eye was surrounded with a big, blue bruise. She was hurt — badly hurt, and yet was thinking of her imprisoned husband. She asked me to go to the jail and talk with him.

Unforgettable also is the evening she placed her youngest child, a small baby, into the arms of her mother, and said, "Here Mother, take care of the baby, I'm leaving." She did; she moved quickly and silently out into the evening and was gone for a couple of days. But she came back — back to her abusive husband and to the dual responsibility involving her children.

One day at the Howard Johnson, she told me of her resolve to get a gun and to shoot her husband if he again became brutal. With more logic than empathy, I gave her two good reasons why she should not do this. But my counseling professor told me I did not respond properly. He suggested that I might have responded thus: "Well, —, it seems as though you have had all you can take" and he added, "Then let your heart bleed."

A bleeding heart is one that hurts; hers was hurting badly. The threat to use a gun against her husband was an attempt to reveal the depth of her emotional distress to me. In essence, she was saying, "Can you possibly know and feel the extent of my injury and pain?" I could not at the time. I believe that God has helped me to feel more deeply the hurt of my suffering friends in recent years. Everyone carries a burden and some are well-nigh unbearable. "We then that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves" (Rom. 15:1). Obviously, none of us ought declare ourselves strong; only as God's strength bears us up, dare we offer to help the weak.

Father of all love and mercy, look on those who suffer — whose lot in life seems only that of pain and disappointment. Bless, with Thy strength, encourage, and comfort, those who are bound in the ongoing web of human suffering. May they know the healing love of Christ, Thy Son, in whose name we pray. Amen.

A Promising Purpose

By Willis L. Breckbill

What are you living for? A new car? A new house? To get married? Maybe you have no goal. Maybe you are facing the draft and the discouragement of the prospect leads to despair.

Purpose! Do you have a purpose for living? One man built barns and filled them and decided to tear them down and build bigger ones. But life does not consist in the abundance of things which a man possesses.

Life consists of purpose that has eternal value. "Only that is important which is eternal." Life without a goal bigger than self is a small life. A salesgirl was asked if she had a compass. "We have the kind of compass you draw circles with," she said, "but not the kind you go places with."

A contractor builds with a purpose. He has a goal and makes plans and proceeds toward that goal. He has to lay the foundation before he puts up the sidewalks. He obviously puts up the sidewalks before he puts on the roof. What kind of a building would he have if he tried to do things in reverse order? It would be a flop and a frustration.

Live can have a purpose that promises wholeness and fulfillment. If man was made for only the temporal he would be able to find satisfaction in the temporal. But man is made for God and only as he glorifies God does he find true satisfaction. Man's purpose takes on eternal values. If you set out to glorify God you discover a new dimension for living.

Man can find his purpose in the plan of God. In the story of Jonah one can see a man who found purpose. In the first chapter of the prophet's life we see him running away from God. He is unhappy. He brings consternation to others. Things generally are not good. Second, he admits his disobedience and runs to God. He finds forgiveness and then God sends him on his way. Third, we find Jonah running with God. He is informing the people of Nineveh of the coming destruction. God's work of repentance is done among the people. Jonah now runs ahead of God and that is as frustrating a situation as running away from God.

God has a purpose for your life. Don't run away from, run to Him and with Him. Paul talked about God's purpose for his life in the first chapter of Romans. Paul acknowledged that he was a debtor. That the grace of God was to be shared. He said he was ready to do what God asked of him. Last, he was not ashamed of the good news from God because it was the power of salvation.

Purpose in your life will be found when God is found. When you are ready to live by His plan and then live it without hesitation. Don't settle for less.

Christ's life was powerful because He had a purpose. He came not to be served but to serve and give His life a ransom for many. Life without purpose is life without direction and power. You may arrive in a dead-end street, not knowing which way is out. Get with God, go with God!

Major General Smedley D. Butler, U.S. M.C., Retired, wrote the following in the Jan. 1970 issue of The Petal Paper.

"There isn’t a trick in the racketeering bag that the military gang is blind to. It has its ‘finger men’ (to point out enemies), its ‘musclemen’ (to destroy enemies), its ‘brain guys’ (to plan war preparations), and a ‘big boss’ (supernationalistic capitalism).

"It may seem odd for me, a military man, to adopt such a comparison. Truthfulness compels me to do so. I spent 33 years and 4 months in active military service as a member of our country’s most agile military force — the Marine Corps. I served in all commissioned ranks from a second lieutenant to Major General. And during that period I spent most of my time being a high-class muscleman for big business, for Wall Street, and for the bankers. In short. I was a racketeer, a gangster for capitalism.

"I suspected that I was just part of a racket at the time. Now I am sure of it. Like all members of the military profession I never had an original thought until I left the service. My mental faculties remained in suspended animation while I obeyed the orders of the higher-ups. This is typical with everyone in the military service."

"Thus I helped make Mexico and especially Tampico safe for American oil interests in 1914. I helped make Haiti and Cuba a decent place for the National City Bank boys to collect revenues in. I helped in the raping of half a dozen Central American republics for the benefit of Wall Street. The record of racketeering is long. I helped purify Nicaragua for the international banking house of Brown Brothers in 1909-12. I brought light to the Dominican Republic for American sugar interests in 1916. In China in 1927 I helped see to it that the Standard Oil went its way unmolested.

"During those years, I had, as the boys in the back room would say, a swell racket. I was rewarded with honors, medals, and promotions. Looking back on it, I feel that I might have given Al Capone a few hints. The best he could do was to operate his racket in three city districts. I operated on three continents."

"More than half of the weddings performed in Roman Catholic churches in this country are mixed marriages, according to a survey conducted by the National Commission on Ecumenism of the Catholic Bishops’ Conference.

"The survey also produced the following data:

— A total of 5.7 percent of the mixed marriages end in divorce as compared to 2.9 percent of the unions in which both partners are Catholic.

— Three of every 10 families in which both husband and wife are Catholic do not practice their faith, as compared to 7 of 10 families in which only one partner is Catholic.

According to an article by Harry Jones, Jr., appearing in the Kansas City Star, an excessively large portion of the funds collected by the Holy Land Christian Mission in Bethlehem, Israel, which has headquarters in Kansas City, Mo., has been used for administrative purposes. In fact, the article states: "In the last 8 years, around $7 million has been contributed to the Mission, but the records that are available give strong evidence that little more than 1 million of it has been put to charitable use in Bethlehem."

"The article further states that in South Kansas City there is a big, new opulent red brick building, done tastefully in modern French colonial, at a construction cost of $600,000. Part of it is the new headquarters for the mission and the rest (cost $157,000) is the new residence of Mr. Baney, executive director of the Mission, and his attractive wife, Ruth. Behind it are stables for Tennessee Walking Horses, which Mr. Baney contends will eventually provide income for the mission, and around it are 236 acres of farm land laced with straight white fences. As of the end of 1966, the investment of mission funds in the horse farm operation (over and above the cost of the land) was $341,000.

"Incidently, the Internal Revenue Service has revoked the tax-deductible status of the Holy Land Christian Mission."

"More than 4,000 Indian children between the ages of 8-18 have been placed in Mormon homes this year under a unique program sponsored by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

"The Indian Student Placement Program, launched in 1954 with some 100 Indian students, is aimed to develop greater understanding between white Mormon families and the Indian community — by allowing Mormon families to "adopt" Indian children during a school year.

"This year, 4,500 Indians from 10 states and Canada have been enrolled and placed in homes in seven states and in Canada. More than 20 tribes are represented in the program, including the Hopi, Navaho, and Apache."

"Radical sex education in the public schools is a result of the teaching of evolution, according to Dr. John Blanchard, Jr., executive director of the National Association of Christian Schools. Speaking to ministers, delegates, and visitors at the twenty-eighth annual convention of the National Association of Evangelicals meeting at the Muehlebach Hotel in Kansas City, Mo., Blanchard said, "The new sex education could not have come about without a full generation of evolutionary teachings to our children."

The former government official said a real cause for concern is the literature curriculum in many English Literature courses. "If your child tells you that he has been selected to the Advanced Honor Literature Society, I beg of you, please get a list of the books he will read. Read them yourself. You’ll be shocked at the philosophy used to undermine his spiritual heritage."

The educator pointed out that 12 million of our schools’ 45 million students are from broken homes and that the church has a real challenge to become a teaching branch of happiness found in the Christian home.

"In a way, I’m happy for every radical student demonstration on our college campuses," Dr. William Bright, director of Campus Crusades for Christ, San Bernadino, Calif., told ministers and delegates at the twenty-eighth annual convention of the National Association of Evangelicals. "They are awakening a sleeping America," he added.

Bright told the group meeting at the Muehlebach Hotel that the demonstrations also served another purpose — by the process of elimination, many of the demonstrators are turning to Christianity as a revolutionary cause.

"Campus Crusades for Christ has some 1,800 staff personnel serving in 44 countries and last year trained 100 people to communicate their faith at seminars held across the nation and in several foreign countries." "An estimated 2 percent of the students on our college campuses are communists," Bright said. "But they can influence an additional 25 percent to communist causes. If Christian students are properly trained, they can and will influence their classmates for Christ," he added.

VS to Continue in Puerto Rico

"Voluntary Service can stay; ignorance concerning Puerto Rican culture must go," this capsule statement highlights the findings of an evaluative session involving officials of Puerto Rico Mennonite Conference meeting with Roy Yoder and Jerry Miller of the Relief and Service Office, Elkhart.

Miller was in Puerto Rico Apr. 4-13 for a VS administrative visit. Yoder, acting director for Relief and Service, joined Miller on Apr. 13 to meet with national church leaders, missionaries, and institutional administrators to ascertain the future of VS on the island.

"We are encouraged by what we see happening with volunteer workers in Puerto Rico," said Miller upon his return to Elkhart. "In addition to hearing conference leaders affirm the need for VS to continue there, we were encouraged to take whatever steps are necessary to strengthen ties between the Elkhart administration and the Puerto Rican churches."

Suggestions for strengthening VS in Puerto Rico were given on three levels: upgrading orientation for new VS-ers before and upon their arrival, outlining in detail the responsibilities of the Puerto Rico youth secretary and his relationship to the three VS units, and encouraging national leaders to assume initiative in counseling VS-ers for their assignments and discovering opportunities for "plus service."

Miller pointed out that a working knowledge of Spanish continues to be a prerequisite for Puerto Rico VS assignments. It is the key to gain entrance into the Puerto Rican culture and in breaking down communication barriers, he said. Assignments are now being made to provide language study for VS-ers prior to their arrival on the island and to provide additional study for those already there.

In addition to language study, incoming VS-ers will undergo more in-depth orientation to Puerto Rican culture. This will include an introduction to the work and witness of the Puerto Rico Mennonite Church, understanding the program philosophy of the church-related institutions where VS-ers are employed, and finding a church where each VS-er will become involved during his term of service.

As youth secretary for Puerto Rico Conference, Raul Rosado has become the contact person for future VS planning and evaluation in cooperation with the VS office at Elkhart. This is to include assisting with orientation, visiting the units with the Elkhart representative, and serving as a sounding board for unit problems and projections for the future.

Three units have been established since VS personnel first arrived in La Plata. At Aibonito, VS-ers have been serving as English teachers, office workers, or maintenance personnel at Betania School, a conference-operated institution with grades kindergarten through nine. Mennonite General Hospital employs registered nurses, lab technicians, and dietitians, while the Luz y Verdad office (Spanish division of the Mennonite Hour) utilizes the services of a radio technician.

In metropolitan San Juan volunteers teach kindergarten through eighth-grade classes at Academia Mennonita, sponsored by Summit Hills Mennonite Church. At the Botijas unit in rural Orocovis, a married couple teaches in the local public school and performs community services. A registered nurse is urgently needed at Botijas to work with the local branch of the Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO). Most VS assignments in Puerto Rico run 26 months, including in-service orientation.

Voluntary Service in Puerto Rico offers a learning experience in an intercultural setting, fusing a positive Christian testimony to the local community with participation in the life and activities of the Puerto Rico Mennonite Church. Likewise, it is hoped that Puerto Rican youth will be encouraged to consider involvement in the Mennonite Church's service programs.

Civilian Peace Service Council Dissolved

Action was taken by the Civilian Peace Service Council, meeting in Chicago on Apr. 10, just prior to the two-day Mennonite Youth Council meeting, to dissolve and merge with the MYC. The move had been discussed and debated for several years.

The CPS Council had been composed of representative coordinators from each of the Mennonite conferences. Increasingly the conferences have delegated CPS coordinator functions to their youth secretaries. The overlapping concerns and functions of CPS Council with MYC seemed an unnecessary duplication. Therefore the move was made to merge the two organizations into one council. It is hoped that district conferences will complete the merger of the two offices at their local levels by appointing one person to serve as both youth secretary and as CPS sponsor.

The resultant organizational efficiency is not the sole benefit occurring from reorganization. The merger provides the Mennonite Church with a better base from which to discover the possibilities of a ministry encompassing all young adults — whether they attend school, work in service programs, or are gainfully employed.

Price of New Hymnal Increased

The single copy price will go from $3.75 to $4.25, and the quantity price for fifty copies or more will be increased from $3.20 to $3.25 per copy. All firm orders received before Aug. 1, 1970, will be billed at current prices.

Through this change in price the publishers will keep abreast of spiraling costs. The publishers will also be able to retire development and engraving costs more rapidly. These preprinting costs amounted to $60,583 for the two editions.

In anticipation of liquidating these costs, the publishers are exploring the need and cost for publishing a companion or handbook for the new hymnal. Requests for this kind of worship resource have come from a number of congregations and individuals.

Mission Program Needs Doctor

The medical clinic in the rural community of Araguaceca, Brazil, staffed by Mennonite Board of Missions missionary nurses Ann Carpenter and Dorothy Yoder, reopened recently after being closed for two months.

Following a change in the local government some time ago, a Brazilian medical doctor settled in Araguaceca. The mission clinic, while forced to close, was interested that the area should have a doctor. The doctor's long-range plans and practice, however, did not materialize, and he subsequently left the community.

In Araguacuca (pop. 3,000) there is presently a great appreciation and need for the clinic operations, which includes a midwifery program. Clinic personnel are in consultation with the closest clinic (one hour by air) to obtain a medical doctor for the area. Until then they will seek to maintain flexibility while continuing to serve the Brazilian people.
Senior Citizens Love Life

"A man is old when his vitality runs dry, when he resigns himself to passive thoughts and finds it too much trouble to start a new venture, when it's no longer fun to get up in the morning and commence a new day, when the urge to learn has vanished, when meeting people is just too much trouble—that's when a man is old."

If that's what being old is, then the 20 senior citizens (up to 82 years old) at Lakewood Retreat, Brooksville, Fla., on Apr. 10-12, 1970, don't qualify.

True, they sang the old songs and judged them to be the "best yet." But there were no passive listeners to John Shenk and Martin Lehman, retreat pastors. Discussions were lively and serious and fun.

The warm welcome the senior citizens gave two bearded, Honda-riding, EMC one-term dropouts, who dropped in at Lakewood Retreat, proved the generations can sing, eat, laugh, and worship together even though they don't always understand each other.

On Sunday morning, Matilda asked, "How did the disciples in the upper room become of 'one accord'?" Then, with a sweep of her arm which took in senior citizens from three Sarasota churches, she said, "Here, it seems, we're all in one accord." Yes, in one accord on the things that mattered, and the twenty senior citizens at Lakewood Retreat were old enough and wise enough to know the difference.

The retreat was planned by a committee of Sarasota senior citizens and directed by Elias Schlabach, himself a senior citizen.

Choice: A First-Year Surprise

"We thank God for the remarkable success of Choice in its first year," Kenneth J. Weaver reports in his annual summary to the Board of Mennonite Broadcasts, Inc. "The program ran on 75 stations at least once a day and audience potential totaled in the millions."

Choice is a 13-week series of daily programs aimed at helping men know Christ by showing His way in making the moral and ethical decisions of our modern world.

As David Augsburger, writer and narrator of the series, points out: "We want them to see these 'choices' not only from the practical side, but from Christ's point of view. And we want to help them see there are deeper levels of decision-making. As Paul puts it: 'For all who are led by the Spirit of God are sons of God.'"

The broadcasts have grabbed the attention of men as few religious broadcasts have.

"The guys in my car pool stop talking and turn up Choice to listen like nothing else we've ever heard," commented a Westinghouse factory worker. "We wouldn't miss it—that program really gets to you."

A New Jersey homemaker wrote, "I want to tell you how much my husband enjoys Choice. He listens every morning on his way to work."

Choice program situations are problems and decisions men face in their working lives. And most of the 75 stations which have carried the program have aired it when men are apt to be listening—during morning or evening drive times.

Results? Significant impact in communities where the program is heard. One pastor reports a number of comments from men—businessmen, storekeepers, workers—who have been impressed with the program.

David Augsburger, who wrote the series, has edited the major themes of Choice into a new paperback, Man Upright. The first series of Choice has been revised to offer the 96-page book free to listeners. Previously, Mennonite Hour leaflets were sent to persons writing in to the broadcasts.

Summer Tour for Students

Daniel Wenger, history and civics teacher at Lancaster Mennonite High School, will accompany a group of high school students to Europe this summer with the Foreign Study League of Salt Lake City, Utah.

The six-week study tour will depart by jet from New York and return by ship. Students will study in Italy, Switzerland, France, and England. The curriculum is Comparative Governments with four hours of classwork in the morning and excursions and course-related activities in the afternoon.

The Foreign Study League all-inclusive tuition includes round-trip transportation, lodging at selected student accommodations, three meals a day, excursions and sightseeing, inter-European travel, textbooks, and insurance. Programs are available for junior high school, high school, or college students. To date, Wenger has twelve students enrolled.

Washington Seminar Held for Women

A Seminar for Women on Foreign Policy and Reconciliation was held in Washington, D.C., Apr. 9. Sixteen ladies representing the Akron, Bethel, and Monterey Mennonite churches of Lancaster area attended. Arranged and organized by Delton and Marian Franz of the MCC Peace Section Washington Office, the meetings were held mainly in the United Methodist building.

Rodney Shaw, representing the United Methodist Office on Peace and World Order, spoke on "How Congress Functions and the Role of the Citizen in Influencing It." Stressing the idea that each citizen should be responsible for speaking up and being heard, he also said, "Words don't mean much unless followed by commitment and commitment means involvement." To be totally committed and involved means becoming aware of and informed about the world situation.

The lanchoon speaker, Annalice Stewart, is a leader in Women's International League for Peace and Freedom. She told about various women's peace organizations, what they stood for, and how they operated. Among those discussed were: Another Mother for Peace, Women's International League (WIL), and Women's Strike for Peace.

"The Military Industrial Complex" was the topic of the talk by Sanford Gottlieb, executive director for SANE (Committee for a Sane Nuclear Policy). Like Shaw, he also stressed the idea of individual involvement and suggested ways that one could express his interest and ideas: visit Congressmen, distribute literature, express oneself on local talk shows, and write letters to the editor of one's local newspaper or church periodical.

Within the church itself, he suggested holding discussions on various important issues, meeting the various political candidates, and finding out where they stand on certain issues and how they think. Another idea suggested by Mr. Gottlieb was that we must help to educate our Congressmen as to what situations exist and what could be done about them.

The seminar group also attended a congressional hearing dealing with the issue of possible deployment of ABM missiles against Red China. This session was not only interesting, but also educational.

A highlight of the day was an audience with Edwin Eshleman, representative from the Lancaster area. During the session, the group expressed its continuing concern over the United States' involvement in the Vietnam War and the huge amounts of money being allotted for military spending. The group requested that he remember their feelings expressed and favor a decided decrease in that area.

The group also told Rep. Eshleman some of the specific needs within the district including some witnessed by several who are active in the Community Action Program (CAP). It was suggested that Christians become more interested in encouraging their government to work positively in the area of human needs such as pollution, poverty, race relations, inner-city housing, and urban renewal.

Considered a challenging and successful day, the participants encourage other women who are interested in this subject and live within reasonable proximity of Washington to avail themselves of a similar opportunity. — Frances Nusbaum.

Churches in New York Organize for Action

Mennonite Action Program (MAP) was organized in 1969 to conduct service projects supported by the seven Mennonite churches in New York City. This Christian service board became a reality after several years of thorough discussion and experimentation on a small scale. Although each church carries out its various ministries in their respective neighborhoods, concern had developed for an organization that could sponsor and conduct timely service projects that would be of invaluable assistance to each church as they participated collectively.

The supporting organization of MAP is the Council of Mennonite Churches in New York City which is a legal corporation in the state of New York. The membership of this council consists of representatives from the following churches: First Mennonite Church of Brooklyn, Bronx Spanish Mennonite Church, Mennonite House of Friendship Church, Fox Street Mennonite Church, Glad Tidings Mennonite Church, Seventh Avenue Mennonite Church, and the Good Shepherd Mennonite Church. The two conferences represented among these churches are Ohio and Eastern and Lancaster. The Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities at Elkhart, Ind., and Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities at Salunga, Pa., are the two sponsoring mission boards. The MAP Board, in its administrative structure, carries a mandate from the above seven churches through their council to initiate, fund, and administer service projects.

Staff work of MAP is carried out by a program director who is presently employed by the Board on a half-time basis. He, along with the chairman of the council, serves as liaison between the council and the MAP Board. The program director also works closely with the Board in strategy and planning.

The first project undertaken by MAP was Camp Deepark which is located in the foothills of the Catskill Mountains, 85 miles northwest of New York City. This 277-acre camping facility was bought and a camping program was begun in the spring of 1969. It is providing a meaningful year-round camping ministry for these city churches.

For the future MAP is concerned with the following areas of special need: a rehabilitation program for drug addicts, a juvenile foster care program, special youth ministries, leadership-training institutes, etc.

In seeking its mission, MAP is taking a Spirit-directed, hard-nosed look at our present-day urban problems as they affect the life of the church. The following three principles for charting Christian concern are guiding the Board in its work: determining strategy by community need, setting forth long-range and immediate goals, and planning comprehensively and cooperatively.

Arena Wins All-American Award

Arena, the three-year-old inter-Mennonite paper for university students, received an All-American rating from the Associated Collegiate Press at the University of Minnesota in Minneapolis. The student monthly, which appeared October to April, was prepared by the Inter-Mennonite Student Services Committee for college and university students of General Conference Mennonite, Old Mennonite, and Mennonite Brethren churches. Student editor throughout the three years of the paper's existence has been John Rempel, now living in Sarasota, Fla.

In categories relating to the character of the magazine, the editorial content, illustrations, editing and displaying, and production, the magazine consistently scored "excellent" ratings.

The judge found Arena to be "extremely interesting," commenting, "I can't be of help other than to praise your efforts and to note the constant attempts to improve both content and layout. Continued success."

A total score of 1850 placed Arena in the All-American category, the highest category awarded. The following scoring range was used: All-American (low score

Special Services
Held in Ghana

Nine young people baptized on Easter Sunday morning during Holy Week Conference of the Ghana Mennonite Church. At far left is church leader Samuel A. Tetteh.

Special Holy Week services were observed by the 200-member Ghana Mennonite Church March 26-30 in Amasaman. Nine youths were baptized into the Amasaman Church on Easter Sunday morning followed by a communion service.

Care is taken to confront young people with the full implications of what it means to be a Christian. The decision of the youths to be Christians is always discussed with parents or guardians. An invitation is given to the parents or guardians also to commit their lives to Christ.

John Hiebert of African Challenge was guest speaker on Friday and Saturday evenings. The Thursday mass meeting included a children’s meeting, music by the Amasaman Chorus, a sermon and a footwashing service. All nine services in the three-day event were well attended.

The Holy Week services were intended to bring all the churches together for fellowship; provide a time when all look again at Christ’s crucifixion, resurrection, and ascension; and structure a program that could be duplicated in part in any one of the local congregations. Plans for a similar conference next year may include regional meetings.

“Quarter-Century” Celebration Planned

This year completes the first quarter century of Rockway Mennonite School’s existence as an inspected private school. It is fitting that a suitable celebration ceremony be planned to recognize this milestone and to give thanks to God and to honor the persons and the vision that led to the founding of the school in 1945.

A committee composed of present students, staff, and administration, plus representatives from the Board and the alumni association, is planning a weekend of activities in May. Saturday, May 9, will be Alumni Day. Class reunions will be held on campus or in local homes of alumni members during the afternoon. The Alumni Association will plan an informal evening program in the auditorium.

The Spring Home Concert presented by the Rockway choirs and instrumental ensemble will be the featured event on Sunday afternoon, May 10.

A formal service of celebration on Sunday evening will provide a fitting climax to the weekend of activities. Ross Bender, principal of Rockway from 1956 to 1961 and presently Dean of Associated Mennonite Biblical Seminaries, will present the keynote address. A variety of special features suitable to this occasion are being planned, including a recognition of the first staff team comprised of Harold Groh, first principal, and Salome Bauman, who this year completes her twenty-fifth year as a teacher at Rockway.

Former students, staff, and all friends of the school will want to plan to partake in these events. Come for the entire weekend. Classmates and other friends will be happy to provide accommodation to persons attending from out of town.

Farmers Discover Land Potential

A two-week farmers' training course, held recently at the Ranchi Agricultural College, Bihar, India, was attended by 24 Palamau District farmers recommended by the Mennonite Service Agency.

The Mennonite Service Agency, formerly known as the Mennonite Relief Committee, is comprised of representatives of the Mennonite Central Committee, the Bihar Mennonite Mission, and the Bihar Mennonite Church. John E. Beachy, missionary with the Mennonite Board of Missions (Elkhart, Ind.), serves as program director for the Mennonite Service Agency.

The course challenged the traditional methods of Indian farming, the national professors of the college giving their time free to discuss improved seeds, use of fertilizer and pesticides, steel plows and cultivators. The course included lectures and tours of model farms.

Many of the farmers threw themselves into changing their methods immediately upon return to their farms after the close of the course.

Suliman Kujar, a college student, says that now he wants to try out on his family land what he has learned in the classroom. He had earlier thought that he needed training to find employment in a city. Now he says that he believes if he uses the improved methods he learned he could earn his living from the soil.

"Why haven't we been given this information before?" he asked. "We could have had food even in those hard years."

The two-week course opened a door through which the farmers got a glimpse of the potential of their own land. They will now be a nucleus with whom the Mennonite agency will work, giving loans for improved seeds which will be repaid in kind at harvesttime. The farmers can receive 50 percent subsidy in fertilizers and pesticides, the balance for which the Mennonite agency is trying to help them obtain government agricultural loans. Two agricultural supervisors, employed by the agency, will assist them in soil-testing and other technical services.

John E. Harshberger, Scottdale, Pa., Publishing House employee in layout and design died suddenly April 25 of a heart attack. Obituary will follow.

J. Laurence Burkholder, professor at Harvard Divinity School and a former member of Goshen College Faculty, has been elected by the Mennonite Board of Education to be Goshen College's 10th president. He will assume responsibility of the office July 1, 1971. Full story next week.

John Hess, who has been minister of the Mennonite Church in Warden Park, Toronto, Canada, for 13 years, was named Scarborough's Man of the Year for his part in getting a $300,000 community center built in Warden Woods, a public housing project with 2,000 residents.

D. Edward Diener was installed as pastor of the West Clinton congregation near Pettisville, Ohio, on Apr. 19. The service was in charge of E. B. Frey. Walter Stucky preached the sermon.

All present and former MCC workers are invited to an MCC Reunion at the South Union Mennonite Church, West Liberty, Ohio, May 16, at 3:30 p.m. Mrs. J. N. Byler will display and sell Arab needlework. Visitors are invited to stay for a great Peace Convocation on Sunday with O. O. Miller, Robert Kreider, Vern Freheim, Elmer Neufeld, and Lloyd Fisher as speakers. Visitors should send reservations (number and time of arrival) to Chauncey Kauffman, West Liberty, Ohio.

Mrs. Otis Hochstetler, Brasilia, Brazil, reports: “At the two bookstores that Otis manages, sales have been higher during March and April than the previous months. Religious books, Bibles, and religious records still account for about 48 percent of the total sales. The best sellers which have been translated into Portuguese are World Almanac by Billy Graham and some of Oswald J. Smith’s books. The Cross and the Switchblade was just translated and is selling well. Living Letters was translated but sold so well that it is already out of print.”

Change and the Church

by Paul N. Kraybill

Focal Pamphlet No. 19. Here is a constructive approach to a process that seems to be increasing in tempo. The author attempts to understand the changes taking place in society and their effect upon the church.

He outlines the problems resulting from change and then looks at two pressure points, the force of tradition and the revolutionary nature of the gospel. He presents the problems of change as a challenge to spiritual renewal. Here is orientation to the circumstances you face regardless of where you live. 0-8361-1619-4: $5.50
